This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

THE SYMBOLISM OF SACRED PLANTS.

As Developed in Freemasonry and the Kindred Institutions of the Ancient World.

BY ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D.

XIII.

THE LAUREL.

The laurel, consecrated in a thousand religious rites by the ancient mythologists, is the Bay Tree of the moderns, the Daphne of the Greeks, and the Laurus nobilis of the botanists. It is an evergreen tree which attains the height of twenty or thirty feet. It must, from its pleasing appearance, its grateful shade, and the agreeable odor of its flowers, have always attracted attention. Hence we find that, from an early period, it was consecrated by the poets and priests to Apollo, as a sacred plant. It is common in Spain, in Italy, in Greece, and in the Levant.

No travelers in Palestine have mentioned it as growing in that country; hence the Hebrew word Ezrach, which is supposed by commentators to denote the laurel, occurs but once in Scripture, namely, in Psalm xxxvii., 35, where we find this passage: "I have seen the wicked in great power, spreading himself like a green bay tree." Accordingly, Wemyss does not mention it among his scriptural symbols. Dr. Royle supposes that the reason why the laurel is not more frequently mentioned in Scripture is probably because it was never very common in Palestine; but he cites another, although less plausible reason, from Isidore de Barriere, who says that it did not become the Holy Scriptures to be polluted by the mention of a tree which was so much valued by the heathens, and was the subject of so many fables and poetic fictions.

Ovid, in his "Metamorphoses," gives the following as the legend on which depends the consecration of the tree to Apollo. The legend also accounts for its Greek name, Daphne:

Daphne, according to the fabulist, was a nymph of surpassing beauty, the daughter of the river god Peneus, a stream which flowed through the sacred vale of Tempe. She delighted only in the pleasures of the chase, and, like her patroness Diana, abjured all commerce with men and devoted herself to a single life. Apollo, on a certain occasion, beheld her wandering through the forest, and, becoming deeply enamored of her beauty, addressed to her the warmest expressions of love, and besought her to return his affection. The terrified and reluctant nymph fled from his advances, but was pursued by the infatuated god, with all the ardor that his passion inspired. To all his entreaties that she would pause and listen to his vows, she made no reply. His words of endearment had only the effect of hastening her speed. But the race, impelled on one side by love and on the other by fear, is nearly at an end. The exhausted nymph already feels upon her neck and her flowing tresses the warm breath of her pursuing lover. At last she arrives upon the banks of her paternal stream. Despairing any longer of escape by flight, the panting virgin cries to her divine father for help, and implores safety either by entombment or flight. Peneus hears and aids his child. Scarcely has she finished her prayer when a heavy torpor seizes her limbs, and a slender bark begins to enclose her tender body. Her tresses are transformed into leaves, and her arms into branches. Her feet, but lately so rapid in motion, now adhere immovably to the earth. Her head becomes the summit of a tree in which its original beauty remains. Apollo still loves her, and embracing the trunk, he feels the trembling heart yet palpitating beneath the recently formed bark. He bestows kisses on the wood, but the wood refuses his kisses. "Since," he exclaims, "thou canst no longer be my spouse, thou shalt be my tree. Thou, O! laurel, shalt forever adorn my brow, my quiver, and my harp; thou shalt accompany victorious generals in their triumphs; thou shalt stand a faithful guardian before the gate of Cæsar, and thy leaves shall forever flourish in perpetual green."

Such was the story of the poets by which they accounted for the consecration of the laurel as the sacred tree of Apollo. I have already intimated, in treating of the myrtle, that most probably there was an early legend that accompanied the consecration by the ancients of every hieroglyphic plant, and which connected it more particularly with the rites in which it was used and with the character of the deity to whom it was consecrated. This legend of the laurel would, however, seem to be of a comparatively more modern date, since it affords no explanation of the true symbolism of the tree. It was, perhaps, altered or modified from some more ancient myth. It is worthy of remark that there is a similar legend in the Hindoo mythology, where Krishna, becoming enamored of the nymph Tulasi, and not succeeding in his passion, transforms her into the Tulasi tree, which thenceforth becomes sacred to the god, and in sacrificial rites is always offered on his altars.

The laurel, thus consecrated to Apollo, was used on all religious occasions where that god was worshiped or invoked. Thus, the most celebrated of all the oracles of Apollo was that of Delphi, in Phocis. The temple was one of the most magnificent edifices in Greece. Its inner roof was covered all over with garlands of laurel, and laurel only was burnt upon its altar as incense. But the first temple, which tradition celebrates as having been built by Apollo himself, is said to have been a mere hut, constructed of laurel branches brought from the vale of Tempe and artistically interlaced. Something like this was preserved in after times; for in the festival of Septerion, celebrated every year at Delphi in honor of the victory of Apollo over the serpent Python, a beautiful bower, which, however, according to Plutarch, resembled rather a royal palace than a hut, was constructed of laurel branches in front of the temple.

The priests of Apollo, in their sacrifices to their god, always wore crowns of laurel, and in the purification by water, to which every one who attended the sacrifices was compelled to submit, the purification was made by dipping a laurel branch in the vessel of holy water which was placed at the entrance of the temple, and with it the votaries were sprinkled as they entered. When prayers were offered up to Apollo, the worshipers wore crowns of laurel upon their heads or garlands suspended from their necks, and held branches of the same sacred plant in their hands.

The Daphnephoria was a religious festival celebrated every nine years by the Bœotians in honor of Apollo. In the celebration of these sacred rites, an olive bough was adorned with branches of laurel. On the top of this bough was placed a large globe of brass, to represent the sun; for it will be seen hereafter that Apollo was primarily the sun-god. Beneath it there was a smaller one to represent the moon. Still smaller globes were suspended around the larger one to symbolize the stars, and crowns, to the number of three hundred and sixty-five, as types of the sun's annual revolution—all being intended to refer to Apollo as the sun-god. The bough thus adorned was borne in procession by a boy, who was called the "laurel bearer," and a choir of virgins followed carrying laurel branches in their hands. In this order they proceeded to the temple of Apollo Ismeneus, where they sang supplicatory hymns.

Apollo was peculiarly the god of prophecy, and therefore the laurel was greatly used by the ancients in the art of divination. Hence it was called by the Greeks mantikon phuton, "the prophetic plant," and the Roman poet Claudian styles it venturi prescia laurus, "the laurel skilled in what is to happen." Accordingly, we find that diviners, when about to practice their art of vaticination, placed crowns of laurel on their heads, and inserted its leaves under their pillows to beget prophetic dreams. Thus Æschylus describes the unhappy prophetess Cassandra in such words as these:

> "Her hand a laurel sceptre grasps, her neck
> The same prophetic plants with garlands deck."

It was also a popular belief that the eating of laurel leaves would increase the power of vaticination. Soothsayers, from having recourse to this practice, received the name of daphnephagi, or "laurel eaters," and the Greek poet Lycophron, when speaking of the same Cassandra, says that "having eaten of the laurel, she uttered prophetic words."

Because the laurel was the sacred plant of Apollo, it followed very naturally that it should also be consecrated to his son Esculapius, the god of healing; and hence arose the superstitious use of it as a preservative against injuries, and especially against thunder and lightning. Pliny, in his "Natural History," says that of all trees planted by man, the laurel alone is never struck by lightning, and he tells us that it was the custom of the Emperor Tiberius, whenever it lightened, to crown himself with a laurel wreath as a preservative against the lightning. This superstition has descended to modern times, and Brande, in his "Popular Antiquities," cites many passages from the old English writers to show that this doctrine of the preservative quality of the bay or laurel was believed by the people scarcely more than two centuries ago. Thus Greene, in his "Penelope's Web," published in 1601, says, "he which beareth the bay tree (the laurel) is privileged from the prejudice of thunder." And in an old play is this passage:

"Reach the bays:
I'll tie a garland here about his head
'Twill keep my boy from lightning."

Brande quotes another work, published in 1634, as saying that the bay tree, or laurel, "is so privileged by nature that even thunder and lightning are here taxed of partiality, and will not touch him, for respect's sake, as a sacred thing."

In some verses written in honor of Ben Jonson by the Bishop of Chichester, and also cited by Brande, the wreath of laurel with which the poet is metaphorically crowned is called

"That wreathe which doth the wearer arme
'Gainst the quick strokes of thunder."

This same notion, that the laurel was an averter of evil, was the origin of the custom among the ancient Greeks of affixing a branch of it over the door of any person who was seized with a dangerous disease; because, as Potter says, it rendered Apollo propitious as the god of physic, who they thought could design no harm to any place where he found the monument of his beloved Daphne.

Another important use of the laurel among the ancients was as a symbol of victory in literary contests. Apollo was the god of poetry, and hence successful poets were crowned with his favorite laurel, a custom which has been figuratively preserved to the present day. In the Pythian games, which were contests in music and poetry, and which were held in honor of the victory of Apollo over the Python, the victors were crowned with laurel. From success in literature, the usage was readily extended to success in arms, and hence the corona triumphalis, or triumphal crown, which was worn upon the head of a military commander when he received a triumph for a victory over the enemy, was made of laurel.

Such were the uses to which the laurel was appropriated in the ancient world. Of the facts there is no question; but the reason for the adoption of the plant as the symbolic tree of Apollo is lost or unknown. Here we are left to conjecture only.

Muller, in his "History of the Dorians," when discussing this subject, says: "Perhaps it was merely the appearance of the evergreen tree, with its slender form and glittering leaves, that made it a symbol of Apollo. The laurel will bear a tolerably severe winter, and, therefore, flourished in the north of Greece, while the olive, the tree of Minerva, belongs to more southern regions. But be this as it may, the situation of Tempe, where this shrub still grows with great luxuriance, certainly added much to the sanctity of the symbol, and for this reason the amour of the god with Daphne is often placed on the banks of the Peneus. Indeed, Apollo was supposed to love all groves, particularly of fruit trees, laurels, wild olives, &c. The freshening coolness and holy silence of such places were thought to be proper preparations for entering the sanctuary."

The reasoning of the learned German is plausible, yet I am inclined to think that the symbolism of the laurel must, as in that of other sacred plants, have been dependent on some legend connected with the sacred rites of Apollo, but which, in the lapse of time, by the downfall of paganism, and the extinction of all its sacerdotal mysteries, has been lost, beyond the possibility of recovery. The fable of Daphne changed into a laurel is, as I have already intimated, most probably some invention subsequent to the pre-hellenic period. It does not meet the requirements of a philosophic myth. But we may, perchance, approximate to the true intent and signification of the symbolism by a reference to the ancient primitive character of the god.

Apollo was, originally, before the post-Homeric corruptions of mythology, a sun-god. His ancient name of Phœbus signified literally, in Greek, "the light of life." He was Helios, the sun, or, as Homer calls him, Lukegenes, "the light producer." Now, nothing is more evident than the fact that the ancient mythologists connected the rising and the setting of the sun—his disappearance during winter in the hyperborean regions, whence the earliest mythology was derived, and his re-appearance in the summer—with the ideas of life and death, with the apparent extinction of the soul and its subsequent resurrection or renovation. This was a very common symbolism, for a most pleasing instance of which I have only to refer to the myth of Adonis, whose violent death by that wintry animal, the wild boar, and whose subsequent resurrection, it is admitted, referred to the disappearance and the reappearance of the solar orb.

The laurel is an evergreen. Now, an evergreen plant is, in itself, by its persistent character, a symbol of immortality. And therefore the laurel, always green and unfading, was a symbol of the eternal duration of time measured by the sun, and was on that account dedicated to Apollo, the sun-god. And as the sun was, among the ancients, by its constant revolutions, a symbol of renovation and restoration—of life and death and life again—may not the laurel, through the connecting ideas of some legend now passed away, have been also, like the sun to which it was consecrated, a symbol of renovation and resurrection? We would thus connect it with the acacia, the erica, and other sacred plants, of whose symbolism in this respect we have no reason to doubt.

And if this be so, may it not be possible (but this is offered only as a conjecture) that the character which the laurel has obtained, as a plant symbolic of military triumph, is to be deduced from the fact that it is a symbol of the triumph of immortality over death. That this is not an impossible hypothesis, we will see when we come to speak of the palm, where a similar symbolic idea admittedly prevails.

Thoughts on the Selection of a Masonic Library.

BY ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D.

Within a few weeks past, I have received the prospectus of a Masonic association lately founded at Bombay, in the East Indies, the object being to establish "a Masonic library fully complete and accessible to all Masons, under certain rules," and I have been requested to give my views as to the best selection of books that could be made. Institutions of this kind are of very recent introduction in England or America. Our French and German brethren, especially the latter, have been far ahead of us in both the authorship of Masonic books and in their accumulation on the shelves of a lodge or grand lodge library.

But even in the countries referred to, notwithstanding the pre-eminent stand that they have taken in the cultivation of Freemasonry as a science, little more than a century ago the field of Masonic literature was deplorably barren. And therefore the establishment of a Masonic press all over the world, the increase in the number and variety of Masonic books published, and the collection of them into libraries, either the private property of studious Masons or for the benefit of lodges, is a pregnant evidence of the fact that Freemasonry has taken an elevated position in literature—that it has emerged from that almost illiterate condition in which the disruption of its speculative from its wholly operative elements had left it, and that its principles, its history, its organization, have become matters of study and research in which men of learning and of scientific attainments have ardently and successfully engaged.

If we look at the state of Masonry in the very beginning of the eighteenth century, that is, in the year 1717, when the four old lodges of London united to reorganize the Grand Lodge of England, we shall find nothing in its literary aspect that will be gratifying. The Order had very shortly before emerged from its operative character, and its disciples had as yet furnished no books to be read. There was indeed, at that time, a singular opposition to Masonic publications, arising from a fear, to use the language of a contemporary, "of over-scrupulous brethren that committing to print anything relating to Masonry would be injurious to the interests of the Craft." Accordingly, up to that date, the science of Freemasonry was without a single legitimate explanation of its history and design. There were, it is true, a few ephemeral attacks upon its character and spurious expositions of its ceremonies. Such was the pamphlet published at London, in 1676, by one Dilly, entitled "A short analysis of the unchanged rites and ceremonies of the Freemasons," which, although reprinted by Boileau in 1808, in his "Annales Maconniques," is now and has long been deservedly out of print. Ten years later, Dr. Plott published a scurrilous account of the Freemasons in his "Natural History of Staffordshire," which, if it has done no harm, has, on the other hand, supplied authentic evidence of the prosperous condition of the society in England in the year 1686.

But the first work of any importance in behalf of the Order was Dr. Anderson's "Constitutions of the Freemasons," published in 1723. The present value of this book is that it contains the "Old Charges" and the "General Regulations" which were at that time in force, and which may be considered as constituting the organic law of Masonry. Since his day they have been a thousand times republished, but it is to Anderson we are indebted for their preservation. The body of the work, which contains what Dr. Desaguliers is pleased to call "a just and exact account of Masonry from the beginning of the world," is not worthy of consideration. The book must, however, always (either in the edition of 1723, when it can be obtained, for it is excessively rare, or in one of its reprints) claim, from its relations to the reorganization of the Order, a place in every Masonic library.

Seven years after, Dr. Anderson wrote a much better book, his "Defense of Masonry," in reply to Pritchard's abusive work called "Masonry Dissected." In this book we find the first germs of that system of symbolism which connected Freemasonry with the ancient initiations, and which has since been so fully and so beautifully developed by Dr. Oliver. The "Defense of Masonry" was indeed in advance of the age; for, although Martin Clare, Dunckerley, and several others, subsequently wrote and delivered Masonic essays, lectures, and addresses, these were all rather didactic than historical—rather referred to the moral design of the Institution than to its symbolical character. Yet Anderson's little tract, for it only occupies ten quarto pages, has been read by few in our times. It deserves a better fate, for there are in it many suggestive thoughts.

Forty-four years elapsed, and no work of any value on the true symbolic character of Freemasonry had appeared; for I can not agree with Oliver in assigning anything better than a didactic character to Calcott's "Candid Disquisition." But then Hutchinson, in his really great work, entitled the "Spirit of Masonry," found, for the first time, the true idea of Masonic symbolism. In this he has connected the Masonry of modern times with the ancient initiations, and elevated it to the character of a science. If we except the little tractate of Anderson, already alluded to, Hutchinson's book may be said to be the first profoundly written work on Masonry that had issued from the English press. But a long time afterwards elapsed before any similar work appeared, yet I think there can be no doubt that the influence of Hutchinson's views was deeply felt, so that the tone of subsequent Masonic writings was greatly elevated. Masonry as a symbolic science was more closely studied, and the germ thus planted in 1774 was at length developed into full fruition by Dr. Oliver, who has done more to elevate the science of Freemasonry than any other writer in our language. His researches have placed it in such a light that no one hereafter can call himself a Masonic scholar unless he has studied the science in all its relations to ancient symbolism and the ancient rites of initiation. If Oliver had written nothing else but his "History of Initiation," he would have written enough to immortalize himself as the greatest of Masonic philosophers.

In America, where the Institution was planted at an early period, no valuable work appeared until the beginning of the nineteenth century. In the year 1801 Dr. Harris published his "Discourses," which, although generally merely didactic in character, contain a few scintillations of a higher order of Masonic thought, and are especially enriched with a learned "Dissertation on the Tessera Hospitalis," which may be deemed the first contribution towards the study of the Mark Master's degree. This work of Harris was followed, longo intervallo, by Town's "Speculative Masonry," a work which was much in advance of the time, and might still be read with pleasure and profit. Knapp gave soon after his essay on the Disciplina Arcani, or the Secret Discipline of the Primitive Church, which was an interesting adjunct to Masonic history. But for many years afterwards, the Fraternity in America was without either new authors or new books. At present the Masonic literature of the United States is taking a high position, and several very valuable works have issued from the American Masonic press.

In France, the Chevalier Ramsay was the earliest Masonic writer of any importance. He is famous for his connection with the high degrees, which owe much to his learning. His "Relation apologique et historique de la Societe des Francs-Macons" was published in 1739. It had the honor to be burnt by the Inquisition—some evidence, at least, of its value. The French Masons soon learned to look at the Order in its true relations to antiquity, and such men as Rhigellini, Thory, Ragon, Clavel, and many others, have added invaluable materials to the literature of Freemasonry as a symbolic science.

But, after all, it is the Germans who have been the great Masonic writers of the last and the present century. They have brought to their treatment of Masonry all that profundity and exhaustive research which has always distinguished the Teutonic mind. In mentioning the names of Nicolai, Starck, Kloss, and Lenning, not a tithe of the great students of Masonic lore are alluded to. But while the French have directed their attention to the science and philosophy of the Order, the Germans have been principally occupied in investigations into its history and archæology. So extensive have been the labors of the Germans in the Masonic field of literature, that a most copious library might be formed from their productions alone.

This brief sketch of the progress of Masonic literature, and of its present condition, may serve as an appropriate introduction to an inquiry as to what ought to be the materials of a Masonic library.

It will be evident, from what has just been said, that the circle of Masonic reading is now very much more elevated and extended than it was a century and a half ago. A Masonic student now who desires to become a Masonic scholar, can not confine himself to the mere ritual of the Order. He must make himself acquainted with its relations to similar or analogous institutions in the ancient world. He must trace its connection with these institutions, or, at least, its relations to them. The "Spurious Freemasonry" of antiquity, as Dr. Oliver calls the ancient initiations, must be thoroughly investigated, and he must follow up the idea that was common to them and to the Freemasonry of the present time. Here is a large and an interesting field to be explored. The ancient mysteries, the sacred rites of Samothrace, of Eleusis, of Egypt, become legitimate subjects of study for the inquiring Mason, because in all of these institutions he will find something cognate to his own; he will find one idea pervading them all—the search after divine truth—and he will discover that this truth consists in the knowledge of the true God and of the immortality of the soul. He will find that these truths are taught, in a very analogous method, in all of them, namely, by symbols and by scenic representations. These, therefore, the ancient systems of initiation, are called kindred institutions of Freemasonry, and as the study of their history and organization is essential to a correct knowledge of the history and the organization of Freemasonry, all books which treat on the ancient mysteries and on the religion of antiquity will be legitimate elements of a Masonic library.

Hence a Masonic library is hardly complete without such books as these: Banier's or some other System of Mythology; Potter's Archæology; Oliver's History of Initiation (an indispensable work); Oliver's Antiquities of Freemasonry; Ramsay, on the Theology of the Pagans; Duncan's Religions of Profane Antiquity; Warburton's Divine Legation; Faber's Origin of Pagan Idolatry; Bryant's Analysis of Pagan Mythology; Faber's Mysteries of the Cabiri; Dollinger's Jew and Gentile, a recent treatise; and other works of a similar character.

The Germans have also written copiously and profoundly; so have the French, and there are some valuable treatises in the Latin language. To those who fortunately can read them, all such works are of invaluable assistance in tracing the connection between the initiations of Freemasonry and the mythological rites of the ancients. They should, therefore, always have a place in a Masonic library. Such works, for instance, as Meiner's "Essay on the History of the Religion of the most Ancient Peoples," in German; Sainte Croix's "Researches into the Mysteries of Paganism," in French; and the "Aglaophamus" of Lobeck, in Latin, are invaluable.

The analogies between the ceremonies of the ancient religious sects, not Greek or Roman, and the Freemasons, in the spirit of their design and the character of their organization, also demand the attention of the Masonic student. Hence, works on the Scandinavian religion, on the Druids, the Pythagoreans, the Essenes, the Therapeutæ, &c., are necessary adjuncts to a Masonic library.

The history of the Jewish nation, and the peculiar ceremonies of the Jewish religion, are intimately connected with Freemasonry; hence Josephus, Maimonides, Prideaux, and others of that character, are authors whose works may be advantageously consulted by the Masonic student.

Freemasonry derives much of its esoteric learning from the Jewish Cabala. The investigator of the higher degrees will find himself embarrassed in his researches unless he has, on many occasions, the invaluable assistance of the Cabalistic writers. Hence no Masonic library without one or more works on the Cabala upon its shelves, is complete.

Unfortunately, the mere English reader can have but little access to works on this abstruse science. The books "Jezirah" and "Zohar" have been published with Latin and German versions, and the "Cabala Denudata" of Rosenroth is valuable, but rare. Cornelius Agrippa's "Occult Philosophy" has been translated, and will give much curious information.

The history of the numerous secret societies of mediæval and modern Europe and Asia should be carefully studied by the Masonic scholar, because they throw much light on the history of his own institution, to which most of them are very analogous. Hence a Masonic library should always contain the best works on the Druses, the Rosicrucians, the Free Judges of Germany, the Bridge Builders, the Carbonari, and similar associations which have given tone to or received it from the Masonic Order.

But the science of symbolism is perhaps the most attractive subject to the Masonic scholar. In fact, Masonry is, in one sense, a science of symbolism. Without some knowledge, and that more than superficial, of the principles of symbolism, it is impossible properly to appreciate Freemasonry as anything more than a social organization. Fortunately, there is no lack of works on this subject, especially in French and German; in English, too, the catalogue, although not copious, is respectable. Every Masonic library should, therefore, be supplied with such works as these: Dudley's "Naology," Wemyss's "Clavis Symbolica," Portal's "Symbols of the Egyptians," and his "Symbolism of Colors," Oliver's "Signs and Symbols," and Count de Gebelin's "Monde Primitif."

In the class of biography, much instruction will be derived from the perusal of the lives of those illustrious men who, although they may not have been Freemasons in the modern sense of the word, were certainly possessed of Masonic minds, and gave, in remote times, an impetus to the establishment either of this or some analogous order. Thus every Mason must be interested in the records of the thoughts and deeds of such men as Pythagoras, Appollonius of Tyana, Roger Bacon, Cornelius Agrippa, Valentine Andreas, Zinzendorf, and Swedenborg. Of course the lives of those who were, in the strictest sense of the word, Freemasons, must claim peculiar attention. Such men were Elias Ashmole, Sir Christopher Wren, Inigo Jones, Anderson, Desaguiliers, the Chevalier Ramsay, and last, that great Masonic charlatan, Cagliostro, or, as he was really named, Joseph Balsamo.

In what has already been written, reference has been made to what are very properly called the kindred sciences of Freemasonry. But besides these the Order has a literature peculiarly its own, which of course must not be neglected.

Manuals and monitors of the degrees, such as those of Webb, Cross, Tannehill, and a dozen others in America, with a still greater number of the same character and design in Germany and France, are to be considered as the primers of Masonic science, and, although they have a legitimate claim to a place in a Masonic library, they are but seldom referred to by the Mason who has advanced in his studies. Their character has, however, within a few years, been considerably elevated. Next to these come treatises on the various rites into which, in different ages and countries, the Order has been divided. Such works as Guillemain's "Collection of Adoniramite Masonry," Chereau's "Philosophic Cross of the Knights of Rose Croix," Firmin Abraham's "Tiler," Ragon's "Masonic Orthodoxy," and his "Course of Initiation," and Oliver's "Historical Landmarks," and all others that treat of the different Masonic rites and degrees, are necessary portions of every complete Masonic library. The last mentioned work is a library in itself. It is the most learned and the most useful of all the lamented Oliver's writings.

The history of Masonry, from its origin to the present day, has been ably written by a great number of authors. Among these may be mentioned Preston's "Illustrations," Oliver's "Antiquities of Masonry," Thory's "Acta Latomorum," Krause's "Three Oldest Documents of the Masonic Fraternity," and Lawrie's "History of Freemasonry." All books of this character, and the number is not small, are of advantage to the student in making his researches into the progress of our Institution.

Freemasonry is scantily supplied with lexicons. The first of which I have any knowledge is a "Vocabulaire des Francs-Macons," printed at Paris in 1805. It was by Bazot, and in 1810 was translated into Italian and published at Leghorn. It is a very meagre production. Gadicke's "Freimaurer-Lexicon," published at Berlin in 1818, is a much better work, although it also is unsatisfactory. Lenning's "Encyclopadie der Freimaurerei," which was issued from the Leipsic press, in three volumes, is an able work, full of information and really indispensable to the Masonic student. The first Masonic lexicon ever written in the English language is that of Mackey, which was published in 1845, and has been much augmented in subsequent editions. This was followed by Oliver's "Dictionary of Symbolical Masonry," which was published in London in 1853, and has very recently been reprinted by Macoy with some additions. Such works, of course, are necessary in every Masonic library, because they afford the student an easy method of reference to any subject that he may be investigating.

Lastly, the periodical literature of Masonry will furnish a rich field for him who is making up a Masonic library. In nothing has the literary character of the Order been more elevated than in the magazines that it has given to the world. Twenty-five years ago, there was not in this country a Masonic journal that was worth reading or that gave the slightest information on Masonic science. The character of Masonic journalism was first elevated by Moore's magazine, published at Boston, which was the earliest work of the kind that treated Masonry as anything more than a charitable and social club. The periodical press of Masonry is now doing much good, and a large selection might be made for a library from the magazines and journals issued in this country, in England, in France, and in Germany.

Before concluding, allusion must be made to one class of books which must always constitute an unpleasant part of a Mason's library. These are the works antagonistic to Freemasonry, those that are commonly called "anti-Masonic books.' Such are Barruel's "Memoirs of Jacobinism," Robison's "Proofs of a Conspiracy," Stone's "Letters on Freemasonry," and all other works of a similar vituperative character. They are not pleasant to read, but they are useful to have, because it is right and expedient that we should know what our enemies say of us. In a well selected Masonic library, they are like the skeleton in the Egyptian feasts; mixed in with a thousand works the sources of constant enjoyment, they are to remind us that our Institution is but mortal, and so subject to calumny and abuse.

In writing this article, I have sought to give only the general heads of those subjects whose investigation is essentially necessary to the thorough study of Freemasonry, and of the way in which it has been developed from a mere operative art to its present elevated position as a science of symbolism, and from an association of builders to a speculative philosophy. I have not dared to attempt to give a catalogue of even the most essential works that are required in a Masonic library. The task would be impossible to be accomplished in anything short of a cumbrous treatise. Dr. Kloss has given a bibliography, which was published in the year 1846, and which contains the names and titles of more than five thousand books.

Grand Master Peck's Decisions--Iowa, 1866-67.

Q.—What shall be done with Masons made in army lodges who may petition for membership?

A.—They are innocent of wrong, and not responsible for any irregularity in the way of their making. If they are "good men and true," I should advise proceeding as prescribed in Grand Lodge by-laws for all regular applications.

Q.—A minister within the jurisdiction of our lodge wishes to petition a neighboring lodge for initiation, for the reason that he can there receive the degrees gratis, whereas our by-laws compel us to treat all alike, regardless of their profession. Can consent be granted by a majority vote, or should it be unanimous?

A.—It should be unanimous; and if the ministerial applicant is worthy to be made a Mason, there should be no difficulty in obtaining it. If his status is such that he could not obtain a clear ballot in your own lodge, he should not be permitted by a mere majority vote to petition a lodge where he may not be so well known, and where on that account he might receive an election, and thus an unworthy member, and one distasteful to some one or more of the lodge in whose jurisdiction he resides, be thrust upon the Fraternity.

Q.—During the conferment of any degree, has a brother the right to insist upon his admittance to the lodge, thereby interrupting the work and causing material inconvenience to the members present? Has not the W. M. the power to discriminate at what stage of the ceremonies he may come in?

A.—In the government of the lodge the W. M. is supreme authority, and has unquestionable right to not only discriminate, but to dictate, as to the time when brothers shall be permitted to enter the lodge while at labor. The Tyler's door should never be opened without his permission, or that of one he may delegate to act in his stead. If brothers are not present at opening of the lodge, they must submit to the W. M.'s will and pleasure, and should not expect to be admitted only at certain points in the ceremonies of conferring degrees. A brother who has the interests of his lodge and the Fraternity at heart, could not but see the manifest impropriety of allowing the attention of the candidate and of the brethren to be diverted while the solemn ceremonies of the Order are being gone through with. The W. M. of any lodge will be sustained in vindicating his authority in this respect.

Q.—If an E. A. or F. C., upon trial, is found guilty of unmasonic conduct, but not of a sufficiently heinous character to warrant either a suspension or expulsion, how long before he should be permitted to advance?

A.—There is no prescribed time for him to remain "on probation," but he will have to remain in that state until the members of the lodge indicate, by a unanimous ballot, that they are satisfied he is sincere in his professions of reformation, and that they believe him worthy to become a brother among them and share equal privileges.

Q.—A candidate is balloted for and rejected, and so declared by the W. M. After the lodge closes, it is ascertained that a non-affiliate had been balloting, and further that said non-affiliate is unfriendly to the candidate. As there was but one black ball cast, it is supposed that it was by him. Can the ballot be declared null and void and a new ballot ordered at the next stated meeting?

A.—No; but I consider that the circumstances warrant the granting of a dispensation for a new ballot, if desired, without waiting the prescribed time.

Q.—Some six months ago, A. B. applied for initiation, and after the usual course was elected. After election and before inittation, he learned that C. D. was a member of our lodge, and as he was unfriendly with him, he (A. B.) said he did not wish to join any Society of which C. D. was a member. There was nothing done for some months, and in the meantime A. B. openly expressed himself an atheist. About this time A. B. and C. D. became fully reconciled, and A. B. now claims his initiation. We were ready to initiate him at one time and he declined, now he is ready and I decline until I hear from you. What shall we do?

A.—A. B. has no special claims upon the lodge simply because he at one time has been elected to receive the first degree. An objection to his initiation is just as valid up to the time of his being placed in due form, as though expressed in the way of a black ball at the time of balloting, and should be so regarded by the W. M. If he has openly expressed himself an atheist, the idea of initiating him should not be entertained for a moment, for, "agreeable to our Masonic institutes, no atheist can be made a Mason," and as soon as he has crossed the threshold of the preparation room he will be compelled to profess his belief in Deity or permitted to retire.

Q.—If a committee report unfavorably on a petition for initiation, can the W. M. refuse to let it go to a ballot on the ground that an unfavorable report rejects a petition?

A.—After the petition goes to the committee it is the property of the lodge, and the ballot must be spread, even though the report be unfavorable.

Q.—If a petition from a person not a resident within the jurisdiction of the lodge has been received and referred to a committee, can the lodge dispose of it without a ballot, and if so, how?

A.—The committee should report the facts in the case, and for want of jurisdiction the petition should be returned.

Q.—If a petition which was not within their jurisdiction, is acted upon by a lodge and duly rejected, can it afterwards be received in the lodge that has the jurisdiction, without the consent of the lodge that has rejected him?

A.—As the lodge has no right to receive the petition, therefore that lodge has no permission to grant to the lodge within whose jurisdiction the petitioner resides. They can receive his petition and act upon it regardless of the previous rejection. But if they are aware of it, it becomes them to ascertain the cause, that no unworthy material may gain admission.

Q.—Can the Secretary and Tyler, after election and installation, refuse to serve, and absent themselves from the lodge, because dissatisfied with the action of the lodge or some of its members? If so, how can the vacancy be filled and who will receive the remuneration?

A.—Attendance upon lodge meetings is not obligatory except in case of summons. For good and sufficient reasons a W. M. can arrest the jewel of a subordinate officer and appoint some brother to fill the office either permanently or from night to night. The officer removed could not expect to receive the fees attached to the office, but they would go to the one discharging its duties.

Q.—Are the decisions of the Grand Master imperative as law?

A.—They are, unless revoked by the Grand Lodge.

Q.—Has the Tyler any right to be within the lodge while at labor?

A.—The Tyler receives fees for performing certain duties, and by accepting the office signifies his willingness to discharge them. How can he "keep of all cowans and eavesdroppers" and at the same time be within the lodge? At all times when the lodge is open, he should be at his post "without the door, armed with the proper instrument of his office," and the door closed.

Q.—A Mason petitions to a lodge for membership, and is black-balled. Should the lodge return him his demit, or is it the property of the lodge?

A.—The demit is the applicant's personal property, and is only deposited for a specific purpose. When the lodge has declined granting him membership, the demit should be returned to him.

Q.—Does this brother stand from henceforth on the same platform as a non-affiliated Mason? i. e. is he debarred in any way from the rights and privileges, further than his membershp in that particular lodge?

A.—The brother does not henceforth occupy the same position as a non-affiliated Mason. The latter is not permitted to visit a lodge but a specified number of times, in this jurisdiction, before petitioning for membership. This brother has discharged his duty in the premises, and the right of membership has been denied, but this should not exclude him from all the rights and privileges of the Order. The right of visitation, even, should not be refused him, without personal objections are made; i. e. the right should not be denied him by the W. M., under the regulation applying to non-affiliates, if no brother has personal objections to sitting in lodge with him.

Q.—Are not non-affiliates subject to watch-care over a sick brother, as much as regular members in the same jurisdiction?

A.—Non-affiliates who voluntarily place themslves in that position, and remain so, according to the Grand Lodge regulations, are not entitled to the benefits of the Order; they are to be "excluded from Masonic processions and deprived of the right of a Masonic burial," and withal, have no claim upon the fraternity for personal attention in times of sickness. They can find their compensation in our having no claim upon them for dues, or for "watch-care" with the sick of the Order.

Q.—Has a lodge the right to levy extraordinary dues to defray the current expenses.

A.—Yes.

Q.—Is a Master Mason justified in black-balling an E. A. for an offense that is not sufficient to prefer charges against him. And if a Master Mason does not think him worthy of advancement, can he black-ball him?

A.—A Master Mason is justifiable in black-balling a petitioner for advancement, if he believes him not to be worthy and well qualified, even though there is not sufficient ground for preferring charges against him. It is not unusual for a man to become an E. A., and afterwards be found unworthy of higher honors, even though there may be nothing about his character upon which charges can be founded. An applicant for advancement has no claim upon the lodge for them beyond what is guaranteed by his moral and mental fitness to receive them.

Q.—About five years ago I made application for admission into the Masonic Order, and was duly accepted. Before the time for my initiation arrived, the regiment to which I was attached was ordered down South, and through no fault of mine, I was debarred from becoming a member at that time. Having the misfortune, "while in defense of my country and in the line of duty," to lose my left arm, I was discharged and returned home. I supposed without any doubt that I would be admitted into the Order on my former acceptance, but on application was rejected. Now I wish to ascertain your views on the subject. If, because I enlisted to fight for the liberty of my country and the glorious stars and stripes and the preservation of the Union, and being disabled in my country's cause, I am to lose my long-cherished desire of becoming a member of the Order, I think it hard that after having sacrificed property and risked my life in such a cause, that I should be debarred that privilege. I am in good circumstances, having a good farm, and in no danger, "with industry and fair luck," of ever coming to want.

A.—Your case is only one of many similar instances, in which a long-cherished desire of becoming a member of the Masonic order has been frustrated by, and on account of, injuries received while in our country's service. Were I to follow my own inclinations, and permit my sympathies to dictate as to the course to be pursued in such cases, I should order all lodges in this jurisdiction not to debar applicants on that account, but to consider injuries received in so noble a cause as an additional recommendation. But "the ancient landmarks of the order intrusted to our care we are carefully to preserve, and never suffer them to be infringed," whatever may be our sympathies, desires or inclinations; and no one of these is more prominently considered and enjoined, than that of the physical conformation of the candidate. As far back as the year 926, we have the following: "A candidate must be without blemish, and have the full and proper use of his limbs." Again, in 1663: "No person hereafter shall be accepted a Freemason but such as are of able body." And still again, in 1772: "He must be hale and sound, not deformed or dismembered, at the time of his making." I might, if necessary, continue quotations of this nature, and all equally strong, which have been affirmed and re-affirmed by the action of most of the Grand Lodges and the decisions of their several Grand Masters, but think it unnecessary, and presume those already given are sufficient to enable you to realize that we can not follow our own inclinations in the matter, and to convince you that the Worshipful Master and lodge, in refusing you initiation, are only acting in conformity with ancient regulations, and from which they can not countenance a deviation without violating sacred obligations.

Q.—A. B. petitions for membership on a demit. A committee is appointed and the same evening make out their report and hand it to the Secretary to be read at the next regular meeting. C. D. objects to the time of making out report and claims they can not do it legally until the next regular meeting. Is C. D. correct?

A.—No. It is not improper or illegal for the committee to make out their report, either "favorable" or "unfavorable," the same evening of their appointment, and hand it to the Secretary to be read at the next regular meeting, if their acquaintance with the petitioner is such as to justify it and render no further delay or inquiry necessary.

Q.—Can lodges under dispensation recommend petitions for new lodges?

A.—No. The recommendation must come from the nearest chartered lodge.

Q.—What is the age of a person at "dotage?" We have a petition before us, and the age of the applicant is stated at 65 years. What shall we do?

A.—No precise age can be named when "an old man" can be said to be "in dotage." The object of the restriction undoubtedly is, to guard against the admission of any who may have arrived at the age when, from impotence of body as well as of mind, they may be unable to have a proper comprehension and appreciation of our rites and mysteries. This condition would be apparent much earlier in some mental constitutions than in others. It remains for the lodge to determine for itself, from their acquaintance with the applicant, whether he comes within the limits of the objection based upon his dotage. The petitioner in question may be farther from his dotage at 65 years, than many others would be at a much less age, and I should hold that if he is in possession of his healthy mental faculties, his age alone should constitute no disqualification.

Masonry.

We have some narrow-minded bigots, who are "living at a poor dying rate," old antiquarian fossils who can see nothing good or noble unless it meets the approbation of their own dark and benighted understandings. They have heard enough of Masonry to know that it stands upon a broad, liberal foundation.

They condemn Masonry because our lodges are open to all grades of religious faiths, every shade of politics, every form of national government, and seeks the good of all classes. The first and only test of fellowship, is a sincere belief in the existence of the great Architect of the Universe. When the neophite knocks at the door of the Masonic lodge, acknowledging his unfaltering trust in God, Masonry pronounces that confidence well founded. And well it may. Because if the seeker of Masonic light comes with this as one of the principal qualifications, the foundation thus begun, is safely laid, we can proceed to build thereon.

How pleasant it is to see brethren come from the four quarters of the globe to sit and dwell together in unity. The Turk, the Jew, and Christian, although they may look at many things in the universe of God from their individual stand-points differently, yet the same great light in Masonry teaches them the same duties to a brother all over the globe. They can join hands and hearts, and bow before the same divine Ruler, contemplate His sacred goodness, infinite wisdom, and supreme power. In this one test, all can heartily agree in the grand principle of universal good will, love, and practice that pure religion of visiting the widow, the orphan, and strive to keep unspotted from the world. We all know that since Masonry inculcates such ennobling precepts, that its members can not materially err, when they truly recognize and venerate the Deity in whose kind hands are the issues of life and death. Notwithstanding we may differ on many minor points of religion, politics, and government, yet we find that it is not essential to intrude them upon each other, in order to keep in the unity of the spirit of our ancient and venerable Order.

Every Mason learns by observing the wranglings of sects and parties, and the strifes of nations, that it would destroy the peace and harmony of a lodge to introduce the shades of difference of the doctrine of redemption, in which all Protestants could not say, so mote it be. The Turk could not unite with us in presenting our views of a religious life, any more than we could, if he should introduce the name of Ma homet. And in doing so, both Jew and Christian would seriously object. With such a practice, we would most effectually break up the feeling of brotherly love, and defeat the universality of Masonry. We know no other name but brother, and we choose to let all the turmoils of party and sect alone, and continue to meet upon a level, walk by the plumb, and part upon the square.

This being our purpose, aim, and design, in perpetuating this union and love for the brotherhood the world over, should we be stamped as Deists or Mohamedans? By no means, when we part upon the square, and resolve to keep the symbol of these inestimable jewels in our minds. At the closing of our lodge, the Jew retires to his synagogue to revive his spiritual strength in honor and reverence to God; the Turk, with equal zeal, to his mosque, to comply with the teachings of his form of religious system; and the Christian to his temple, which has been dedicated to the Father of all spirits, deeply impressed with the many Christian duties resting upon him. Thus it is, Masonry finds the neophites of earth, and thus she molests not their mode and manner of worship.

Freemasonry stands not on the corners of the streets to be seen of men. She does not compass sea and land to obtain proselytes; whoever seeks her fellowship must come of his own free will and accord. No invitations must be extended to him to govern or bias his mind to knock at her door. All unworthy motives and desires must be far removed from him by the members of the Craft. She annihilates every party consideration. By her conciliating manners, she reconciles all private opinions. By her truly catholic spirit, she bows every knee to God, and causes every tongue to confess feelingly, and reverently acknowledge His superintending providence over all; and realize in spirit that, by the Almighty Father, all are one blood, and should be governed by one divine spirit of our calling. All unite in heart, soul, and mind to the promotion of every thing good and virtuous.—Mystic Star.

Anecdote of Webster.—Many an old farmer of Blandford, says the Springfield Republican, tells a little reminiscence of Daniel Webster, that has never before found its way into print. While on a fishing excursion among the hills, the great expounder came to the village one day when the people were gathered for some public occasion and entered the tavern, where were assembled between thirty and forty of the men of the community. To each one he was presented by name, and in those anti-constabulary times invited all to drink with him, which they did. After half an hour's general conversation, in which all took part with perfect good will, the great man in leaving passed around the whole company, shook each by the hand, and without stammer or hesitancy called each by his name, thus binding them all by the delicate compliment to the life-long allegiance, at the same time performing a feat of memory almost without parallel.

The Past and the Present.

We give below an extract of a personal note, received from our old friend and brother, Frederick Follett, Esq., whom some of our older brethren will recollect as one of the principle witnesses in a suit brought by the anti-Masonic managers, and in which we were a party, in 1833 or 1834, the result of which was the termination, in Massachusetts, at least, of that wicked and causeless conspiracy, to overthrow our constitution and brand its members with ineffaceable disgrace. The writer of the letter was, at the time referred to, the editor of a newspaper published at Batavia, N. Y., which place, it will be recollected, was the home and hot-bed of anti-Masonry. He fought the battle for Masonry nobly and ably, and with us has lived to receive his reward in the unparalleled prosperity and elevated character of the Constitution.—Freemason's Magazine.

New York, June 25, 1867.

Charles W. Moore, Esq.:

My Dear Sir and Bro.—I have just been reading the proceedings of the dedication of the new Masonic temple in your goodly city of Boston. The attendant proceedings and ceremonies, so far as they have been permitted to meet the public eye, have thrilled every heart with pleasure and sincere delight.

There was a time, and you and I can remember it well, when the Masonic Institution was under a cloud; not from any fault of the Institution itself, but from the indiscretion and folly of some, and from the baseness and hypocrisy of others, of its members. Added to this was the fact that the disappearance of Morgan on the 10th of September, 1826, was made the pretext of most unjustly charging upon the Institution the folly, if not the turpitude of his abduction, by a few members of the Order! Is Christianity to be held accountable for the many crimes and enormities committed beneath the cloak that mantles it? God forbid it, as I know he does. Neither will the Masonic Institution be held accountable for the commission of an act to which it was not a party. But it was seized upon as a hobby by demagogues to foist themselves into political power and place! To accomplish these ends it became necessary to denounce and persecute the entire Masonic Fraternity!

In some portions of the country they succeeded but too well, and the torch of persecution burnt upon every hill-top, and lighted up every valley! Society was rent asunder. God's sanctuary was prostituted by those who professed to be His ministers, as a channel through which to denounce and persecute unoffending members; and for the non-acceptance of their precepts excommunicated from the church! The names of Masons were withdrawn from the jury-box, and they were pronounced by these fanatics as unworthy to hold any office or position of trust or profit.

Just forty years ago, on the day of your recent celebration, the Masons of Batavia, in the western part of this State, held a celebration. It was the year after the outbreak of what has been denominated "Anti-Masonry," or the "Anti-Masonic Excitement." Something like four hundred Masons assembled in that quiet, rural village to celebrate the day, it being the nativity of John the Baptist. That quiet town was by no means quiet on that occasion. Secretly, and without any premonition whatever, the rising sun witnessed the outpouring of many of the inhabitants of the surrounding country, and the influx into that quiet village of at least six thousand of those turbulent sons called "Anti-Masons!" They came singly, in pairs, and in companies, armed with guns, bludgeons, and butcher-knives, the latter evidently manufactured for the occasion, and eighteen to twenty inches in length! But the Masons assembled on that occasion, unconscious of having done anything to forfeit their right peacefully to assemble and celebrate a day long held in sacred remembrance by them, proceeded in an orderly manner to the accomplishment of their purpose. Myself and Colonel Johnson Goodwill, whom you may remember as one of the two gentlemen who accompanied me on a certain occasion to the city of Boston, to unmask a certain Pharisaical hypocrite by the name of Samuel D. Green, were the marshals of the day. Though many years have since elapsed, the scenes of wild tumult and fury enacted on that day are still fresh in my memory. Stones and brickbats flew around my head in thick profusion and uncomfortable proximity! With wild yells and indecent imprecations, many attempts were made to break up the procession as it proceeded to its place of destination. The arms and knives were exhibited in a threatening manner! but all to no purpose. The Masons pursued the even tenor of their way; and though reviled and subjected to all manner of insults, they bore it patiently, and accomplished the purpose of their meeting, and without serious accident.

But with the lapse of forty years what a change has taken place! Masonry at the present day occupies a more exalted position in the estimation of the world than ever before. The fiery furnace through which it has passed has purified and ennobled it. It is no longer a reproach to be a Mason, but an honor. Those who once traduced it, now honor and respect it.

Miscellaneous Reading.

The Dungeons and Tortures of Enlightened Europe.

A correspondent of the Boston Journal thus writes from Nuremberg, Bavaria:

Come with me, to this old town, enter some of these edifices and look upon the administration of government as it was in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. We enter one of the towers of the castle, descend five steps, and find ourselves in a museum, where are preserved the books of record, giving us a history of the past, and not only books, but implements and instruments which show more clearly than written words the administration of those days, with which the United States Government is now compared. Here is a post four feet high in the center of the room, with two curious fixtures at the top resembling gun-locks.

What is this? The little girl who acts as our usher raises the hammers, which come up with a click. She touches a spring and down they go, with a snap that startles you—forced down by strong springs with a whack that would have mashed your fingers to a jelly had they been under the hammer. This is a finger-crusher, a delicate little instrument used to extort confessions from reluctant witnesses or suspected criminals. Here are bracelets for the wrists, not of gold or silver, but of iron, and the parts which touch the wrist are set with needles. Put them on your arms and turn a screw, and they close upon the flesh, the needles piercing through cords, tendons, flesh, and bones. It is one degree more excruciating than crushing the fingers.

Here is a head-dress—a crown which has been worn by many men and women. It has sharp knives which cut through the scalp to the skull. Here are chains and weights, locks and keys, handcuffs and clasps for the ankles, stocks for the feet, weights to hold your feet to the floor, and pulleys to draw your head at the same time to the ceiling. Here is a bench of solid oak with a corrugated surface, upon which many men have been laid, held down by cords, to undergo the kneading process, and that rolling pin, knotty and knobby, also of oak, which lies upon the table, has been rolled backward and forward over the naked forms of men and women, kneading live flesh to bloody dough. Time and space would fail me were I to enumerate the instruments of torture here or to set forth their uses. We can only look at the cradle—a huge trough of oak on rockers—the bottom and sides thickly set with pins, in which many victims have been rocked to death. Think of lying on a bed of oaken pins, rolling to the right, to the left—always against pins—till the flesh becomes livid jelly?

Here is an instrument shaped like a pear. It is of iron, but to all appearances a harmless thing. But just take it for a moment into your mouth, and let me give a gentle pull at the string attached to the stem of the pear, and it will no longer be a pear, but a full blown lily—an iron lily—unfolding its leaves so suddenly and violently that your jaws are forced open till the joints crack in their sockets, while the delicate petals become pincers which grasp your tongue! No outcry now. No utterance of words. No screaming to raise the neighborhood. Moans and sighs only from the sufferer. One twitch of the string, and the tongue is torn out by the roots.

We must leave the museum without mentioning the hundreds of curiosities. We go into the court-yard and then we enter another door, descend a longer flight of steps, to dark, dismal dungeons, where no light ever falls except through narrow, iron-grated windows. Here are ladders, with windlasses and pulleys, on which victims were stretched till bones snapped, till joints leaped from their sockets, and cords and tendons were torn asunder. Here are racks and wheels, pillories and stocks, whips and manacles. This was the place of torture. We leave these and creep through a narrow passage, through doorway after doorway, and reach at last, far under ground, far beneath all sight or sound of the world, a darker dungeon. This is the room of the Iron Maiden. Here is the statue or image—a maiden with a hood upon her head, an iron ruffle around her neck, enveloped in an iron cloak. Suddenly the folds of the cloak are thrown apart; by the dim light of the candle you see that the lining of the garment is set with sharp spikes. Take one step forward and the folds inclose you. Iron spikes pierce your body and into your eyeballs—clear through the vertabræ they penetrate. Not a quick embrace, but slowly you are enfolded—one turn of the screw, just enough to penetrate the flesh, just enough to touch the apple of the eye; then, after an age of anguish, another turn, and a hundred spikes reach nearer to the nerves, and then, as heat, thirst, and fever rack the body, another gentle turn, and another age of torture, and then one more advance of the spikes to the vitals, till death comes on, and then the maiden, unfolding her arms, drops her victim through a trap-door, down—down—down into the unknown depths! We drop a pebble, and can hear the faint splash of water far beneath.

Here is a skull. Anatomists say it is the skull of a female. You may put your fingers into the holes where the spikes which entered the eyes came through. No name, no record. God only has the book of remembrance.

We think of this dungeon as connected with the barbarism of the middle ages; but we are not quite so far removed from those days of rigorous administration of law. Till Napoleon with the legions of France came across the Rhine, overthrowing all obstacles, this iron maiden held out her arms to receive offenders against the law. On the approach of the French army in 1803, the Virgin, as it was called, with other instruments of torture, were thrown into a court and dispatched in haste out of the town, but fell into the hands of the victorious army. Nor till then did the world known what sort of punishments were meted out to the offenders of the law.

We are to remember that Nuremberg was a free city. About thirty patrician families, for a long time, monopolized authority, and chose a Council of State consisting of eight persons, who formed the Executive. This Executive was an irresponsible body. The world knew nothing of their secret administration of affairs. Men disappeared, and no one knew what became of them. The Iron Virgin embraced them, and that was all. Another Virgin exists in Austria, at Neustadt. There are other horrors, enough to curdle the blood, not of the Roman Inquisition, but of German governments. The heart almost ceases its beating when you look upon the devilish inventions, and think we are only half a century removed from these horrors.

The Volunteer Counsel.

John Taylor was licensed, when a youth of twenty-one, to practice at the bar. He was poor, but well educated, and possessed extraordinary genius. He married a beauty, who afterwards deserted him for another.

On the 9th of April, 1840, the court-house in Clarksville, Texas, was crowded to overflowing. An exciting case was to be tried. Geo. Hopkins, a wealthy planter, had offered a gross insult to Mary Ellison, the young and beautiful wife of his overseer. The husband threatened to chastise him for the outrage, when Hopkins went to Ellison's house and shot him in his own door. The murderer was arrested and bailed to answer the charge. The occurrence produced great excitement, and Hopkins, in order to turn the tide of popular indignation, had circulated reports against her character, and she had sued him for slander. Both suits were pending—for murder and slander,

The interest became deeper when it was known that Ashlee and Pike, of Arkansas, and S. S. Prentiss, of New Orleans, by enormous fees, had been retained to defend Hopkins.

Hopkins was acquitted. The Texas lawyers were overwhelmed by their opponents. It was a fight of a dwarf against giants.

The slander suit was for the 9th, and the throng of spectators grew in numbers as in excitement. Public opinion was setting in for Hopkins; his money had procured witnesses who served his powerful advocates. When the slander case was called, Mary Ellison was left without an attorney—all had withdrawn.

"Have you no counsel?" inquired Judge Mills, looking kindly on the plaintiff."

"No, sir; they have all deserted me, and I am too poor to employ any more," replied the beautiful Mary, bursting into tears.

"In such a case, will not some chivalrous member of the profession volunteer?" said the Judge, glancing around the bar.

The thirty lawyers were silent.

"I will, your honor," said a voice from the thickest of the crowd, from behind the bar.

At the sound of that voice many started—it was so unearthly, sweet, and mournful.

The first sensation was changed into laughter when a tall, gaunt, spectral figure elbowed his way through the crowd, and placed himself within the bar. His clothes looked so shabby that the court hesitated to let the case proceed under his management.

"Has your name been entered on the rolls of the State?" demanded the Judge.

"It is immaterial," answered the stranger, his thin, bloodless lips curling up with a sneer. "Here is my license from the highest tribunal in America," and he handed the judge a broad parchment. The trial went on.

He suffered the witnesses to tell their own story, and he allowed the defense to lead off. Ashlee spoke first, followed by Pike and Prentiss. The latter brought the house down in cheers, in which the jury joined.

It was now the stranger's turn. He rose before the bar, not behind it, and so near the wondering jury that he might touch the foreman with his long, bony finger. He proceeded to tear to pieces the arguments of Ashlee, which melted away at his touch like frost before a sunbeam; every one looked surprised. Anon he came to the dazzling wit of the poet-lawyer Pike. Then the curl of his lip grew sharper, his smooth face began to kindle up, and his eyes to open, dim and dreary no longer, but vivid as lightning, red as fire globes, and glaring as twin meteors. The whole soul was in the eye; the full heart streamed out of his face. Then, without bestowing an allusion to Prentiss, he turned short around on the perjured witnesses of Hopkins, tore their testimony into threads, and hurled in their faces such terrible invectives that all trembled like aspens, and two of them fled from the court-house. The excitement of the crowd was becoming tremendous. Their united life and soul seemed to hang upon the burning tongue of the stranger, and he inspired them with the power of his passions. He seemed to have stolen nature's long hidden secret of attraction. But his greatest triumph was to come.

His eyes began to glance at the assassin, Hopkins, as his lean, taper fingers assumed the same direction. He hemmed the wretch witn a wall of strong evidence and impregnable argument, cutting off all hope of escape. He dug beneath the murderer's feet ditches of dilemma, and held up the slanderer to the scorn and contempt of the populace. Having thus girt himself about with a circle of fire, he stripped himself to the work of massacre.

Oh! then it was a vision both glorious and dreadful to behold the orator. His actions became as impetuous as the motion of an oak in a hurricane. His voice became a trumpet filled with wild whirlpools, deafening the air with the crashes of power, and yet intermingled all the while with a sweet undersong of the soft cadence. His forehead glowed like a heated furnace, his countenance was haggard like that of a maniac, and ever and anon he flung his long and bony arms on high as if grasping after thunderbolts.

He drew a picture of murder in such appalling colors that in comparison hell itself might seem beautiful; he painted the slanderer so black that the sun seemed dark at noonday when shining on such a monster. And then fixing both portraits on the shrinking Hopkins, fastened them forever. The agitation of the audience amounted almost to madness.

All at once the speaker descended from the perilous height. His voice wailed out for the murdered dead and living—the beautiful Mary, more beautiful every moment as her tears flowed faster—till men wept and sobbed like children.

He closed by a strange exhortation to the jury, and through them to the bystanders; he advised the panel, after they should bring in a verdict for the plaintiff, not to offer violence to the defendant, however richly he might deserve it; in other words, "not to lynch the villain, but leave his punishment with God." This was the most artful trick of all, and best calculated to insure vengeance.

The jury returned a verdict of fifty thousand dollars; and the night afterwards Hopkins was taken out of his bed by lynchers and beaten almost to death. As the court adjourned, the stranger said:

"John Taylor will preach here this evening at early candle light."

He did preach, and the house was crowded. I have listened to Clay, Webster, and Calhoun—to Dwight, Bascom, and Beecher—but never heard anything in the form of sublime words even approximating to the eloquence of John Taylor—massive as a mountain, and wildly rushing as a cataract of fire.

An Old Tar's Yarn.

Some years ago half a dozen friends and myself visited Greenwich Hospital. Our conductor was a weather-beaten, middle-aged tar, whose larboard glim had been doused since boyhood with the small-pox, and his starboard fin had been carried away by a chain shot. By the gold lace which he carried on his chapeau, the sleeves of his coat, &c., he appeared to hold the rank of boatswain in the college. He was a communicative old boy; and we felt indebted to his civilities. He, however, spurned the idea of being rewarded with money. "No, blow it!" he exclaimed, "not a tissey, not a single brown—but a drop of grog, gemmen, if you please." So saying, he led the way to a neighboring tavern, and entrenched himself in the corner of the parlor, with which he seemed intimately familiar. I placed myself at his elbow, with the intention of drawing from him some favorite yarn. During the first glass he spoke only of the hospital; during the second, he advanced to actions and bombardments; but, as he finished the third, as if to invite us to call for a fourth, he said: "But it's of no use talking about battles, and them sort of things; gemmen, by your leave, I'll tell you a bit of a story—it's a story that has made many a brave fellow waste his salt water; and, by the way, I may say it's about a countryman of your own, too—for Tom Beaumont was born at Newcastle, and he was boy, man, mate, and master of a Shields collier, many a long day. During our last scuffle with the Yankees, I was master-gunner of as handsome a gun-brig as ever did credit to a dockyard, or dipped a keel in the water. Love ye, it would have done your eyes good to have seen her skimming before the wind, and breasting the billows as gently as a boy's first kiss, which only touches the cheek, and that's all. Then we carried fourteen as pretty guns as ever drove a bullet through a Frenchman's timbers. Old Tom Beaumont (God bless him!) was our commander, and a better soul never cracked a biscuit. He was a hardy seaman to the backbone, an upright and down-straight fear-nothing; but the kindest-hearted fellow in the world, for all that. Well, gemmen, as I'm saying—Tom(we always called him Tom, because we loved him) married young, and, for two years, he was the happiest dog alive. He had a wife as pretty as an angel, and as good as himself; and a little rogue their son—the very picture of his own face in a button—who was beginning to climb upon his knee and pull his whiskers. Man alive couldn't desire more—the very scene might make a Dutchman dance or a Russian happy. After two years' fair wind and weather, however, in all mortal reckoning it was reasonable to expect squalls. Beaumont had not then joined the navy in a regular way; and at that period he found it necessary to proceed to America, where he had entered into extensive mercantile speculations. Finding that he should be compelled to remain there much longer than he dreamed of, he sent for his wife and child. They sailed—but it proved a last voyage to a new world. However, gemmen, it's a voyage we must all take, from the Admiral down to the cabin-boy, that's one comfort; and may we, by the aid of a good chart, steer clear of the enemy's lee-shore and brimstone shoals! Poor Tom's inquiries were fruitless; no one ever heard of the vessel, and no one ever doubted that all hands were as low as Davy Jones'. It was like a shot between wind and water to Beaumont; but he bore up after a way, though it had shivered his mainsheet. Well, as I was saying, it was during our last scuffle with the Yankees, more than twenty years after Tom had lost his wife and child—were returning with the little brig from the West Indies, when I was roused in my hammock by a bustle upon deck, and the cry of 'a Yankee!' I sprang up at the glorious news, and through the clear moonlight perceived an impudent looking lubber bearing upon us full sail, and displaying American colors. 'Haul to, my lads!' cried Old Beaumont, 'let them smell powder for breakfast.' Small time was lost in obeying the order; for we were always in readiness for welcome company. Twice they attempted to board us, but were driven back for their kindness with some score of broken heads, and the loss of some hundred American fingers. After two hour's hard peppering, Beaumont, seizing a lucky moment, ordered us to throw in a broadside. Every shot told; the Yankee began to stagger, and in a few minutes gave evidence that her swimming days were ended. 'Vast firing!' cried Beaumont, 'let us save a brave enemy.' He repeated the word enemy; and I heard him mutter, 'flesh of our own flesh.' The vessel was riddled like the lid of a pepper-box, and sank so rapidly that we were able to save only thirty of her crew. Their captain was among them, and a gallant-looking youth he was; but, in their last attempt to board us, Beaumont had wounded him on the shoulder with a cutlass. The blood ran down his arm, and poured from his fingers; yet the brave fellow never whispered it, nor made a wry face upon the matter, but stood and saw his countrymen attended to. Nature, however, gave way, and he fell upon the deck. Beaumont eagerly raised him in his arms, and conveyed him to his own bed.

On examining his wound, the surgeon took the portrait of a beautiful lady from his breast and handed it to the commander. Poor old Tom gazed upon it for a moment—he started—he uttered a sudden scream—I thought he had gone mad. 'Do you remember that face?' he exclaimed. How could I forget it!—to have seen it once was to remember it a hundred years—it was his wife's! I won't tire you with a long story," continued the narrator, "for it is all true and no yarn. For several days the gallant young American lay delirious, as the doctor called it. But—I can't describe it to you gemmen—had you seen poor old Tom, during all the time! No, hang me, I can't describe it! The youth also wore upon his finger a diamond ring, upon which were inscribed the names of Beaumont and his long-lost Eleanor. Flesh and blood could not stand the sight—there was the old man keeping watch by the bedside, night and day, weeping like a child, pacing the cabin floor, beating his breast—and sometimes snatching the hand of the poor sufferer to his lips, and calling him his murdered son, and himself the murderer. Then, he would doubt again, and the doubt made him worse.

At length the doctor declared the invalid out of danger, and said the commander might put to him any question he pleased. I wish I could tell you this scene; but I can't. However, there sat the full, bursting-hearted old boy, the big tears pouring down his cheeks, with the hand of the young American in his; and, sobbing like a child, he inquired, 'Were you born an American?' The youth trembled—his heart filled, and he wept, just like old Tom. 'Alas!' said he, 'I know not; I have been educated an American. I only know that I was saved by the good old man who adopted me as his son, and who found me almost lifeless, in the arms of a dying woman, on the raft of a deserted wreck, which the winds had driven on shore. My unfortunate mother could only recommend me to his care, and died.' The very heart and soul of the old tar wept. 'And this portrait, and this ring?' he exclaimed, breathless, and shaking like a yacht in a hurricane. 'The portrait,' replied the youth, 'was a part of what my mother had saved from the wreck, and, as I was told by my foster-father, is a like-of herself. The ring was taken from her finger, and from the engraving upon it, I have borne the name of Beaumont.' My son!—my own Tom!—child of my Eleanor!" cried the happy old father, hugging him to his breast. Gemmen, you can imagine the rest," said our one-armed companion; and, raising the fourth glass to his lips, he added, "and, by your permission, here's a health to old Tom Beaumont and his son, Heaven bless them!"

THE MASONIC TROWEL.

Three Good Men Gone.

JONATHAN YOUNG.

This veteran citizen, Christian, and Mason, departed this life at Paris, Sunday morning, August 18, aged 65 years 11 months and 3 days. He was a native of Newark, N. J., and was of Huguenot extraction. Immediately upon becoming of age, he married Miss Sarah McFarren. Never did Providence endow two worthy young people with qualities more exactly suited to each other, as a good long life of uninterrupted confidence and daily endearments abundantly attest. They were both, before their marriage and ever since, members of the Presbyterian Church. In 1817, Father Young removed to Cincinnati, and until 1839 was an honored business man. Then he removed to Paris, where he resided until his death. His landed estate embraces about 1,200 acres, near Paris, all valuable, and the major portion in cultivation.

He was initiated in 1826, in Lafayette Lodge, Cincinnati. The chapter degrees were conferred on him at Terre Haute, in 1854. He joined with others in organizing Paris Lodge in 1846, was elected S. W. in 1851, and Master in 1853 and 1854. He represented the lodge at Shawneetown in 1850, and also in the years 1852, 1853, 1854, 1856, and 1861, and was present at every session since, with the exception of 1865.

The chapter has kept him continuously in the position of King from its organization, with the exception of one year, when he served as High Priest.

When Young Council was formed, his name was given to it, and his great affection in Masonry was given to that body. He held an important position until his death. From the organization of the chapter and council, he invariably represented them when present at Grand Lodge.

In the community at Paris, in the Masonic bodies, and in the church, the gray-haired veteran was a patriarch. The blessings of the poor rested upon him; upon his memory there is no stain nor shadow. At his death he was the honorary member of the Grand Lodge. It was intended, in case of survivorship, that his mantle should fall upon the revered Michael J. Noyes. But he, too, has gone "over the river." On Saturday, August 17, the deceased was on horseback on his farm, when he was thrown from his horse, and with difficulty reached the nearest house. His son and son-in-law removed him to his home, but after a few hourse of intense agony, he "entered into his rest." His funeral was the largest ever held in Paris. The Masonic societies did ample honor to his memory.

JOSEPH R. SCROGGS,

Publisher and editor of the Bulletin, at Freeport. We have been one of his readers for three years, and no journal out of our large cities was more ably or judiciously conducted.

He was born in Canton, Ohio, in 1823, and became a resident of Freeport in 1857. For many years he was an active Odd-Fellow, was Deputy Grand Master some years since, and in 1865 was elected Grand Master, and at the time of his death was Grand Representative to the Grand Lodge of the U. S. In later years, his attention was turned to Masonry, and after serving acceptably as Warden, he passed to the Orient last December. In early life he united with the Methodist Church, and remained an earnest, consistent member until his decease. His sickness lasted about three weeks, and no serious apprehensions were entertained until a few hours before his death, when the symptoms changed, and he soon passed away, on Monday, August 19. His funeral was largely attended. The paper in the same city of opposite politics says: "A better man, a more worthy citizen, never lived."

CHARLES R. STARKWEATHER.

We were surprised by a telegram from Ill. Bro. Patrick, of Chicago, announcing the death of Ill. Bro. Starkweather. The deceased had occupied a prominent position in the business and prosperity of the city, and by careful management and honorable dealing had acquired a handsome fortune. Several young men have been aided and put forward in business by him. A few weeks ago, he lost a son by an accident, and we doubt not it hastened his end, for his affections were largely in his family. He had an honorable membership in Oriental Lodge, Lafayette Chapter, Chicago Council, Apollo Commandery, Occidental Consistory, and the Supreme Council A. & A. Scottish Rite, N. J. He passed the chairs in council, commandery, and consistory, and for a long time was Deputy for Illinois and Wisconsin, and Grand Minister of State at Boston. As an active member of the Scottish Rite, his opinions and counsels were held in high regard.

He was a consistent member of the Presbyterian Church. A good man has passed away.

Upon learning of his decease, Carson Consistory assembled, of one accord, and passed resolutions.

"Our Temple---No. III."

The Mystic Star is exercised over our article in regard to the subject matter of the communication headed as above.

We shall not comment on the style of the Star; its readers are the proper persons to judge in that respect. We have learned by experience to avoid personalities, or going beyond the proper matter in hand to seek in one's official, personal, or professional character, beyond that of editor, for reasons to sustain either argument or assertion. How closely we have followed our own just rules, we are not to judge; we profess no infallibility in anything.

In the May number, 1867, the editor of the Mystic Star says the "Baptist denomination, for hanging Quakers, only a few years before the Morgan era, must be condemned." The editor is mistaken. It is true that the Quakers were put to death, but the Baptists had no hand in it, nor in any other merely religious persecution; but they were the most intolerant and persecuting of all the religious sects in the Morgan anti-masonic crusade.

In our notice of the exceptionable matter in "Our Temple—No. III," we did not state what the subject was; we did not copy it, but we intended to be understood by the editors of the Star that we objected to the offensive introduction of the names of religious sects, or comments upon their peculiarities or opinions, for there are good Masons in all of them, and Masonic tolerance teaches that every Mason may worship Deity in his own way. As to the controversies that arise among Christian sects, or between political parties, we fraternally and candidly submit that they are improper themes to introduce into a Masonic journal. That our readers and reviewers may themselves judge as to the justice of our remarks, we take the following extract from "Our Temple—No. III." The author, after ably vindicating Freemasonry, says:

> And permit us to say here, that if sectarism professes to do this work, it falls far short of its aim. It makes bigots, and fanatics, and sectarists. It makes men selfish, narrow-minded, and self-righteous; but it does not in any way prepare them for the great house to which we have referred. Great efforts and vast amounts are expended in its interests, but the result is always more sectarian than religious. We once knew a revival to be conducted conjointly by Baptists and Methodists; and after it was over they quarreled about the spoils. It is sect, after all, first, last, and all the time; and the consequence is a narrow partisan feeling, instead of broad charitable religion. It makes strangers, not to say enemies, of those of the different families of Christianity, who should be friends and brothers. Instead of binding them together by cords of amity and fraternal love, it puts them farther apart.
> Masonry, however, expands the affections, spreads the cement, binds hearts together, fraternizes the sects, and makes brothers of us all. It is eminently religious. And these men of sectarian bias, are the very identical bad material, the soft, the cross-grained, the crumbling, the shaky, cracked, and unmanageable candidates with whom we have the most trouble. They are so warped and twisted that they will not rest at all, except upon the most narrow prejudices. A blue-stocking Presbyterian can not rest beside "a Quaker or other heretic"; a Baptist does not accord with a Universalist, and so on, the sects through.
> Upon such men, the gavel and other instruments must work a long time, in knocking off the rough corners of their prejudices, subduing their passions, smoothing down their intolerant notions, and squaring and fitting them for their true place in the earthly lodge. And, as the rough sand-stone is more easily cut, shaped, dressed, and placed in position, so the man of no sectarian training is more easily improved by the manipulations of our Craft. He fraternizes more readily with those of opposite views. Our operations tend to make men more upright in their actions, to level their pride, to circumscribe their desires, to lift them above the narrow prejudices of creed and sectarian exclusion, and to enable them to see a brother, not only in one of another faith, but even a brother in a foe.

The foregoing needs no further comment at our hands, only to invite a contrast with a capital article from the Star in another column. Our brethren of the Star call their readers to witness that they have always spoken of THE TROWEL "in the spirit of brotherly love." If the editor is willing to submit that matter to his readers, we certainly are. We do not think the editors will press it.

It is also said that our remarks in regard to President Blanchard are severe. Perhaps so; and, if so, then we are even, and our strictures as to the harshness of the editor of the Star will have no weight. We did, however, admit good qualities in President Blanchard; did our friends of the Star do so? We know that President Blanchard is an able man, but he rides a rough horse, like our good friend of the Star.

A word as to intolerance. There is such a thing, in our endeavor to promote toleration in religion, politics, or other matters, as becoming excessively intolerant. Two men holding precisely the same views as to religious doctrines, church polity, or ecclesiastical government, may differ widely in their treatment of those who hold opinions contrary to theirs. One, charitable and cosmopolitan, is willing that every man should enjoy his own views, labor in his own way, and seek the good of others by modes that suit him best, and is willing to wait for the results of general education, the spread of civilization, and the attracting force of refinement and love. The other, coarse, sensual, and narrow, while lustily preaching tolerance, sees no room for any but his own sect or party.

Our brethren of the Star think we have been remiss in not noticing them. We are not doing much of that sort of thing—at least, we do not intend to. We have copied articles frequently from their columns, and that is a proof of friendship. The Star is an able journal, and worthy of patronage. It boasts of great prosperity; therein do we greatly rejoice. We hope that, as heretofore, its many virtues, most cheerfully conceded, may win for it a golden harvest in good deeds, good words, kind counsels, and cash.

Popularity of Masonry.

New editors and new grand officers are prone to take up the old and hackneyed cry of "wolf" in regard to admissions to our fold, assuming that numbers will crush the Institution. There never was a more senseless idea. It is not numbers that will destroy Masonry or injure it; it is the reception of bad material. If one bad man is admitted, he will clamor for the admission of his kind, and the result will be, either that good men distrust the Institution and are disgusted with its initiates, or else, in case they petition, the bad man is very likely to reject them, especially if any of his favorites are rejected. A lodge may have ten members, and only one bad one; that one may effectually block and break up that lodge. Another lodge, no better situated, may have one hundred members. Is that a sign of weakness? We can not answer beyond Illinois, but we aver that the per cent. in character of our initiates is growing better every year. To show that our lodges are doing their duty, we take the first two of every hundred, as returned to us at this writing, and give the initiations and rejections:

	Initiations.	Rejections.
Bodley No. 1	14	13
Springfield, 4	6	5
Magnolia, 103	8	3
Lewistown, 104	12	7
Flora, 204	7	7
Corinthian, 205	1	0
Cement, 304	5	3
Onarga, 305	9	7
Kishwaukee, 402	4	2
Mithra, 410	13	6
Stark, 501	4	1
Odin, 503	17	5

In twelve lodges, we show 159 applications, 100 initiations, and 59 rejections—nearly three-eighths of the whole number, and closely approximating to two-fifths. Every good man who applies should be initiated—he adds strength; every bad man should be rejected—he creates weakness. The Institution is strong in proportion to its number of good men, and weak in proportion to its number of bad ones.

Illinois Grand Bodies.

The Grand Lodge of Illinois will meet on Tuesday, the first day of October, at 10 o'clock. If the returns are all in, the reports of committees will be in such a state of forwardness that they can all be disposed of on the first day and the morning of the second day of the session. The committees on Chartered Lodges, Lodges U. D., Mileage and Per Diem, and on Appeals and Grievances, will meet earlier than heretofore, and some other committees will be in session on Monday.

The Grand Master informs us that his address will embrace some propositions for the more effective organization of the Craft, looking to fundamental changes, rendered necessary by the immensity of our Grand Lodge and its unparalleled growth.

The matter of entertainment is all that our brethren can desire. The Leland House, equal in appointments and regulations to our Chicago or New York houses, the St. Nicholas, and the Chenery, both well-known, can probably accommodate all who may be in attendance. The old American House can accommodate a great many, as well as other hotels of less note.

Railroad Fares.

The Illinois Central Railroad, the Western Union, and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, will return persons attending our grand bodies free, upon paying full fare to this place.

The Chicago & Alton Railroad, and the Jacksonville, Alton & St. Louis, will return for one-fifth fare upon paying full fare this way.

We hope that the T. W. & W. will come into the arrangement also.

We advise our brethren in South Illinois to strike the Illinois Central at the nearest point, where it is at all convenient to do so.

Those who take the morning train from Cairo to Tolono, will arrive at Tolono at noon, leave at 3.40 P. M., and arrive in Springfield at 8.00 P. M.

The evening Central train on the same route arrives at Tolono at 10.50 P. M., and passengers leave at 2.24 A. M., and arrive at Springfield at 6.15 A. M.

Those who take the evening Central train from Centralia to Decatur, will arrive at the latter place at 6.15 P. M., and leave the next morning at 4.20.

We can not satisfy ourselves in regard to connections at Odin and Sandoval sufficiently to risk any statement. Passengers by the evening train on the T. H., A. & St. Louis, from the East, arrive at Mattoon at 7.30, and leave for Tolono at 9.15 the same evening.

Passengers on the O. & M. road, on the morning train, arrive at St. Louis at 10.05, leave by the Chicago & Alton at 4.50 P. M., and arrive at Springfield at 9.35 the same evening.

Passengers on the morning express train of the T. H., A. & St. L. arrive at Alton at 7.20 in the morning, leave for Springfield at 8.10, and arrive at 12.10, noon.

Passengers on the morning train, Chicago to Quincy (Monday), reach Camp Point at 10.50 and Quincy at 11.50 A. M., and leave Quincy at 5.20 and Camp Point at 6.10 P. M. for Springfield, and arrive at 10.57 the same evening. The next train does not reach Springfield until 2.05 afternoon.

Passengers on the Central, from Chicago, Dunleith, and Freeport south, are requested to inquire in good season in regard to connections at Tolono, Bloomington & Decatur, for we are unable to give them certain information.

Brethren living off of any road had better ascertain by correspondence as to the route to take. Let every brother be on hand in time, and make no risk in regard to connections.

☞ We stop the press to announce that the Toledo, Wabash & Western will return members of the Grand Lodge free.

Washington's Apron.

We are under many obligations to our worthy brother George W. Staley, W. M. of Kaskaskia Lodge No. 86, for a photograph of Washington's apron. We give the following from Hayden's work, "Washington and his Masonic Compeers," pp. 82 and 83:

> "At the close of the campaign of 1781, Lafayette, believing the war virtually closed, returned to France. * * *
> "Washington was well known in France as a Mason at this period, and a Franco-American mercantile firm there, composed of Messrs. Watson & Cassard, both of whom were Masons, wishing to send some testimony of respect to him, procured some nuns in a convent at Nantes to manufacture a Masonic sash and apron of the finest satin, wrought with gold and silver tissue, on which the French and American flags were combined with various Masonic emblems beautifully delineated. They were executed in a superior and expressive style, and forwarded from France to Washington."

This ancient Masonic relic is now in possession of Mt. Nebo Lodge No. 91, Shepherdstown, Va., and was presented to the lodge by Thomas Hammond, whose wife was a Miss Washington. Mr. Hammond was initiated in Mt. Nebo Lodge about 1814, and at that time presented the apron and stated that it had been preserved in his family as an heirloom. The apron is still carefully preserved by Mt. Nebo Lodge, and has been exhibited by them on many Masonic public occasions.

Lawful Age.

An amendment proposed to section 40, Grand Lodge By-laws (see page 60, pro. 1866) if adopted, will fix the age of initiates at 25 years.

An argument has already been advanced by a worthy brother in favor of the proposition, and replies invited by us. None have been offered. We have waited until now, and shall dispose of the matter in few words:

1. Those who bring disgrace upon Masonry are not, as a rule, the young men.
2. Those who make the best and most permanent improvement in Masonry, are the young men.
3. The most zealous, efficient, and laborious Masons are those initiated in their youth.
4. Let well enough alone.

Meetings of Grand Bodies.

The Grand Lodge of Arkansas will convene at Little Rock Nov. 4; the Grand Chapter Oct. 31, and the Grand Council Nov. 2.

The Grand Lodge of Missouri meets at St. Louis Monday, Oct. 14; the Grand Chapter on Wednesday, Oct. 9; and the Grand Council on Friday, Oct. 11.

The Grand Lodge of Kentucky meets at Louisville on Monday, Oct. 21; the Grand Chapter at the same time and place, and the Grand Council on the Wednesday following.

The Grand Lodge of Tennessee will meet at Nashville on Monday, the 7th day of October.

The Grand Lodge of Ohio meets on Tuesday, Oct. 15; the Grand Chapter, Friday, Oct. 11; the Grand Council, Thursday, Oct. 10—all in Cincinnati.

The Grand Lodge of Kansas meets at Leavenworth on Tuesday, the 15th day of October.

Mileage and Per Diem.

The resolution of the Grand Lodge makes a neglect to forward returns by the 15th of September a forfeiture of mileage and per diem, except for good cause. Where returns are sent after September 15, the reasons for delay should be given. Heretofore, the defaults have been so few, and the reasons for delay so good, that no forfeitures have been exacted. But at this writing (Sept. 10), upwards of 200 returns have failed to come to hand, and we have reason to fear that full 100 will fall behind.

Life Insurance.

Our readers are respectfully referred to the life insurance advertisement of Messrs. Wilson & Corey, in this number. These gentlemen are vouched for in the strongest manner by Rev. Francis A. Blades, an eminent minister of the Methodist E. Church, of Adrian, Mich. No indorsement from any source would be entitled to higher consideration. They are, however, indorsed by several business men in Michigan and elsewhere, and we unhesitatingly recommend them to the confidence of business men, and all interested in life insurance.

Tidings.

Items.

Hesperia Lodge, 411, at Chicago, 101 members, and 26 raisings. Pleiades Lodge, 478, chartered one year ago, raised 34, and has 87 members. Home Lodge, also chartered one year since, has 60 members. This lodge occupies the ground formerly occupied by Dearborn, 310.

Our brethren at Wenona had a good time August 5. The ladies there have organized a society of the Eastern Star degree. An address was delivered, and the sum of one hundred dollars was raised—for what purpose is not stated; for a beneficent purpose, of course, for in such a cause the disciples of Ruth must abound.

The Greene county fair will be held, near Carrollton, Oct. 15, 16, 17, and 18. Thanks for the pamphlet. There is to be some good equestrianship, and the bill is very fine.

The State fair is to commence at Quincy, Oct. 1.

Many thanks to Ill. Bro. Robert H. Waterman, of Albany, N. Y., for list of officers of the original Scottish Rite bodies in America. They were founded by Henry Andrew Francken, Deputy Ins. Gen. for the West Indies and North America, Dec. 20, 1767. Lodge of Perfection, Jefferson Peterman Master; Council, Jesse M. White Master; Chapter Rose Croix, founded November 16, 1824, Townsend Fondey Master; Consistory, founded November 16, 1824, R. H. Waterman Sov. Com.

The Wisconsin State fair commences, at Madison, September 24. Messrs. Wooten, Hawks & Carey propose to issue a daily during the fair. Address box 372, Madison, Wis.

Some good brother has sent us a pamphlet copy of an elegant oration delivered by Rev. S. P. Crawford, at Fort Smith, Ark., June 24.

We are under many obligations to R. W. Bro. Geo. H. Bringhurst, Grand Secretary of Texas, for two bound volumes of the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of Texas, from its organization until 1857, as well as for other important contributions.

R. W. Bro. Wm. T. Palmer, Grand Secretary of Wisconsin, will please take notice that we thank him, also, for the beautifully bound copy of proceedings of Grand Lodge for 1867. We are in receipt of positive orders from New York to pull Bro. Palmer's hair. Guess we'll do it—"in a horn!"—reversed!!

Fraternal Lodge, U. D., organized at Davenport, Iowa, August 20. Hon. James T. Lane Master, Hon. James Thorington S. W., Bro. C. Toering J. W. From our knowledge of Judge Thorington, formerly in Congress, we know that the lodge must be a success.

The Memento for August is full of choice things.

The population of Sangamon, Morgan, and Macon counties, in which are situated the three important places of Springfield, Jacksonville, and Decatur, was 97,066 in 1865. They would reach 125,000 now.

El Espejo Masonico comes regularly. It is published, for the benefit of brethren who read the Spanish language, by Bro. Andres Cassard. Address box 6,766, New York. We have no one here who can translate, or we would give news from South America, and other places, where the work circulates most.

We have a new bindery in the same building with our printing office, in which the publishers of The Trowel have a half interest. If any of our brethren have Masonic papers, magazines, or pamphlets which they desire to have bound, or if they wish any kind of blank books, if they will send to H. G. Reynolds, Son & Co., we will see that their work is done as desired, and sent according to orders.

We desire to return thanks to Grand Secretaries Austin of New York, Moore of Massachusetts, Clark of Vermont, Greene of Rhode Island, Hough of New Jersey, Allmond of Delaware, Medairy of Maryland, Dove of Virginia, Baine of North Carolina, Rose of Georgia, Sayre of Alabama, Corley of Florida, Porter of Mississippi, Batchelor of Louisiana, Caldwell of Ohio, Fenton of Michigan, McCorcle of Kentucky, Fuller of Tennessee, Swan of Rhode Island, Combs of Minnesota, Parvin of Iowa, Abell of California, Hurford of Oregon, Larner of District of Columbia, Carr of Kansas, Gouley of Missouri, Wise of Nebraska, and to the Grand Secretary of Colorado, for important grand lodge and grand chapter proceedings for the use of the grand lodge and grand chapter libraries, and for our own private library. The same to Grand High Priest Drummond, of Maine.

Captain Geo. W. Hill, pursuant to orders, left for his regiment, at Fort Union, last month.

Our brethren at Amboy are again the victims of fire. A destructive conflagration, which consumed a whole block, destroyed the lodge-room. The charter, jewels, and a small portion of the furniture, were saved. Although insured, we learn the loss to the lodge is very heavy.

By a letter from Comp. David J. Miller, of Santa Fe, New Mexico, we learn that a new chapter has been established in that city. Comp. W. W. Griffin H. P., George T. Beall King, Henry O'Neill Scribe, D. J. Miller Sec. The Comps. have fitted up their chapter at an expence of $1,500, and think they have the best outfit between the Missouri river and the Pacific coast.

Hon. James A. McDougall, late Senator from California, and formerly Attorney General of this State, died at Albany, N. Y., on the 3d instant, aged 50 years. He delivered the first oration delivered before the Grand Lodge of Illinois.

When our Chicago, or even any of our Illinois brethren, visit San Francisco, let them call at the office of the Pacific Appeal, and take our good brother A. S. Hubbard by the hand.

Upwards of eighty cotton factories have been built in Georgia since the war.

We are advised by letter from R. W. Bro. H. A. Corley, Grand Secretary Grand Lodge of Florida, of the death of Gov. Thomas Brown, long Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Florida, and one of the soundest and ablest Craftsmen of his day.

The Grand Lodge of Colorado will meet at Denver, October 7. Chase Withrow, of Black Hawk, Grand Master; E. C. Parmale, of Central City, Grand Secretary.

Bro. George C. Whiting, M. W. Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Masons of the District of Columbia, died at Washington, on Tuesday last, the 3d instant. The brother above mentioned was, at the time of his death, a clerk in the Department of the Interior, in which capacity he had been called on at times to act ad interim as the Secretary. He has also held the position of Commissioner of Pensions. In whatever position the brother was called upon to occupy, he has done his duty in a faithful manner.

Lodge Returns.

The by-laws of the Grand Lodge provide that returns shall be sent to the Grand Secretary on or before the first day of September. Inasmuch as the by-laws also require the work to be reported up to and including the 31st day of August, time was given for transit to the 5th of September. There are very few lodges, perhaps none, that can not reach the Grand Secretary's office in five days. Some of the lodges were prompt, and nearly a hundred returns were received. The first received was from Fellowship No. 89, at Marion.

Yet the 5th came and went, and but a trifle over two-fifths of the returns were received. Below we give the numbers of such as made returns on or before September 5th:

Returns and Dues.—Nos. 1, 14, 23, 28, 31, 36, 52, 57, 59, 61, 67, 68, 72, 76, 77, 84, 89. 92, 100, 104, 107, 109, 113, 115, 118, 119, 128, 138, 140, 142, 145, 152, 154, 158, 161, 164, 168, 173, 178, 179, 182, 183, 185, 187, 188, 192, 197, 204, 212, 214, 220, 222, 224, 229, 240, 241, 243, 244, 256, 261, 266, 270, 273, 275, 283, 285, 287, 288, 291, 294, 300. 307, 315, 320, 330, 346, 349, 356, 371, 375, 378, 382, 384, 385, 397, 402, 411, 414, 416, 428, 439, 443, 447, 452, 455. 458, 459, 462, 466, 468, 469, 473, 478, 479, 481, 482, 485, 487, 488, 493, 496, 498, 499, 501, 508, 512.

Returns without Dues.—Nos. 25, 27, 34, 39, 40, 43, 44, 45, 46, 51, 54, 71, 75, 79, 80, 81, 95, 99, 106, 114, 127, 131, 136, 146, 147, 148, 150, 156, 157, 159, 162, 174, 189, 195, 196, 198, 200, 205, 207, 216, 221, 227, 228, 233, 234, 235, 236, 254, 255, 260, 262, 263, 271, 280, 282, 286, 293, 295, 299, 304, 309, 322, 333, 337, 339, 344, 348, 350, 352, 357, 358, 365, 366, 368, 369, 370, 374, 388, 392, 395, 396, 418, 419, 421, 434, 445, 460, 461, 467, 474, 486, 490.

One hundred and fifteen have made returns and dues; ninety-two have made returns—207 in all.

Oriental Magazines.

We have received in exchange The Indian Freemason's Friend, published by Wm. H. Hoff, Calcutta, India. It is a forty page periodical, and is published monthly, at 12 rupees per year, in advance. The April number contains the proceedings of the District Grand Lodge of Bengal, which are also continued in the May number. Masonry in Europe and America is largely noticed, and various topics are discussed with much ability.

The Masonic Record of Western India is published monthly at Bombay, by Geo. Bease, at 12 rupees yearly. The July number copies Dr. Mackey's article on the Acacia from The Trowel. The proceedings of the Prov. G. Lodge of Western India, under Scotland, are noticed at length. This is a larger magazine than the Friend, but has less original matter, while its selections are more varied and choice.

New Grand Chapter.

After removing some obstacles, the Grand Chapter of Maryland and the District of Columbia dissolved their connection. Maryland retained the old organization, and a convention was held in the city of Washington for the purpose of forming a Grand Chapter for the District, which convention was composed of representatives from Potomac Chapter No. 8, Columbia Chapter No. 15, Washington Chapter No. 16, and Mt. Vernon Chapter No. 20. The organization was perfected, grand officers were elected, and the 23d day of May, 1867, was selected as the time for constituting the Grand Chapter and installing the grand officers. We take the following from proceedings and documents before us:

FROM THE ADDRESS OF THE G. H. PRIEST.

In the discussion upon which we propose to enter, I preface by saying, in that which shall follow, reference must be made, many times, to the G. G. Chapter of the U. S. Therefore, I take this early occasion to say that, as there is no disposition, so there shall be no word designedly uttered, the tendency of which shall be the impairment of the integrity, dignity, or acknowledged supremacy of that noble institution of Freemasons.

We shall at all times be prepared, as now we are, to bow to its mandates of authority, whenever in this, as in all other regards, they shall come to us, with a willing submission. And if we have seemed, in the premises of our movements, to withhold all appeal to the G. G. C., it was not that in any way or degree we sought avoidance of its authority, but because, simply and alone, we did not apprehend the issue demanded or required an appeal in the settlement or adjustment of the questions with which we were concerned. We thought it better to be guided and governed by clear and well defined principles and decisions, already established, than to create precedents by an appeal which, in the future, might have the proneness to engender doubts and produce confusion—more especially as the effort has been, as was known to every Mason in the jurisdiction, to force us before the G. G. C. for the purpose, seemingly at least, of producing delay, harassing, and chafing the friends of the movement of separation from the Grand Chapter of Maryland.

With regard to the jurisdiction, as an inherent power of the G. G. Chapter of the U. S., already much that is problematical and perplexing exists, and so divergent are the formulæ by which, in various States, Chapter work is regulated, that one scarce knows when and how an appeal should be made. The lament is, that there exists no well defined and regulated system of jurisdiction on the part of the G. G. C. In the case we have in hand, the semblance of a duty to appeal to the G. G. C. is urged by the "handful" of our companions against the conviction of more than 500 R. A. Masons among us, which conviction was and is that the question of separation from the G. Chapter of Maryland by the G. Chapter of the District of Columbia belongs in nowise to the jurisdiction of the G. G. Chapter of the U. S.

But, it may be asked, what necessity exists for a G. Chapter in the District of Columbia? and how shall capitular Masonry be advantaged by the erection of a G. Chapter? why this inordinate desire for separation from Maryland? These and like questions have been asked again and again by those who have opposed separation and the coming in of events which to-night have been so auspiciously inaugurated. And, although time and again answers have been given, still they are asked, no matter how well, clear, and to the point the querist has received the response. Once again we will essay the answering of the questions propounded, and set forth the causes which have led to the separation.

First of all, it is hardly conceivable how it should have escaped the attention or observation of the most simple-minded and least informed among us that, while not in an independent condition, the Masonic work in any jurisdiction must be incomplete, if not positively imperfect. And this especially is the case where an alliance or conjunction is formed between two jurisdictions in each of which grand lodges exist, but where irreconcileable discrepancies and differences also exist as to work in said grand lodges.

The District of Columbia is designated, definitely, by political and geographical boundary lines. Now, we hold the entire work of the "Ancient Craft" within the District, that it "may be designated in wisdom, established in strength, and perfected in beauty," should be wrought within the limits of the well defined political and geographical boundaries of the District of Columbia, and not commingled or mixed up with the workings of the "Craft" in Maryland.

In other words, that our grand Masonic temple here in this District, having gained for itself a "good degree" in name and character, and hereafter and from henceforth to be known and acknowledged, as we humbly trust and hope, a grand center of Masonic work and influence, should be supported and decorated by the Royal Arch of capitular Masonry, erected, constituted, and ordained here in this city, the metropolis of the District, and not in Baltimore, a city of Maryland. It seems to us there would be as much display and no more of wisdom and propriety of having the Royal Temple in part here, its foundations and walls, and its upper, loftier work and finish in Baltimore, as, for the purpose of making the noble edifice complete in design and structure, our Capitol, the admiration of the world, should you remove its dome of vastness, grandeur, and sublimity, and set it down amid the streets and lanes of Baltimore, leaving for us here alone the foundation walls and columns of the mighty edifice. That the jurisdiction should be independent here in all matters belonging to the Craft is asserted again, from the fact that here we have the G. Lodge of the District of Columbia, in a degree elevated with "beauty," "strength," and "order," embracing over twenty-five hundred Free and Accepted Masons, with sixteen flourishing lodges and three chapters in full and working order, and two others already formed since the announcement of the separation from Maryland. Why, in the name of the common sense of any man, I ask, should we be held in bondage, be vassal to Maryland? Why dishonor ourselves? Why disrobe ourselves of dignities, immunities, and privileges, the beauty and grandeur of the Craft the world over, by submitting to an order of things which fastens upon us chains instead of giving us the privilege to work as independent members of the Craft—to win its rewards and wear its honors?

Again, look at the confusion which inevitably results from this unnatural alliance with Maryland. The grand lodge work, precedents, and principles which govern capitular Masonry in Maryland are wholly unlike the grand lodge work, precedents, and principles, in many cases, of the District of Columbia, to which jurisdiction we belong, and to which, as District of Columbia Masons, we gladly submit. On the part of the Masons of this jurisdiction there exists not only a positive distaste for, but a sincere disapproval of, the work done in the jurisdiction of Maryland, in many particulars. And yet, when we enter the G. Chapter of Maryland, as Washington Masons, we are obliged to leave behind us all our tastes, feelings, and judgment. It mattered not what might be the cast or complexion of the questions or subjects introduced and discussed in the G. Chapter of Maryland—if ever decisions had been made in Maryland, these were binding upon us—by the authority of the G. Chapter of Maryland, no matter how widely differing from all precedents and decisions met with elsewhere—no matter how remote from all our notions of Masonic ideas and custom—no matter how unsanctioned by general usage—no matter how unsupported by universal custom—all, all was unavailing that could be said or offered by way of modifying strange and unnatural precedents and more strange and unlawful decisions.

Our primary object in calling this convention was to obtain a full and free expression of opinion. I am free to admit that our ulterior object was the formation of a grand chapter, with or without the consent of Maryland. We did not then, I do not now, believe, by any law (save and except the law of courtesy, obedience to which is always pleasant) of the G. G. Chapter, or any other grand chapter, that Maryland had anything to do with the question. * * * As an act of courtesy, therefore, we asked the consent of the Grand Chapter of Maryland. * * *

The G. Chapter of Maryland and District of Columbia was formed about 1814, and was acknowledged by the G. G. Chapter in 1816. A compact was formed between the representatives from Maryland and those of the District, that for twenty years no separation should take place.

No matter whether properly or improperly formed, this grand chapter held supreme and undisputed control over capitular Masonry in the District of Columbia until the G. Chapter of the District of Columbia was formed in 1824. In 1822 the delegates of the four chapters then in the District of Columbia met in convention, and took the preliminary steps for the formation of a grand chapter for the District of Columbia. They asked, and under date of August 30, 1822, obtained the assent of the G. G. H. P. to this formation. This consent we hold was entirely unnecessary, simply because the four chapters in this jurisdiction were not working by virtue of authority derived from the constitution of the G. G. Chapter.

But our forefathers did not consider the consent of the G. Chapter of Maryland and the Districct of Columbia necessary as a preliminary step to the formation of their grand chapter, and, accordingly, did not seek the same. And from the proceedings of the G. Chapter of Maryland and the District of Columbia of 1824, we learn that this grand body complained of the course of the District chapters simply because these failed to recognize the binding force of the "constitutional provision," as well as the "compact" under the terms of which the jurisdictions were intended to be bound together till 1834. But, nevertheless, the G. Chapter of Maryland and the District of Columbia gave its consent, and in 1824 the first G. Chapter of the District of Columbia was formed, and received into communion with the G. G. Chapter in 1826; and the G. G. Chapter declared that the "authority of the G. R. A. Chapter of the State of Maryland and the District of Columbia over said District shall, from and after the date hereof, cease and determine, except so far as relates to Potomac Chapter."

This exception of Potomac Chapter, with great respect for the G. G. Chapter, we hold was not only irregular, but positively illegal, recognizing as it did a jurisdiction, and then authorizing the oldest chapter therein to retain its allegiance to a foreign jurisdiction.

The first G. Chapter of the District of Columbia, for want of sufficient constituents, became effete and dormant in 1833. In 1838, certain companions of the District petitioned the Grand Chapter of Maryland, and improperly obtained from that body the charter of our present flourishing Columbia Chapter.

We say the G. Chapter of Maryland improperly granted this charter; for after our own grand chapter entered upon its long sleep, from which, thanks to the Supreme Arcitect of the Universe, it has now been so thoroughly aroused, this District was, properly speaking, unoccupied territory, and continued thus until 1841, and being unoccupied, it was therefore open to any State grand chapter which did not recognize the G. G. Chapter to charter chapters therein, but not to Maryland, which did recognize the G. G. Chapter, in view of the fact that the latter grand body claims jurisdiction over all territory not occupied by a legal grand chapter throughout this entire country.

After the organization, Potomac Chapter No. 8, at Georgetown, refused to affiliate with the new grand chapter, whereupon that body passed a resolution declaring Potomac Chapter irregular and clandestine and forbidding intercourse with its members. An appeal having been made to the G. G. High Priest, that officer issued his edict authorizing Potomac Chapter to continue its labors as heretofore, by virtue of its warrant. This edict was issued on the 4th day of June. On the 19th of June the G. Chapter of the District of Columbia indefinitely suspended Comp. James G. Smith, P. G. H. P., and, he having claimed the protection of the G. G. Chapter, the G. G. H. P., on the 13th of July, again issued his edict, in which he proclaimed the body "claiming to be the G. Chapter of R. A. Masons of the District of Columbia to have no valid legal existence, and hence to be irregular and clandestine," and required the chapters and companions forming the same to withdraw from the organization within one month.

This action of the G. G. High Priest called forth the following letter from Dr. Mackey, his immediate predecessor, who, our readers are aware, installed the officers of the new grand chapter:

CHARLESTON, July 26, 1867.

Comp. N. D. Larner, G. Sec. G. Chap. District of Columbia, Washington City:

DEAR SIR AND COMPANION—I have received and read, I confess with much astonishment, the copy, sent by you to me, of the edict of the General Grand High Priest of the General Grand Chapter of United States. I suppose myself to be not altogether ignorant of the general principles of Masonic law, and, from my former position in the General Grand Chapter, somewhat familiar with the Constitution of that body, and with the prerogatives of its presiding officer. But I have looked in vain in the law or the Constitution for the least color of authority which would sanction the General Grand High Priest in assuming jurisdiction over a State Grand Chapter, or intervening in a matter which comes exclusively within the purview of the Grand Chapter of Maryland.

In the controversy which the Gen. G. High Priest has inaugurated between himself and the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia, had I been merely "a looker on in Vienna," I should most certainly have refrained from taking a part. But unfortunately I do not occupy this neutral position. By the invitation of the members of the convention, I was present at the organization of the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia, and acted as the installing officer. When, therefore, the General Grand High Priest asserts, in a document issued with all the formality of an official imprimature, that that body is "irregular and clandestine," I feel that I am, by implication at least, included in the anathema. I am unwilling to admit that I was either so ignorant of or so unfaithful to the principles of Masonic law as to aid and assist in the establishment of a "clandestine" body. Self-respect requires that I should defend myself and show that the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia is a legally constituted body, and that the only irregularity in the transaction is that of which the General Grand High Priest was guilty when he undertook to assume functions which could only properly be exercised by the Grand Chapter of Maryland. But in this defense of myself from the imputations contained in the decree of the General Grand High Priest, I utterly disclaim all personal or angry feelings towards that distinguished officer, for whom I have long entertained, and still continue to entertain, the most profound respect and the most cordial friendship. If, in the course he has assumed, he has erred, it is because he is not exempt from the common lot of humanity. Humanum est errare.

In the investigation of this question, it is necessary for us to know that in 1816 the Grand Chapter of Maryland and the District of Columbia was admitted by the General Grand Chapter as one of its constituents; that in 1822 the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia was formed, and that in 1824 it also was admitted into the confederacy of the General Grand Chapter; that in 1833 the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia became dormant; that in 1838 the Grand Chapter of Maryland re-assumed jurisdiction over the District and granted a warrant for the constitution of a chapter in the city of Washington; that in 1841 the General Grand Chapter gave its sanction to this re-assumption of jurisdiction; and that from 1841 to 1867, the Grand Chapter of Maryland had uninterruptedly exercised this jurisdiction, so that during that period of twenty-six years, to say nothing of all the years that preceded it, the District of Columbia was territory occupied by a State Grand Chapter, which, according to the General Grand Constitution, art. ii, sec. 3, had "the sole government and control of the several Royal Arch Chapters" which were working in the District. And this government and control being thus vested in the Grand Chapter of Maryland, it was competent for that body to take such action in relation to the Chapters in the District as to it might seem most advisable, and whether that action was right or wrong, expedient or inexpedient, the General Grand Chapter, by the express terms of its own Constitution (art. i, sec. 2), could exercise "no power of discipline, admonition, censure, or instruction" over the Grand Chapter of Maryland. But if the General Grand Chapter possesses no power of discipline, it follows, a fortiori, that such power can not reside in the General Grand High Priest, who is only the creature and agent of the General Grand Chapter during its recess. Such I assert is the law, and this I challenge any to deny and to support his position by legitimate argument.

Now, as to the facts. And here I shall not encumber my argument with dates and minor details, but shall simply give the broad outlines of the events which have led to the present difficulty.

In 1866 three of the four chapters in the District of Columbia, being desirous of establishing a jurisdiction within themselves which should be independent of Maryland, applied to the Grand Chapter of Maryland and the District of Columbia for permission to dissever their connection with that body, and to form a Grand Chapter for the District of Columbia. This permission was formally granted, a convention was held, the warrants of the chapters were surrendered, a Grand Chapter was organized, and its grand officers were elected and installed.

Now, all of this having been done with the consent and under the authority of the Grand Chapter of Maryland, I know of no Masonic power on earth which can affect the action of that body, except the opinions of its sister grand chapters, expressed after due investigation in their various convocations. They might condemn its course; they might suspend all communication with it. Or, they might, as I think they undoubtedly will, declare that the act by which that Grand Chapter authorized the formation of a Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia was one of the wisest acts that it had ever performed, and one which will most pre-eminently tend to the preservation of the harmony and the increase of the prosperity of the Order.

The various grand chapters may do this. But where does the General Grand High Priest find his authority for intervening in the business of a sovereign and independent grand chapter? Where does he discover that hitherto unheard of prerogative which will entitle him to interpose his veto upon the formal acts of the Grand Chapter of Maryland? Not certainly in the Constitution of the General Grand Chapter. That body, useful as it is as a congress of grand chapters, triennially assembling for the intercommunication of Masonic views among distinguished Masons congregated from all sections of our vast territory, is really without any power of legislation that can influence or control, except by moral suasion, the conduct or proceedings of a State grand chapter. It has, to use its own language, "no power of discipline, admonition, censure, or instruction over the Grand Chapters." Stripped thus, by its own enactment, of all prerogative of coercive legislation, it can not confer that prerogative on its presiding officer, to be exercised during its recess. It has not attempted, in any clause of its Constitution, to confer such prerogative. It has only bestowed upon him the power to grant dispensations for new chapters in territories not occupied by a State grand chapter, and to give instructions in the work. The office of General Grand High Priest is one of great honor and dignity, but of little or no power, save over the few chapters established by the general grand body in unoccupied territories. There he has, to some extent, the power of a State Grand High Priest. But as to all other prerogatives or powers the General Grand Chapter, possessing none itself, has communicated none to him.

But I have been informed that the General Grand High Priest founds his claims to interfere with the organization of the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia upon the 9th section of the second article of the general grand constitution. But until I have the admission from himself, I will not believe that a companion of such acknowledged legal acumen as the present General Grand High Priest can have so mistaken the purport and application of that section. An examination of the context will show that it applies only to the organization of a grand chapter in some territory unoccupied by a State grand chapter, out of three chapters regularly instituted by warrants from the General Grand Chapter. In such an event the approbation of one of the first four general grand officers is required. No one denies this. But the chapters in the District of Columbia which formed a State grand chapter were located in a part of the territory of the Grand Chapter of Maryland, derived their warrants from that body, and were Masonically in allegiance to it, and to it only. In their acts and doings the General Grand High Priest could have no voice. He had no power to form them into a grand chapter, and he had no power to prevent such formation. The Grand Chapter of Maryland alone had the right to express an opinion as to the legality or illegality of such a transaction. In fact, in the subject under review, the General Grand High Priest is an unauthorized intervener between the Grand Chapter of Maryland and the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia.

The Grand Chapter of the District of the Columbia is seated on a vantage ground which, in my opinion, the General Grand High Priest can not approach. It presents to him a dilemma, on either horn of which he must be transfixed.

The Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia is either a legal grand chapter, or it is a clandestine one. If it be legal, then it is entirely out of the jurisdiction of the General Grand High Priest, because it has not become a constituent of the General Grand Chapter. He has no more connection with it, officially, than he has with the Grand Chapter of Florida or Virginia. But if it be clandestine, then the Grand Chapter of Maryland, whose territory and jurisdiction it has invaded, is the only Masonic authority which is competent to take cognizance of the matter. That body might declare another grand chapter established within its jurisdiction to be clandestine, and might expel its adherents. But the General Grand High Priest would be required, under the constitution of the body which he represents, to keep out of the family quarrel.

In conclusion, it appears to me that this is not a dispute between the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia and the General Grand High Priest, but between that officer and the Grand Chapter of Maryland, whose prerogatives he has undertaken to assume.

For my own part, when I consented to act as the installing officer of the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia, I looked only to the action of the Grand Chapter of Maryland to guide and control me. Until the Grand Chapter of the District was constituted I was in the jurisdiction of the Grand Chapter of Maryland. There the General Grand High Priest was without substantial power. When the Grand Chapter of Maryland gave its consent to the forthcoming organization, I sought permission from no one else. And in these views I confidently anticipate that I will be supported by the opinion of the whole Royal Arch Fraternity, who will be slow to believe that the Grand Chapter of Maryland would consent to the organization of a clandestine body within its jurisdiction.

I remain yours, fraternally,

Expulsion.

Fulton, Ill., August 31, 1867.

H. G. Reynolds:

Dear Bro.—At a regular communication of Fulton City Lodge No. 189, August 12, Barrzilla Cottle, a suspended member of this lodge, was expelled, and his expulsion ordered to be made public.

Now, the facts in the case are these: during the late war Dr. Cottle left his family at Fulton and went South, and remained until the war closed, when he returned, and, after disposing of his property, he and his family left, giving out that they were going to Brazil, South America, and his whereabouts has been unknown since that time. By evidence received, it appears that Dr. Cottle resided in Montgomery county, Texas, in 1865, and that he made a Masonic acquaintance by having an old traveling certificate from this lodge, and that while there he was married to a lady of that county, and that he got possession of $1,700 in money belonging to the estate of a former husband, and left her and her infant destitute when he returned to this place.

The said Cottle is a man about 5 feet 10 inches tall; dark hair, mixed with gray; florid complexion; upright form; a good talker, and by profession a physician.

Any person knowing of the whereabouts of the said Cottle will confer a favor by communicating it to the Secretary of Fulton City Lodge No. 189.

Yours fraternally,
Jacob Brown.

Impostors.

G. Lodge of F. and A. M. of Wisconsin,
G. Sec. Office, Milwaukee, August 25, 1867.

H. G. Reynolds, R. W. G. Sec.:

Dear Sir and Bro.—There appears to be a man traveling through the country and imposing upon the Fraternity by soliciting aid from the various lodges. He represents himself to be a member of Washington Lodge No. 141, Erin, St. Croix county, Wis., and sometimes Erin Lodge, and at others Liberty Lodge, all located at Erin, St. Croix county. He calls himself John Mitchell—John Denis—J. L. Edgerton; he probably has a name for every place he visits. There is no lodge of any name at Erin, St. Croix county. There is no doubt in my mind that said John Denis, alias, &c., is an impostor, and if you will notice the fact in The Trowel you will confer a favor on the Fraternity at large.

Fraternally yours,
W. T. Palmer, G. Sec.

Our Foreign Exchanges.

We have received La Chaine d' Union of Aug. 1st and 15th, Le Monde Maconnique for August, Die Bauhutte for July and August, the Masonic Record for Western India for July, and the Indian Freemason's Friend for April and May.

We take the following from Le Monde Maconnique:

The annual Congress of the "Society for the reformation of German Masonry" met at Worms on the 8th of June last. The principal object of the reunion was to submit to the assembly a project for a constitution which could be accepted universally by Masonry. The proposed constitution contained twenty-two paragraphs, which were all adopted, with some insignificant modifications, except one, which was considered useless. It was then decided that the project, thus modified, should be communicated to all the grand lodges of the world, accompanied by a declaration setting forth the necessity of rendering more efficacious and real the union of Masons of all parts of the world.

The Freimaurer Zeitung contains an address of the Eclectic Grand Lodge of Frankfort to the King of Prussia, on the occasion of the anniversary of his birthday. A correspondent of the same paper, writing from Nuremburg, in Bavaria, says: "The efforts of the Prussian party to reunite the lodges of the recently annexed countries to the Masonic center sitting at Berlin, can not fail to produce a separation between the lodges of the South of Germany and those of the North. This separation will be the more unfortunate for Prussian Masonry, as the same party which urges annexation is most particularly hostile to the admission of non-Christians, and to the formation and existence of Israelite lodges."

The Zeitung also reports that a Tyrolean farmer, a Mason, living at Schoppernau, has been obliged to quit that village on account of having written a novel in which he described the customs of the inhabitants of the forest of Bregenz and denounced some abuses that existed.

The Masonic Mirror announces that Helim Pasha is about to be named Grand Master of the district of Egypt, and thinks this measure will have the excellent effect of consolidating Masonry in the East.

The constituent assembly which met at Naples in conformity to the circular issued by Garibaldi, the authenticity of which is no longer doubted, was not as numerously attended as it might have been. We do not know the number of Masonic lodges in Italy, but, from what was said by the delegate of the lodge Italie-Une, only one-third of Italian Masonry was represented. After an examination of its powers and before proceeding to the nomination of a Grand Master, a number of the Bulletin Maconnique, the organ of the Edificateurs, was distributed among the members of the Assembly. It contained the following lines:

"We have delayed for several hours the publication of our Bulletin, in the hope that that Masonic unity so much desired and defended by us would be at last proved; but, contrary to all previous views, we can announce to the Masonic world that the nomination of Garibaldi as Grand Master, the only way to conciliation possible, by means of intrigues that we refrain from qualifying, is prevented; that of Bro. Cordova is already established."

This caused considerable commotion among the delegates, and, upon a ballot being taken, Bro. Cordova received forty-seven votes against seventeen.

Garibaldi was named honorary Grand Master by acclamation.

It is difficult, at present, for us to give a well-formed opinion as to the character of the Constituent Assembly of Italy, but it is clearly established that Masonic unity in Italy is desired by all. Why, then, is it so difficult to accomplish? Is it to be supposed that the jealousies and rivalries of provinces and cities are the obstacles? The Italians have given too many proofs of patriotism and disinterestedness during and since the achievement of their independence for one to rightfully suppose them incapable of sacrificing particular interests to the general interest. If there is so much trouble in establishing this accord, it is owing, let us believe, to other causes. Let us not forget that for some years Italy was more divided. In each province different ideas sprang up, and to-day each obedience assigns a different object to Masonry. The one sees in it a fraternal society for mutual assistance—for charity; the other, a philosophic, philanthropic, and humanitarian society; some wish to make it a religion; some would wish to join Masonry to the public life, and make it a society which, abandoning the pure theory, should have a practical action. From this divergence of tendencies are born, it appears to us, the greater part, at least, of the difficulties that prevent the establishment of Masonic unity in Italy.

Our readers have certainly not forgotten a recent occurrence, which is a disgrace to the nineteenth century, published in most of the journals. Some Jews were expelled from Romania, and transported to the Turkish bank of the Danube. Repulsed by the Turks, these unfortunates were finally precipitated into the river, where a number found their graves. If we are to credit a letter from Braila to the Freimaurer Zeitung, the Freemasons in Romania are threatened with similar treatment.

In the last number of le Monde Maconnique we reproduced an article announcing that in several cities in Greece the populace had committed the most violent excesses against the Freemasons. Here are some new indications which have come to us on the same subject: "In the city of Patras, on Sunday, June 16th, a number of pamphlets against the Freemasons were distributed to the men who came out of the church after the services of the day, that is to say, about noon. Immediately, two or three hundred individuals, obedient, without doubt, to instructions given and accepted in advance, attacked the house of a peaceable citizen, described as the head of the Freemasons of the city, and, after having demolished and broken everything they could find in it, committed it to the flames. The fire communicated to a neighboring house, and in a few minutes it also became a prey to the devouring element. The unfortunates, also exposed to the fury and fanaticism of an ignorant populace, with difficulty escaped the poniards of their persecutors, and had only time to take refuge upon a foreign vessel, which they fortunately found in the harbor. The work of destruction was completed in about half an hour, when the police appeared, and succeeded, after much effort, in dispersing the mob, which threatened to plunder and burn the houses of all the Masons in the city. Many of them were attacked in their houses, pursued in the streets, and only owed their safety to their personal courage.

From the Masonic Record of Western India.

Provincial Grand Lodge of Western India.—The proceedings of the quarterly communication of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Western India, held on the 29th June, 1867, and which we publish elsewhere, will be read with peculiar interest. The cause for so much discontent, which was increasing daily, is at last about to be removed, and fraternal affection once more restored between the Grand Lodge of Scotland and the daughter lodges in Western India. This most desirable object, we are informed, has been attained through the instrumentality of an article which appeared in the Masonic Record for April, and which is characterized as "reflecting, in very severe terms," upon the manner in which the affairs of this Province have been conducted by the officials of the Grand Lodge of Scotland.

Had it not been for the prompt communication of R. W. Bro. L. Mackersey, which arrived just a few days before the quarterly communication, Scotch Masonry in Western India would have suffered considerably, by the final resignation of the very popular Provincial Grand Master, the dissolution of the Provincial Grand Lodge, and the brethren of the sister lodges left to shift for themselves, like sheep without a shepherd.

What a contrast there was between the meeting of the 30th March and that of the 29th June; the former was gloomy and dispiriting, whilst the latter was full of hope and joy, thanks to R. W. Bro. Mackersey's letter; the brethren congratulated each other on the crisis they had passed, and all—those even who never snuffed before—patronized the splendid "Scotch Mull," the munificent gift of R. W. Bro. Manockjee Cursetjee. By the way, we must here give a brief description of this same "Scotch Mull," for the name must be a puzzle to all but Scotchmen: It is a sheep's—or rather a ram's—head, richly mounted with silver; on the crown of the head is a silver cellar filled with snuff, with a spoon and lid; the head rests on four silver castors to move about on a table; the curved horns are beautifully varnished and tipped with silver, and the wool is in the highest state of preservation; the only thing artificial about it is the eyes. The name of the donor and that of the Provincial Grand Lodge is engraved on the plate. Altogether, it is a piece of art well worthy of inspection.

The banquet was all that could be wished; the cheerful proceedings of the meeting appeared to have lent its influence here also. The announcement of the approaching departure of R. W. Bro. Barton from Bombay was received by the brethren with mingled feelings of regret and joy; although he will be greatly missed in his accustomed seat at the quarterly communications, yet the prospect of his visiting the Grand Lodge of Scotland to demand the rights so long denied to this Province, will in some measure reconcile the brethren to his temporary absence.

There are 1,500 famine orphans in Bengal, who will cost 200 rupees each, on the average, for the next five years.

The Eagle's Nest.

"Hurrah! Will Welling, I've such a piece of news for you; I would tell it to no one but you!" exclaimed Roger Bolt, as he met his favorite companion, with a face flushed with pleasant excitemant.

"What's the news?" asked Willie, with eager curiosity.

"I've found out where the eagle's nest is!" replied Roger, his eyes sparkling, as if he had discovered a diamond mine.

"You don't say so!" exclaimed Willie, looking just as much interested as his companion.

"I do, though; I'll tell you how it was: just come this way with me, under the steep crags," said Roger, drawing Willie along by the arm. "You know that Sir John shot the male eagle two days ago, and offered a reward of a guinea to whoever should take the nest, as the eagles have done such mischief amongst the young lambs. Well, thinks I, I'll watch; and so I did—I played truant from school all yesterday."

"What did your mother say to that?" asked Willie.

"Oh! who minds what she said?" answered Roger, carelessly; at which Willie looked grave. "At last," continued the boy, "I saw the big mother-eagle just at sunset come and drop down where her nest must be; just there—don't you see?" and he pointed about half way up the high rocky crag.

"I see nothing there but a little brown bush."

"That's the place; the nest must be just behind that brown bush, for its where the bird disappeared, and there's where she flew out this morning. Now don't you think that you and I could climb up and get that nest while the mother is away?"

"It would be rare fun to try!" cried Willie.

"It won't be easy work," observed Roger; "the eagles were cunning birds to choose such a nook for their nest."

"Well," cried Willie, eagerly, "you just wait till I've been to the town and bought the things which my mother bade me get, and you and I will set to climbing at once."

"I've no notion of waiting for you or any one else," said Roger; "now's the time to clamber up, while the fierce old bird is away. Put off your tiresome shopping till we've carried off the nest."

"I can not put it off," said Willie Welling, "for mother bade me go directly; I ought not to stand talking with you here."

"I never knew such a chap as you," cried Roger Bolt, with impatience: "if your mother tells you to do a thing, you do it as if your life depended upon it. Why, my mother has forbidden me ever to attempt to climb up that cliff; if she has done so once, she has done so a dozen times—but I shall climb up this hour for all that."

"If my mother had forbidden me, I would not climb," said Willie with decision.

"Then a pretty Molly you would be," cried Roger, shrugging his shoulders with scorn.

Willie Welling flushed at the taunt. "Roger," he said, "it is written in the Bible, Children, obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right;" and without stopping longer, since delay was disobedience to his mother's command, Willie with quick steps walked away.

"I don't care one straw either for his words or his example," muttered Roger; "though I'm sorry not to have his company and help in a difficult adventure like this. But certainly I won't stop for his nonsense. I never knew a fellow like Willie—always thinking of duty, and of what he ought or ought not to do. He makes himself a slave to his mother, and she's not half so nice a one as mine. Why, my mother, she never thinks anything good enough for me: she'd rather dine on a crust than not give me my bit of meat every day; while Willie's mother—but never mind about all that," said Roger to himself, as the thought of his own parent's kindness did not make it seem a more right and dutiful thing to break her command; "my business now is with the nest. 'Twill be a pretty tough bit of climbing to reach that brown bush at that height."

So Roger, who was a strong and active boy, began mounting the rocky steep, clutching at every tuft or twig that could help him in his ascent, digging his foot or his knee into every cleft, or clinging to every projection that could give him an upward lift. It was wonderful how, with pulling, and struggling, and scrambling, he managed to rise higher. Of course, Roger could not go up in a straight direction: he had now to bend to the right to catch hold of a bough, now to turn to the left to take advantage of a jutting-out stone; and as it was impossible for him to keep the brown bush in view while he was straining every muscle in climbing, he was a good deal afraid that, with all his efforts, he might not be able to find it.

"I wish that stupid Will had been standing below, he would have called out and directed me," thought Roger, as at last he stopped to take breath, after having done what he felt to be—wonders. "I've got up a tremendous height from the road, but I've not a notion whether I should climb to the left or the right. I don't see, though, that I've much choice which way to go, for that ledge above me is the only footing I can reach from here, and my limbs are aching so terribly now, and my arms are so tired, that I shall hardly have strength to clamber up there. Oh dear! dear! how my heart goes thumping! my face glows like fire, and I don't know when I shall get back my breath! Never mind, 'faint heart never won fair lady'—when once I stand on that ledge, I shall be able to look about me. I dare say I'm close to the nest."

Making an effort, the almost exhausted boy did manage to get upon the ledge; but he found it a good deal narrower than he either expected or liked, and the rock above it rose for eight feet almost as straight as a wall, only, alas! leaning a little outward. Even if there had been any little hole in this rock-wall in which a skilful climber might have found foot-hold, a great projecting bit of crag just above it completely stopped all progress. Not a goat could have mounted higher in the direction which Roger had taken. The boy, already tired out, now became very much frightened.

"I can't get up, and O! how can I possibly get down!" he gasped forth. For the first time since he had begun his ascent, Roger glanced downwards, and, heated as he was, that glance made him shiver with fear. The lonesome road looked so terribly far below him, his brain seemed to reel at the sight, and he dreaded to gaze down again. To get down, poor Roger felt was quite as impossible now as to clamber up higher: he could not see where to set his foot, and if he should slip and fall, he knew that he would be dashed in pieces! It was horrible to the boy to find himself standing half-way up the great cliff, on a ledge but six inches broad, with not so much as a bunch of grass to hold by, and so tired that he felt ready to drop! To add to Roger's misery, it seemed to him that the ledge on which his life depended was not itself very firm. He fancied—perhaps it was only fancy—that it was beginning to tremble under his weight! Roger dared not shake it by changing his posture from standing to sitting, as he would otherwise gladly have done; he was almost afraid to shout out for help, lest the vibration caused by his voice should hasten the fall of what might be only a loose fragment of stone, ready to fall crashing down with the wretched boy whom it now supported!

Roger's position soon grew to be one of agony! He called at last, loud and more loudly; but no sound was heard in reply but the echo of his own voice from the rock. The spot was so little frequented, that no one might pass by for hours, and for how many minutes longer would his power of endurance or the strength of his little ledge last! Roger had cried in vain for help from man; at last he gasped out a broken prayer to God. But the boy had hitherto cared little for religion, and he had no right to expect the same comfort from it as if he had made it his guide and his joy. Nay, instead of comfort, religion brought now to Roger only a new cause of terror. He might be, he knew it, very near death—his poor crushed form might shortly be lying where he did not venture to look; and where would his soul be then? Was he not engaged in an act of sin at that very moment—disobeying his God because disobeying his mother? Children, obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right, rang in the ears of poor Roger.

He had a thousand times gone against the wishes of his mother—so often that his conscience had grown quite hard on the subject, and he had not dreamed that he was bringing himself under the wrath of God; but now Roger's sins appeared to him in a clearer, more terrible light, than they had ever done before. And O! how bitter to him was the remembrance of the love which he had slighted! what he would have given to be sure that he should ever look on the face of his mother again, and have another opportunity of trying to make her happy! Roger might have been her joy and comfort, but he knew—too well he knew—that many a grief had he caused the tender heart that loved him so well. In his misery the boy cried to God to have mercy upon him, to spare him a little longer, that he might try to be—what he never yet had been—a dutiful son to his mother.

Suddenly the sound of a voice below startled and sent a thrill of hope through Roger.

"Holloa! Roger! you up there!"—he knew the voice of young Welling.

"O Will!" he almost shrieked, "quick! quick! call help! I can't get either up or down—my strength is going—the ledge is trembling; if you're long, I'll be dashed to bits!"

"Hold on! I'll run for help!" shouted Willie.

Then a long, long silence succeeded, when every minute that passed seemed like an hour to Roger. He could not think what could detain Willie; nor could he imagine how any one could manage to help him down, as no ladder could possibly reach him.

At length Roger again heard a welcome voice; this time not from below, but from above.

"Shout, that we may know where you are, for we can not see you, Roger." The poor boy eagerly obeyed.

"Don't be afraid; we've got up another way to the top of the cliff with a famous long rope, and we're making a noose at the end, that you may slip it round you and be safe."

"If it does not come soon, all will be over with me!" cried poor Roger.

Down came the noose over the rock, within sight of the boy, but alas, not within reach of his hand. The projecting crag kept it full seven feet distant from Roger, who could no more touch it than if it had been seven miles off instead!

"I can't reach it; O, what shall I do!" yelled out the agonized boy.

Quickly the rope was drawn up; another dreadful pause succeeded; then something dark came suddenly over the crag: it was Willie himself, fastened to the rope, holding the noose-end in his hand.

"If I throw it, can you catch?" cried Willie, in a tone so cheerful and hearty that it gave new courage to Roger.

"O, throw it, and quickly!" he exclaimed.

Willie threw, and Roger caught the rope, almost overbalancing himself as he did so. With trembling hands he passed the noose round his waist; he dared not have trusted his life to his power of clinging. It was well that he had not done so, for the moment that, at a signal from Willie, the men above began pulling up the rope, the exhausted lad fainted away!

Willie, of course, knew nothing of this; he only knew that Roger was safely hanging below him, and would soon be hoisted with him to the top of the cliff. Willie had been in such haste to descend to the help of his poor companion, that he had not observed, when first let down, that he was passing a little brown bush; but now he uttered a joyous shout, which made the men above pause in their pulling.

"Hurrah! Roger, hurrah!" shouted Willie, eagerly catching at the bush; "here's the very nest, the eagle's nest, with the downy, gaping little monsters in it. I've got it; hurrah! I've got it! no more lambs shall they have for their prey!"

As Willie's hands were both free, he was able with a little difficulty to secure the large nest, with two downy young eaglets in it.

"All right—pull away now," he shouted.

In a few minutes both the boys were drawn to the top of the crag. Willie naturally felt pleased and triumphant, but his joy was instantly damped when, on being released from the rope, he saw poor Roger, pale as death, stretched on the rock beside him.

"No fears for him," said one of the men; "he'll do well enough; just dash a little water in his face; we'll take him home to his mother."

These last words reached the ear of poor Roger, who was slowly recovering. "O, yes—to my mother; take me to my mother," he repeated, scarcely conscious of what he was saying.

Home to his parent Roger returned; Willie ran on before to her cottage, to prevent her from being alarmed by an exaggerated report of the danger of her boy. She hurried forth in tender anxiety, and met Roger walking, looking pale and grave, but not otherwise the worse for his fearful adventure. The men had gone back to their work; only Willie was present at the meeting between the mother and son.

"O! my boy, why did you attempt to climb that cliff, when I had so often warned you against doing it?" cried Mrs. Bolt, in a tone of tender reproach, as she took her rescued son into her arms.

Roger's pale cheek flushed as he said, "Will you forgive me, mother?"

Mrs. Bolt was surprised at the question, it was, alas! the first time that she had ever heard such words from her son.

"Forgive you, my child!" she exclaimed, "I never thought of chiding you; I am only too thankful for your preservation."

"I owe it, under God, to Willie," said Roger.

Mrs. Bolt turned and thanked Willie Welling, with tears in her eyes; he had not even mentioned to her the part which he had taken in rescuing his friend.

"I'm glad that you'll have the guinea from Sir John, Will," said Roger.

"I don't reckon it as my due," cried Willie; "it was you who found out the eagle's nest, and you should have the reward."

"I will never touch a farthing of it!" exclaimed Roger, with vehemence; and then he added, more calmly, "No, no, Willie, you've well earned the guinea."

"At least we'll divide," suggested Will.

"Yes, we'll divide thus," replied Roger: "You shall have the reward, and I the lesson, which is worth a great deal more, I take it, than all the money Sir John can give. I hope that to the end of my days I'll never forget the command which I nearly lost my life from neglecting to day—Children, obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right."—Childrens' Treasury.

Faber's Lead-Pencils.

Every school-boy in America has seen lead-pencils bearing the name of A. W. Faber, but all do not know where they are made, the amount of labor bestowed upon them, or the difficulty of manufacturing a really good article. I visited yesterday, in the village of Stein, three miles from here, this famous manufactory, and perhaps a few historical notes in relation to it may not be uninteresting to your readers.

In the year 1760, Kasper Faber settled in this little village, and commenced the manufacture of lead-pencils. During his life the quantity made was not so great but that the products of the week's work could be taken on Saturday in a basket to Nuremberg and Furth for sale. His son, Anton Wilhelm, whose name the pencils now bear, did not increase the business, and his grandson had little better success. On the death of the latter, in 1849, his son, the present proprietor, then twenty years of age, succeeded to the business. This young man had then been spending three years in Paris, working at his trade, and devoting himself to improving the method of making pencils. Conceiving that he had made an important discovery, he returned home, and with the greatest difficulty, by mortgaging all the estate that had fallen to him, succeeded in borrowing $80, with which to commence business. He expended this small sum in making pencils according to his new method, which consisted in part in giving them different degrees of hardness, a thing before unknown, which he distinguished, as at present, by numbers. He took these to Munich and other cities, where they were tried by the best artists, who were so mnch pleased that they gave him very flattering certificates; but on returning to his home he found the proceeds of his $80 expended, and he had no other resource than to try the banker who had already befriended him. The banker, on learning that he had not brought the money to pay his obligation, denounced him as a swindler, and sent him away. The young man, however, afterwards succeeded, by means of his certificates, in regaining his confidence, and received from him another small sum.

From that time he continued to enlarge his works and extend his business, until now over five hundred persons are employed, not including a large amount of labor outside of the factory, making weekly 225,000 pencils. He has taken his two brothers into the business, one of whom has the management of a house in New York, to which the leads, ready for setting, are taken from here. He is now considered as a millionaire, and has been made Baron by the King of Bavaria, and given a seat in the councils of the kingdom. Such instances of success are not very uncommon in America, but they are so rare here as to be regarded as a sufficient ground for a grant of nobility. The cedar for the wood of the pencils is brought from Florida, no other having yet been found suitable. The graphite is mixed with clay, and after being ground and moulded into the shape in which it is used, is subjected for several hours to a very great heat. The darker and lighter shades, and the different degrees of hardness, depend upon the amount of clay and the degree of heat to which it is subjected. Only the granular graphite found at Borrowdale, Cumberland, England, is suitable for first-class pencils. Ninety-two sets of stones, about the size of common mill-stones, are required to be kept constantly in motion to grind the lead for Faber's works.

There are many manufactories of pencils in and near this city, employing in all from 5,000 to 8,000 persons, and making over 220,000,000 annually.—Utica Herald cor. from Nuremberg.

The Masonic Trowel.

"The grand object of Masonry is, to promote the happiness of the human race."--Washington.

VOL. VI. SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS, NOV. 15, 1867. NO. 11.

Selected Poetry.

The Bread of St. Jodokus.

To prove how pure a heart his servant bore,
One day the Lord to St. Jodokus' door
Came begging bread, in garments worn and poor.

"Good steward," spoke Jodokus, "give him bread."
"One loaf alone remains," the steward said;
"For thee and me, the faithful dog beside."
"Give!" said the saint; "will not the Lord provide?'

The steward marked the single loaf with care,
And cut four pieces, each an equal share.
Then to the beggar, in no friendly tone,
"One each for thee and me, the abbot one,
One for the dog, since I can but obey."
Jodokus smiled; the beggar went his way.

Not long, and in yet wretcheder disguise,
Once more the Lord asked bread with pleading eyes.
"Give him my piece," Jodokus gently said;
"The Lord provides." The steward gave the bread.

Again the Lord beside the threshold stood,
And, faint with hunger, begged a little food.
"Give him thy portion," thus Jodokus said;
"The Lord provides." The steward gave the bread.

A little while, and naked, blind, and lame,
The fourth time came the Lord, and begged the same.
"Give the dog's piece," the holy man replied;
"The Lord, who feeds the ravens, will provide."

The steward gave. The beggar left the gate,
And a voice cried aloud, "Thy faith is great!
Thy Lord hath proved his servant's loyalty—
As thou hast trusted, be it done to thee!"

The steward looked, and in the tranquil bay,
Behold! four laden ships at anchor lay.
Far up their sides the water's dimpling line
Broke round their holds well stored with bread and wine.

Joyful the steward hastened to the strand,
And saw no man upon the vessels stand;
But on the shore a snow-white banner waved,
Whereon in golden lines these words were graved:

"Four ships he sends who doth the raven feed,
To him who hath four times supplied his need.
One for the abbot (did the list begin);
The steward and the dog like portions win;
The fourth is for the sender's needy kin!"

THE SYMBOLISM OF SACRED PLANTS.

As Developed in Freemasonry and the Kindred Institutions of the Ancient World.

BY ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D.

XV.

THE OLIVE.

The olive tree, the zait of the Hebrews and the elaia of the Greeks, is an evergreen plant, which among the ancients was of two kinds—the domestic and the wild. The former is the olea europea, and the latter the olea sylvestris, of the botanists. They differ from one another not so much as the cultivated apple does from the crab. The former, in general simply called the olive, is of moderate height, with a knotty trunk, a smooth bark, and leaves that are of a dark green color on the upper surface, and still darker underneath. Martyn, the distinguished botanist, thinks that the two species are nearly identical, and Cruden says that the wild olive differs from the cultivated only by being smaller in all its parts. At all events, the two were so indiscriminately used by the ancients for sacred purposes that they may very properly, as well as conveniently, be considered under the same head in reference to their symbolic character.

The olive, like the palm, had an extensive habitus, growing all along the shores of the Mediterranean, and furnishing its fruit to the inhabitants of three continents. It was originally a native of Asia, but was introduced into Europe at so early a period that the precise time of its introduction is unknown. "In the western world," says Gibbon, "the olive followed the progress of peace, of which it was considered the symbol. Two centuries after the foundation of Rome, both Italy and Africa were strangers to that useful plant; it was naturalized in those countries, and at length carried into the heart of Spain and Gaul." From its eventual diffusion among so many nations, it came at length to be equally revered by the eastern and western nations of antiquity.

Among the orientals, it was considered as a symbol of peace and the cessation of strife. This character is ~~undoubtedly derived~~ from the beautiful incident of the dove returning to Noah, after the subsidence of the deluge, with an olive leaf in her bill—"an emblem," says Adam Clarke, "of the restoration of peace between God and the earth." And the same writer adds that "from this circumstance, the olive has been the emblem of peace among all civilized nations."

By the Greeks and the Romans, this symbolism was always retained. The Kerux of the former, the Fetialis of the latter, the herald, whose duty it was not only to declare war but also to proclaim peace and to take the preliminary measures for effecting a cessation of hostilities, bore, as the insignia of his office, an olive branch adorned with garlands. The ancients derived this custom from a tradition that Mercury, observing two serpents fighting, separated them with his staff, which was a stick of olive bound with garlands, and which he carried as the herald or messenger of Jupiter. Hence, a staff thus decorated was adopted as an emblem of peace. Subsequently, in reference to this action of Mercury, the two garlands were replaced by two serpents, and thus the simple olive wand became the origin of the caduceus, the well known attribute of Mercury, and which, under the same name, was borne by the ancient heralds when engaged in their ministrations of peace.

The olive branch was also one of the insignia of the goddess of peace, to whom temples were consecrated by both the Greeks and the Romans, that in the via sacra at Rome being the most magnificent of all the public edifices of the city. The goddess was represented holding a branch of olive and a caduceus in her hands, and is so depictured on many of the ancient medals. On a medal of the Emperor Augustus, Peace holds in one hand a branch of olive, and in the other a lighted torch with which she has just fired a pile of martial trophies, indicative of the extinction of war. On a medal of Servius Galba, she is seated on a throne, holding in her right hand an olive branch and supporting herself on a club. On one of Vespasian, she is surrounded by garlands of olive leaves, and has for her attributes a caduceus, a horn of plenty, and ears of corn, to indicate that plenty is the companion of peace.

The olive was consecrated by the Greeks to the goddess Athena, the Minerva of the Romans, and the myth which accompanied this consecration is thus told by Apollodorus:

The Gods were resolved to select cities for themselves where they should be specially worshipped. Poseidor, or Neptune, was the first to reach Attica, where he smote with his trident and made a sea spring up in the midst of the Acropolis. Athena followed, and, calling Cecrops to be a witness that she took possession of the land, she planted an olive in the temple of Pandrosus. Zeus then appointed the twelve gods as judges, by whom the land was adjudged to Athena, ~~and the city Athens was~~ called after her name. In the temple of Erectheus, the most revered of all the sanctuaries of Athens, was an olive tree said by the ancients to have been the identical one which had been planted by the goddess. Herodotus relates the tale that, when the city was captured by the Persians, this olive tree was burned with the rest of the temple; but when the Athenians subsequently went up to sacrifice in the remains of the sacred building, they found a fresh shoot from the olive tree, a cubit in length, which had sprung from the original trunk. Pausanias improves upon the story, and makes the shoot two cubits long upon the very day of the conflagration, and Pliny, with accommodating credulity, says that the tree was still flourishing in his time.

Lee, in his "Temple of Solomon," says that the olive was dedicated to Minerva because she was the fabled inventress of arts; and as oil is very useful in the arts which principally flourish in time of peace, therefore was the olive made the symbol of peace.

But the olive was also a symbol of victory. Thus the Romans had their corona oleagina, or "olive crown," which, according to Aulus Gellius, was bestowed upon any person through whose instrumentality, although not personally present in the action, a triumph was obtained.

We have, among the Greeks and the Romans, numerous instances of the bestowal of olive crowns upon victorious commanders. Thus, Herodotus and Plutarch both inform us that, after the battle of Salamis, the Lacedemonians assigned a crown of olive to Eurybiades. Miltiades claimed the olive wreath for his victory at Marathon. Julius Cæsar bestowed olive crowns upon his soldiers after victories which they had gained. In fact, we may learn from a passage in Aulus Gellius, that olive crowns were worn by the people at large in their triumphal festivities.

Since the olive was thus adopted as a symbol of victory, it is not surprising that it was used for a similar purpose in the sacred festivals of the ancients. The Olympic games, which were held in the plain of Olimpia and on the banks of the Alpheius, were the most distinguished of all the festivals of Greece. They were celebrated once in every four years, and lasted for five days. The contests consisted of various trials of strength and skill, such as foot and chariot-racing, boxing, and wrestling. In them the wealthiest and the poorest citizens of the State equally took part, and the victors were honored with a fame and glory which extended to their parents, their friends, and even to their country. Statues were erected to them in the consecrated grove which was in the immediate vicinity, and lyric poets immortalized their memory in burning strains of verse. Thus Pindar has consecrated, in his eternal odes, the names of many of the successful competitors; and Euripides did not think it beneath his tragic muse to commemorate the fact that Alcibiades had twice in one day won the olympic crown of olive. The only prize given in these contests to the conqueror was a wreath of wild olive, cut from the sacred grove of Altis. Palm branches and other tokens of triumph were placed in the victors' hands, but the olive wreath was the peculiar Olympic symbol of victory.

Hercules, whose club was made of olive wood, is said to have instituted these games, and to have introduced the olive into Greece from the banks of the Danube, for the purpose of bestowing it as the crown of victory in the festival which he had founded. Pindar, in his third Olympic ode, gives the poetic tradition that formerly no fair trees grew in the Peloponnessus, which was therefore without shade and subject to the scorching rays of the sun; but that Hercules, having visited the banks of the Danube, was thence sent by the goddess Latona to the country of the hyperboreans, where for the first time he beheld olive trees growing. Some of these he carried to Olympia, and having planted them around the hippodrome or race-course, thus formed the sacred olive grove of Jupiter.

"He th' hyerborean tribes and chieftains wild,
  That bend the knee before Apollo's shrine,
Peaceful besought; and with persuasion mild,
  To form his sire's capicious grove divine—
The conqueror's wreath—the stranger's shade—
  Won the fair plant."

Moore's Pindar, Olymp. iii.

Herodotus, that most delightful of the old historians, tells us this story in relation to the Olympic prize of victory:

When Xerxes was invading Greece with his Persian hordes, on one occasion a few deserters from Arcadia came into the imperial camp. The Persians brought them into the king's presence, who inquired of them, through an interpreter, what the Greeks were then doing.

"They are holding the Olympic games," was the reply; "viewing the sports of the athletes and the chariot races."

"And what," was the next question, "is the prize for which they contend?"

"An olive wreath," answered the Arcadians, "which is given to the victor."

Upon which a Persian noble exclaimed: "O ye gods! what manner of men are these against whom thou hast brought us to fight—men who contend with each other not for money, but for honor."

In the great Pathenaic festival, which was celebrated every five years at Athens, the victors in the games received a crown of olive leaves taken from the groves of Academus, the trees of which were derived from the sacred olive planted by Athena in the Erectheum.

The religious veneration paid by the ancients to the olive is in nothing more conspicuous than in this, that it was a favorite wood out of which to construct the statues of their gods. That of Athena, in the temple of Erectheus, was made of this wood, and the oracle at Delphi instructed the Epidaurians to make the statues of their deities of olive, on which occasion they sent, says Herodotus, an embassy to Athens to ask permission to cut the wood in Attica, because it was generally believed that the olive trees of Athens were more holy than any others.

Since the olive was considered as a religious tree, and devoted, as has been seen, to the use of the gods, it was natural that, like the laurel, it should frequently be used as the instrument of lustration or sacrificial purification, when in that sacred ceremony a green branch was dipped in the holy or consecrated water which was then sprinkled upon the object or person to be purified. As the ancients believed that a dead body was a source of religious pollution to all who approached it, it was deemed necessary that such polluted persons should be purified by the lustral waters, and on such occasions the olive branch was used as the instrument of aspersion, because it was supposed by its own sanctity to add to the efficacy of the ceremony of purification. Hence we learn from Virgil, that at the funeral obsequies of Misenus, after the body had been burned the priest Chorinœus sprinkled the holy water upon the attending crowd with a branch of olive:

"Old Cherinœus compass'd thrice the crew
  And dipped an olive branch in holy dew;
And thrice he sprinkled round; and thrice aloud
  Invoked the dead, and then dismiss'd the crowd."

And now this religious use of the olive, in the sacred rite of lustration or purification, will lead us consequently to what was really its primary and most important symbolism. Its character as a symbol of either peace or victory was in fact only secondary and incidental to that more important symbolism which belonged to it in common with so many other evergreen plants. Let us endeavor to trace this fundamental symbolism to its origin.

Lee, in his "Temple of Solomon," says that the olive "was of old, by reason of the durable nature of the wood of the tree, which by its unctuous matter resisteth putrefaction, in a great measure a emblem of eternity." But another and a better reason for this symbolic signification has been assigned.

The olive was believed to possess the power of renewal, even in limbs that had been lopped from the parent trunk and which were apparently dead. Theophrastus, in his "History of Plants," speaks of this peculiar quality, by which dead branches of olive, being planted in a moist place, will sprout and bear green leaves, and speaks of it as something so astonishing as to be compared to the sprouting of an old door hinge. Virgil, in his "Georgics," says: "nay, even after the trunks are cut in pieces, it is wonderful how an olive root shoots forth from the dry wood," and hence, in another place the same poet calls it vivax oliva, "the olive tenacious of life."

The learned R. Payne Knight, in his "Inquiry into the Symbolical Language of Ancient Art and Mythology," a work now most undeservedly scarce, says that as the property of not only casting its skin and acquiring a periodical renovation of youth, but also of pertinaciously retaining life even in amputated parts, may have suggested the serpent as a symbol of immortality, so the olive, from its being supposed to possess the same property, was adopted to express the same attribute. Hence the statues of many of the gods were crowned with it, because the preserving power or attribute of immortality was in some mode or other common to every personification of the divine nature. And so, too, when the victors in the Olympic games were crowned with branches of the wild olive, the garland was the trophy of victory consecrated to the immortal glory of the conqueror.

Lee has beautifully characterized this symbolism when applying it to the doors of the holy of holies in the tabernacle of Solomon, which, it will be remembered, were made of olive wood.

"As the olive," he says, "is fit for food and nourishment, it denotes that Christ, the green olive, yieldeth the food of eternal life to the saints, after they are once planted into him and partake of his fatness. The doors of the oracle bearing the resemblence of the saints' entrance into heaven, shows the conquest over the gates of death and the resurrection of their bodies to glory."

At length, then, we are prepared to understand the true symbolism of the caduceus or olive branch of the god Hermes. Hermes, or Mercury, was the messenger of Jove. Among his numerous attributes, one of the most important was that of conducting disembodied spirits to the other world, and, on necessary occasions, of bringing them back. He was the guide of souls and the restorer of the dead to life. Thus Horace, in addressing him, says:

"Unspotted spirits you consign
To blissful seats and joys divine,
And powerful with your golden wand
The light unburied crowd command."

Virgil also alludes to this attribute of the magic wand when he is describing the flight of Mercury on his way to bear Jove's warning message to Æneas:

"His wand he takes; with this pale ghosts he calls
From Pluto's realms or sends to Tartarus shore."

The history of this caduceus, or magic wand, will lead us to its symbolism. Mercury, who had invented the lyre, making it out of the shell of the tortoise, exchanged it with Apollo for the latter's magical wand. This wand was simply an olive branch around which were placed two fillets of ribbon. Afterwards, when Mercury was in Arcadia, he encountered two serpents engaged in deadly combat. These he separated with his wand; hence the olive wand became the symbol of peace, and the two fillets were replaced by the two serpents, giving to the caduceus its well known form of a staff around which two serpents are entwined.

Such is the legend; but we may readily see that in the olive, as the symbol of immortality, borne as the attribute of Mercury, the giver of life to the dead, we have a more ancient and profounder symbolism. The serpents, symbols also of immortality, are appropriately united with the olive wand. The legend only accounts for a later and secondary symbolism—that of peace.

The conclusion to which, then, we arrive, is that the olive, whether in the leaf brought back over the watery waste by the dove of Noah, where it is the symbol of peace, or in the Olympic crown, where it is significant of victory, or in the caduceus of Mercury, where it is the attribute of a life-restoring god, is, after all, in its primary meaning, the symbol of immortality. The peace is that rest that comes after "life's fitful fever" is over; the victory is that of eternal life over death. So, on the tombs of the early Christians in the catacombs of Rome, we often find the dove standing on a branch of olive, with the star of Bethlehem before it. It is to indicate the rest and peace which the doctrine of the resurrection taught those pious believers to hope for.

It is the old and oft-repeated story of the acacia, the laurel, the palm, and those other sacred evergreens of which we have already treated, and which, whatever may be their secondary meaning, always primarily refer to a resurrection to eternal life.

The Masonic Penalties.

BY ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D.

The adversaries of Freemasonry have found, or rather invented, abundant reasons for denouncing the Institution; but on nothing have they more strenuously and fondly lingered than on the accusation that it makes, by horrid and impious ceremonies, all its members the willing or unwilling executioners of those who prove recreant to their vows and violate the laws which they are stringently bound to observe. Even a few timid and uninstructed Masons have been found who were disposed to believe that there was some weight in this objection. The fate of Morgan, apocryphal as it undoubtedly was, has been quoted as an instance of Masonic punishment inflicted by the regulations of the Order, and, notwithstanding the solemn asseverations of the most intelligent Masons to the contrary, men have been found, and still are to be found, who seriously entertain the opinion that every member of the Fraternity becomes, by the ceremonies of his initiation and by the nature of the vows which he has taken, an active Nemesis of the Order, bound by some unholy promise to avenge the Institution upon any treacherous or unfaithful brother. All of this arises from a total misapprehension, in the minds of those who are thus led astray, of the true character and design of vows or oaths which are accompanied by an imprecation. It is well, therefore, for the information both of our adversaries—who may thus be deprived of any further excuse for slander, and of our friends—who will be relieved of any continued burden on their consciences, that we should show that, however solemn may be the promises of secrecy, of obedience, and of charity which are required from our initiates, and however they may be guarded by the sanctions of punishment upon their offenders, they never were intended to impose upon any brother the painful and—so far as the laws of the country are concerned—the illegal task of vindicating the outrage committed by the violator. The only Masonic penalty inflicted by the Order upon a traitor, is the scorn and detestation of the Craft whom he has sought to betray.

But, that this subject may be thoroughly understood, it is necessary that some consideration should be given to oaths generally, and to the character of the imprecations by which they are accompanied.

The obsecration, or imprecation, is that part of every oath which constitutes its sanction, and which consists in calling some superior power to witness the declaration or promise made and invoking his protection for or anger against the person making it, according as the said declaration or promise is observed or violated. This obsecration has, from the earliest times, constituted a part of the oath—and an important part, too—among every people, varying, of course, according to the varieties of religious beliefs and modes of adoration. Thus, among the Jews, we find such obsecrations as these: Co yagnasheh li Elohim, "So may God do to me." A very common obsecration among the Greeks was, isto Zeus or theon marturomai, "may Jove stand by me," or "I call God to witness." And the Romans, among an abundance of other obsecrations, often said, dii me perdant, "may the gods destroy me," or ne vivam, "may I die."

These modes of obsecration were accompanied, to make them more solemn and sacred, by certain symbolic forms. Thus the Jews caused the person who swore to hold up his right hand towards heaven, by which action he was supposed to signify that he appealed to God to witness the truth of what he had averred or the sincerity of his intention to fulfill the promise that he had made. So Abraham said to the King of Sodom, "I have lift up my hand unto the Lord * * * that I will not take anything that is thine." Sometimes, in taking an oath of fealty, the inferior placed his hand under the thigh of his lord, as in the case of Eliezer and Abraham, related in the 24th chapter of Genesis. Among the Greeks and Romans, the person swearing placed his hands, or sometimes only the right hand, upon the altar, or upon the victims when, as was not unusual, the oath was accompanied by a sacrifice, or upon some other sacred thing. In the military oath, for instance, the soldiers placed their hands upon the signa, or standards.

The obsecration, with an accompanying form of solemnity, was indeed essential to the oath among the ancients, because the crime of perjury was not generally looked upon by them in the same light in which it is viewed by the moderns. It was, it is true, considered as a heinous crime, but a crime not so much against society as against the gods, and its punishment was supposed to be left to the deity whose sanctity had been violated by the adjuration of his name to a false oath or broken vow. Hence, Cicero says that "death was the divine punishment of perjury, but only dishonor was its human penalty." And therefore the crime of giving false testimony under oath was not punished in any higher degree than it would have been had it been given without the solemnity of an oath. Swearing was entirely a matter of conscience, and the person who was guilty of false swearing, where his testimony did not affect the rights or interests of others, was considered as responsible to the deity alone for his perjury.

The explicit invocation of God as a witness to the truth of the thing said, or, in promissory oaths, to the faithful observance of the act promised, the obsecration of divine punishment upon the jurator if what he swore to be true should prove to be false, or if the vow made should be thereafter violated, and the solemn form of lifting up the hand to heaven or placing it upon the altar or the sacred victims, must necessarily have given confidence to the truth of the attestation, and must have been required by the hearers as some sort of safeguard or security for the confidence they were called upon to exercise. This seems to have been the true reason for the ancient practice of solemn obsecration in the administration of oaths.

Among modern nations, the practice has been continued, and from the ancient usage of invoking the names of the gods and of placing the hands of the person swearing upon their altars, we derive the present method of sanctifying every oath by the attestation contained in the phrase "so help me God," and the concluding form of kissing the Holy Scriptures.

And now the question naturally occurs as to what is the true intent of this obsecration, and what practical operation is expected to result from it. In other words, what is the nature of a penalty attached to an oath, and how is it to be enforced? When the ancient Roman, in attesting with the solemnity of an oath to the truth of what he had just said or was about to say, concluded with the formula, "may the gods destroy me," it is evident that he simply meant to say that he was so convinced of the truth of what he had said that he was entirely willing that his destruction by the gods whom he had invoked should be the condition consequent upon his falsehood. He had no notion that he was to become outlawed among his fellow-creatures and that it should be not only the right, but the duty, of any man to destroy him. His crime would have been one against the divine law, and subject only to a divine punishment.

In modern times, perjury is made a penal offense against human laws, and its punishment is inflicted by human tribunals. But here the punishment of the crime is entirely different from that inferred by the obsecration which terminates the oath. The words "so help me God," refers exclusively to the withdrawal of divine aid and assistance from the jurator in the case of his proving false, and not to the human punishment which society would inflict.

In like manner, we may say of what are called Masonic penalties, that they refer in no case to any kind of human punishment; that is to say, to any kind of punishment which is to be inflicted by human hand or instrumentality. The true punishments of Masonry affect neither life nor limb. They are expulsion and suspension only. But those persons are wrong, be they mistaken friends or malignant enemies, who suppose or assert that there is any other sort of penalty which a Mason recreant to his vows is subjected to by the laws of the Order, or that it is either the right or duty of any Mason to inflict such penalty on an offending brother. The obsecration of a Mason simply means that if he violates his vows or betrays his trust he is worthy of such penalty, and that if such penalty were inflicted on him it would be but just and proper. "May I die," said the ancient, "if this be not true, or if I keep not this vow." Not may any man put me to death, nor is any man required to put me to death, but only, if I so act, then would I be worthy of death. The ritual penalties of Masonry, supposing such to be, are in the hands not of man, but of God, and are to be inflicted by God, and not by man.

Lodges in Upper Rooms.

BY ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D.

The practice of holding lodges in the upper rooms of houses is so constant that, in all my experience, I have no knowledge of a single instance in which a lodge has been holden in a room on the first floor of a building. The most apparent reason for this—the one that probably nine persons out of ten would assign as the true and only one—is, that security may be obtained from being overseen or overheard. And hence, in his "Book of the Lodge," Dr. Oliver has said that "a Masonic hall should be isolated, and, if possible, surrounded with lofty walls. As, however," he continues, "such a situation in large towns where Masonry is practiced can seldom be obtained with convenience to the brethren, the lodge should be formed in an upper story."

This, as a practical reason, will to most Masons be sufficient. But to others who are more curious, it may be well to say that for this custom there is also a mystical reason of great antiquity.

Gregory, in his "Notes and Observances on some Passages of Scripture," published in 1671, says: "The upper rooms in Scripture were places in that part of the house which were highest from the ground, set apart by the Jews for their private oraisons and devotions, to be addressed towards Solomon's temple." This room received, in the Hebrew language, the appellation of Alijah, which has been translated by the Greek huperoon, and improperly by the Latin cœnaculum. The Hebrew and the Greek both have etymologically the signification of an upper room, of one in an elevated position, while the Latin appellative would give the idea of a dining-room or place for eating, thus taking away entirely the sacred character of the apartment.

The Alijah was really a secret chamber or recess in the upper part of a Jewish house, which was strictly devoted to religious uses. Hence the pious observers of the law were called by the Talmudists beni alijah, or "the sons of the upper room." In the treatise Succah, it is said "I beheld the sons of the upper room, and lo! they were few." This is explained in the commentary on the passage as meaning that "the sons of the upper room are those who present themselves before the Shekinah, or God's presence, in the sanctuary."

Thus in the 104th psalm, verses 2 and 3, the Psalmist speaks of God as stretching out the heavens like a curtain, and laying the beams of his chambers in the waters; where in the original the word here translated "chambers" is the plural of alijah, and should be more properly rendered "his secret chambers—" an allusion, as Dr. Clarke thinks, to the holy of holies of the tabernacle, but really to this secret chamber or upper room in which religious service or worship was performed.

Again, in the Second Book of Chronicles (ix., 3, 4), it is said that when the Queen of Sheba had seen the wisdom of Solomon and the house that he had built, his provisions, servants, and cup-bearers, "and his ascent by which he went up into the house of the Lord, there was no more spirit in her;" the word which our translators have rendered "his ascent," is again this word alijah, and the expression, if correctly rendered, would be "his upper room," or "his secret chamber," the one by which, through a private way, he was enabled to pass into the temple.

On the advent of Christianity, this Jewish custom of worshiping secretly in the upper room was adopted by the apostles and disciples, and the New Testament contains many instances of the practice, the word alijah being, as I have already remarked, translated by the Greek huperoon, which has a similar meaning so far as reference is made to loftiness of situation. Thus, in Acts i., 13, we find the apostles praying in an upper room. And again, in chapter xx. the disciples are represented as having met at Ephesus, in an upper room, where Peter preached to them. But it is unnecessary to multiply citations. The evidence is complete and satisfactory that the Jews, and after them the primitive Christians, performed their devotions in the retirement and secrecy of upper rooms. And the care with which the word alijah, hupcroon, or upper chamber, is always used to designate the place of devotion, abundantly indicates that any other place would have been deemed improper.

Hence we may trace the practice of holding Masonic lodges in upper rooms to this ancient religious custom, and that, again, has no doubt some connection with the idea of a sacred character, always given by the ancients to "high places." We may now understand why our lecture says that our ancient brethren met on the highest hills.

Our Foreign Exchanges.

We have received the Bulletin of the Grand Orient of France for June, July, August, and September, Le Monde Maconnique for August, September, and October, and La Chaine d' Union as late as October 15.

The Bulletin is filled with a detailed account of the proceedings of the General Assembly of the Grand Orient, which met last June, and contains a long account of the banquet held on the 15th of June.

At the banquet, almost every Grand Lodge was represented—the following officially: Scotland, Guernsey, Belgium, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Grand Lodge of Concord (Frankfort), Grand Orient of Italy, Switzerland, Provincial Grand Lodge of Bombay, Argentine Republic, New Grenada, Brazil, Peru, Netherlands, Portugal, Saxony, Hamburg, Darmstadt, Mexico, Hayti, Prussia; from the United States, Indiana was represented by Breth. Martin, L. Pierce, Robert Breckinridge, and Robert Earl; Louisiana, Bro. Santine; Massachusetts, Marshall P. Wilder; Ohio, John C. Wagner; New York, by its representative in the Grand Orient.

There were also present a large number of brethren from foreign jurisdictions, not official representatives. Among these we note the following: E. E. Dervey, California; Pickels, North Carolina; John Cooke, Julius Barkhouse, Kentucky; Hills, B. Simons, Arthur Lovassy, Bela Lovassy, Louisiana; Cummings, Curtis Gould, Forristall, J. M. Usher, Massachusetts; J. Alexander, Herring, King, Morehouse, Henry Romertz, Terry, New York; G. Marshall, Ohio.

All were received with appropriate ceremonies.

The banquet hall was draped with the flags of all the nations which permitted Masonic lodges to assemble freely, and about one thousand Masons joined in the feast.

The first toast was to the Emperor and the Imperial family, with which were coupled the rulers of all those States which protected Masonry; the second, to the Grand Master of France and all foreign Grand Masters. Between the toasts, speeches were made, and music enlivened the scene. The orchestra executed a unique medley, comprising the national air of each country represented at the banquet. As usual, the charity-box circulated just before the close.

On the first of September last, Albert Lengle, Deputy Grand Master of the Grand Orient of France, and who was in fact the executive officer of the body, departed this life. He was appointed to the office by Marshal Magnan during his Grand-Mastership, and has occupied this important position for six years, during which period he gave unequivocal proofs of his devotion to the Order.

We take the following from Le Monde Maconnique, believing our readers take an interest in the condition of Masonry in Italy:

> The Official Bulletin of the Grand Orient of Italy divides Italian Masonry into four groups:
> 1st. The lodges comprising the Grand Orient of Florence, which, it says, is the only regular one, as it is the only one recognized by the Masonic powers of the two hemispheres. It is composed of one hundred and fifty lodges, professing the liberty of the rites, and having at its head Francois de Luca.
> 2d. The group of lodges of the Scotch Rite, with Garibaldi for Grand Master, having its center at Palermo, with some lodges and Masonic bodies in Sicily, and a half dozen lodges on the continent of the Italian peninsula.
> 3d. The seven or eight symbolic lodges having their center at Milan, with Bro. Ausonio Franchi at their head.
> 4th. The Central Supreme Council of Sicily, A. and A. Scottish Rite, presided over by the Prince of St. Elia, with a small number of lodges, very respectable, though not recognized, at Palermo.
> The three last groups not being recognized by foreign grand bodies, are regarded by the Official Bulletin as irregular. "They can not," it says, "be truly called Masonic, as they are not a part of the family of the Masonic world; but, out of regard to the high esteem which is due to their chiefs and to part of their members, they were invited to join with us in forming a single Masonic body in Italy, and to mingle, upon a footing of equality, in the General Assembly of Naples, with the lodges gathered around the Grand Orient of Italy. The Grand Masters Garibaldi and Luca published the call for the convocation, and the meeting took place on the 21st of June last. Grand Master Luca assisted in it, and presided; Grand Master Garibaldi was represented, the center of Saint Elia sent its adhesion; Bro. Ausonia Franchi sent his ardent wishes for the union.
> "The results of the assembly will fill with joy all honest Masons. Never has there been seen in Italy a larger concourse of delegates of lodges; never has an assembly deliberated with more dignity and fraternal good feeling. A great number of lodges, it is true, could not be represented on account of the sanitary condition of some portions of the country, and only a small number of the irregular lodges sent deputies. Some brethren protested in favor of isolation and a barren and impotent freedom, against the aspirations of an immense majority of the honest Masons of Italy, of all rites. To-day the group of the Central Supreme Council of Sicily is blended with the grand Italian communion, and the centers of Palermo and Milan can no longer pride themselves on having at their head the remarkable men who alone gave to them an appearance of existence. The unity of Masonry is virtually accomplished; upon us, Masons of Italy, devolves the duty of consolidating that unity."

THE Illinois Central railroad, in August, made $40,000 clear upon peaches alone. Its fruit business is large, and increasing rapidly. No road covers so many varieties of climate, and nowhere are they more promptly taken advantage of.

Generosity.

From the Voice of Masonry.

We present to the readers of the Voice the following correspondence sent from South Carolina, illustrating the charity of the Fraternity. It refers to a very costly and highly cherished jewel, which was purchased by Bro. Gorin and sent to Bro. Bruns, with the request that it be returned to its lawful owner:

DECATUR, Ill., Aug. 18, 1867.

R. W. R. S. Bruns, 32°, G. Sec. G. L. South Carolina, Charleston, S. C.:

DEAR SIR AND BRO.—I am in receipt of a letter from Bro. Timmerman Davis, who was in charge of your office during your absence, desiring me to send the jewel to you, as the family to whom it belonged resided in your city. Bro. Davis gets the impression from my letter that the Grand Lodge of Illinois had already taken action in regard to my action in purchasing the jewel from a jeweler, who had purchased it from a returned soldier. In this he is mistaken, as our Grand Lodge has not met since I came into possession of it, but I have no doubt that they will fully indorse my action at the communication in October. I to-day send by express the jewel, as directed by Bro. Davis, to be returned to the family of the distinguished brother whose name is inscribed thereon, hoping that the little history connected with it for the past few years may not detract from the interest that may have hitherto attached to it. I feel proud of being the medium through which this invaluable memento is restored, expressing the hope that the unhappy cause which has rudely torn from us many precious jewels, and hid them from the sight of those who prized them far above any made of gold or silver, may never distract our country again; but we have a lively hope that, through the mediation of the Redeemer of mankind, these jewels will be restored to us, and in the great day of accounts we shall see them purified, and their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb. May God preserve us from war and its desolating consequences, and may the healing wings of peace overshadow our entire country, and the brotherly love which once prevailed among the inhabitants of this great empire be restored, and excite us to deeds of charity and more exalted usefulness.

With sentiments of high regard, I am,

Fraternally,

J. R. GORIN,
Grand Master of Illinois.

CHARLESTON, Sept. 23, A. L. 5867.

M. W. J. R. Gorin, Grand Master, Illinois:

MOST WORSHIPFUL AND DEAR BROTHER—Your noble letter, restoring a jewel taken from this State during the late war, is in the right spirit of Masonry, and admirably illustrates the efficacy of our venerable Institution in promoting peace and good-will among men. It is to the great glory and triumph of Masonry that, while all our hemisphere has been rocking with the convulsion of civil war, while priests, forgetting their sacred offices, were preaching havoc in a style and with a vehemence becoming in utterance only before the shrines of Moloch, and while professing congregations of the church of God were forging spears for human massacre, Masonry held itself aloof from the councils of violence, and sought only with her assuasive acts to mitigate the ferocity of man and to soothe the asperities of strife. Both while the war was in progress, and now that it is happily over, we have the constantly recurring proofs among us, and in all quarters of our confederacy, of that loving temper, those close sympathies, that fraternal regard which contribute the living and vital essentials of our Order, as embodied in the faith which we profess, and the charity which shines pre-eminent our guiding light. Your independent action, without waiting upon that of the grand lodge over which you so happily preside, in the very restoration of one of the sacred jewels of the temple, is in proof of your perfect confidence in the fraternal spirit which prevails among your brethren. That the jewel thus restored to us is not the property of the Grand Lodge of South Carolina, but that of a citizen who was, while living, a most highly honored brother, does not impair or lessen the feeling of gratitude with which we receive it at your hands—simply that we may restore it to the representative of the family, one of the most esteemed among us, to whom it rightfully belongs. This, dear sir and brother, we shall do with equal promptitude and pleasure, and on behalf of the family, as of this Grand Lodge, I beg to return you our best thanks for the generous interest, the fraternal regard, and the true Masonic virtue which you have shown in this proceeding. I should do myself injustice, and injustice to our people at large, as well as to our Fraternity, if I failed to respond in cordial sympathy with what you have so eloquently said in the expression of your hope and faith in the future peace, prosperity, and harmony of our beloved country. I know of none within this jurisdiction to whom war is now or ever has been desirable; and surely in this age of great intellectual if not moral enlightenment, with a prosperity which has been so wonderful, it is monstrous that war should ever be thought of as the only remedy for human wrong, the only arbiter by which to decide upon human rights. What we need everywhere is that simple sense of justice so well taught by our Fraternity, which cheerfully renders to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and blends with justice the full faith that God will assure to his people who live under these laws the prosperity and peace which faith is authorized to seek and charity to secure. We all join in your prayer for the continued peace of our country; not that peace which merely forbears violence, but the peace which is born of good will, love, charity, and the virtues which not only never do wrong, but never think of wrong doing. Once more I refer to our noble Order as perhaps the only civil and religious institution in this country which has kept its charities warm and its virtues bright amid all the storms of war and faction in the past. Surely we may now rely upon the same Institution for helping to heal the wounds which war has made, and for lifting up once more those virtues which were beaten down by the hoofs of violence and passion. Let us struggle with new hope of usefulness in the future, seeing what noble charities our Order has exhibited in the past.

With sentiments of the highest respect and regard, I am, M. W., sir and dear brother.

R. S. BRUNS,
32°, Grand Secretary.

The Egyptian Rite of Memphis---Installation of Officers.

Crosby's Music Hall was last evening filled to its utmost capacity with an intelligent and fashionable gathering, assembled to witness an interesting Masonic event. This was the installation of four new bodies of the Egyptian Rite of Memphis by the officers of the Sovereign Sanctuary for this continent, who reside in this city. The names of the new bodies are Osiris Senate No. 1, Emanuel Senate No. 2, Alexandria Chapter No. 1, and Shamenoth Chapter No. 5.

Besides the stage, a considerable portion of the body of the hall was reserved for the exercises.

Shortly before 8 o'clock, the officers and members of the new bodies entered the hall, two-and-two, clad in the rich uniform of the rite and wearing swords. They ranged themselves on the sides of the altar, when the Sublime Grand Commander of Osiris Senate No. 1, Mr. Claude G. Avery, ascended to the stage and opened the senate and chapters in Masonic form. The Prelate of Osiris Senate, Mr. O. W. Barrett, read the prayer, and the Orator, Mr. G. A. Richardson, read a selection from the Scriptures. The ode, "Egyptian Masonry Divine," was then sung. The officers of the Grand Sanctuary then entered the hall clad in full regalia, the members of the new bodies receiving them with crossed swords, and ascended the stage in the following order:

Calvin C. Burt, 96, G. Master; J. Adams Allen, 96, Dep. G. Master; B. F. Patrick, 95, G. Representative; H. N. Hurlburt, 95, G. Orator; T. T. Gurney, 95, G. Prelate; H. W. Bigelow, 95, G. Sen. Warden; George McElwain, 95, G. Jun. Warden; Sam'l E. Underhill, 95, G. Sec.; D. R. Dyche, 95, G. Treas.; Rob. E. Story, 95, G. Conductor; Ira S. Younglove, 95, and Charles E. Leonard, 95, G. Masters of Ceremonies; Charles H. Brower, 95, G. Capt. of Guard; Frank H. Nichols, 95, G. Guard of the Town; L. K. Osborne, 95, G. Sentinel.

Here the Grand Master was addressed by G. Com. Avery.

After the reply of the Grand Master, the Grand Prelate, T. T. Gurney, read a prayer, and the officers of the Sanctuary descended to the altar, about which the members of the senates and chapters were ranged in order.

The ceremonies of installation were performed by the Deputy Grand Master, J. Adams Allen, M. D., L. L. D., and by the Grand Secretary, Mr. S. E. Underhill.

The Grand Master then delivered his charge to the officers installed, when the Grand Captain of the Guard, Mr. C. H. Brower, delivered his proclamation.

With this the ceremonies of installation were virtually concluded.

Deputy Grand Master Allen was then introduced to the audience, and proceeded to address them on the Art of Masonry and its objects. The address of Dr. Allen was a most happy and eloquent effort, and held the assemblage wrapt in the deepest interest throughout.

At its close the choir sang the closing ode, "Almighty Father, God of Love," when the benediction was pronounced by the Grand Prelate.

After the conclusion of the exercises, Dr. Allen was presented with a beautiful Masonic ring, in behalf of the officers of the installed bodies, by Grand Commander Avery. Dr. Allen responded in a few fitting remarks, and the gathering broke up.

The following is a list of the officers installed:

Osiris Senate No. 1.—Sublime Grand Commander, Claude G. Avery; S. Kt. Interpreter, Thomas W. Blayney; J. Kt. Interpreter, Edward Addy; Kt. Orator, Gordon A. Richardson; Kt. Prelate, Oscar W. Barrett; Kt. Recorder, Nathan W. Dalton; Kt. of Finance, John V. R. Rossman; Kt. Archivist, Fred. A. Ray; Kt. Marshal, Charles S. Crane; Kt. of Introduction, Thomas Cromlish; Kt. Accompanier, John H. Peck; Kt. Captain of the Guard, Moses Ray; Kt. Sword Bearer, C. C. Brierly; Kt. Guard of the Sanctuary, J. W. Lyon.

Emanuel Senate No. 2.—Sublime Grand Commander, R. E. Storey; S. Kt. Interpreter, G. W. Montgomery; J. Kt. Interpreter, J. A. Van Buskirk; Kt. Orator, S. E. Underhill; Kt. Prelate, G. L. Smith; Kt. Recorder, J. L. Marsh; Kt. of Finance, H. B. Horton; Kt. Archivist, E. H. Cutler; Kt. Marshal, J. S. Thompson; Kt. of Introduction, T. N. Holden; Kt. Accompanier, E. N. Breeden; Kt. A Husband's Confession.

I never undertook but once to set at naught the authority of my wife. You know her way—cool, quiet, but determined as ever grew. Just after we were married and all was going nice and cozy, she got me in the habit of doing all the churning. She never asked me to do it, you know, but then she—why it was done just this way: She finished breakfast rather before me one morning, and slipping away from the table, she filled the churn with cream, and set it just where I couldn't help seeing what was wanted. So I took hold regularly enough, and churned till the butter came. She didn't thank me, but looked so nice and sweet about it, that I felt well paid. Well, when the next churning day came along, she did the same thing, and I followed suit and fetched the butter. Again and again it was done just so, and I was regularly in for it every time. Not a word said, you know, of course. Well, by-and-by, this began to be rather irksome. I wanted she should just ask me, but she never did, and I couldn't say anything about it to save my life, and so on we went. At last I made a resolve that I would not churn another time unless she asked me. Churning day came, and when my breakfast—she always got nice breakfasts—when that was swallowed, there stood the churn. I got up, and standing a few minutes, just to give her a chance, put on my hat and walked out of doors. I stopped in the yard to give her time to call me, but not a word said she, and so, with a palpitating heart, I moved on. I went down town, up town, and all over town, and my foot was as restless as was that of Noah's dove. I felt as if I had done a wrong—I didn't exactly feel how—but there was an indescribable sensation of guilt resting upon me all the forenoon. It seemed as if dinner time would never come, and as for going home one minute before dinner, I would as soon have cut my ears off. So I went fretting and moping around town till dinner hour came. Home I went, feeling very much as a criminal must when the jury is out, having in their hands his destiny—life or death. I couldn't make up my mind exactly how she would meet me, but some kind of a storm I expected. Will you believe it? she never greeted me with a sweeter smile, never had a better dinner for me than on that day; but there stood the churn, just where I left it! Not a word was said; I felt confoundedly cut, and every mouthful of that dinner seemed as if it would choke me. She didn't pay any regard to it, however, but went on just as if nothing had happened. Before dinner was over I had again resolved, and shoving back my chair, I marched to the churn and went at it, just in the old way. Splash, drip, rattle, splash, drip, rattle—I kept it up. As if in spite, the butter never was so long in coming. I supposed the cream, standing so long, had got warm, and so I redoubled my efforts. Obstinate matter—the afternoon wore away while I was churning. I paused at last, from real exhaustion, when she spoke for the first time: "Come, Tom, my dear, you have rattled that buttermilk quite long enough, if it is only for fun you are doing it!" I knew how it was, in a flash. She had brought the butter in the forenoon, and left the churn standing with the buttermilk in, for me to exercise with. I never set up for myself in household matters after that.

SALT LAKE CITY.—This singular town covers an area of about nine square miles—that is, three miles each way. It is one of the most beautifully laid out cities in the world. The streets are very wide, with water running through nearly every one of them. Every block is surrounded with beautiful shade trees, and almost every house has its neat little orchard of apple, peach, apricot, and cherry trees. In fact, the whole nine square miles is almost one continuous orchard.

THE Spragues of Rhode Island are estimated to be worth $25,000,000. This amount has been mainly accumulated by manufacturing enterprises.

James Herring.

CLARUM ET VENERABILE NOMEN.

When the announcement was made by us last week, that James Herring was dead, it seemed as if a pall had been cast over the Fraternity among whom he had so long and faithfully labored, and by whom he was so universally beloved and respected. In making that sad announcement, we promised to further allude to it this week, and do not think we can better redeem the pledge than by furnishing the Craft with a reliable historical sketch of that exalted Mason and honest man.

Our deceased friend and brother was born in London, England, on the 12th of January, 1794, and was educated under the watchful eye of his father, after whom he was named, and who instilled into him the feeling of interest for the American Republic, then just called into existence, which he himself felt for her institutions. At the house of his father, in London, lived, for some time, John G. Eitchorn, well known as an antiquarian and critical writer on the Bible, and it was him who first called the attention of the son to the Masonic Fraternity, of which he was himself an active member.

In 1805 the family emigrated to New York, and the subject of our sketch finished his education at the academy in Flatbush, Long Island. In 1816 he was initiated in Solomon's Lodge, Somerville, New Jersey, and, once a member of the Fraternity, he soon made his influence felt. He removed to New York in 1822, and was soon actively engaged as an officer in the different Masonic bodies. He was Master of Clinton Lodge No. 143, in 1834, which lodge, in December of that year, he united with St. John's Lodge No. 1. On the 3d of September, 1828, he was appointed Assistant Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of New York, and June 3d, 1829, was elected Grand Secretary, which office he retained until 1846; and, from 1849 to 1858, he acted as Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of which Isaac Phillips was Grand Master, and commonly known as the "Phillips," or "Herring Grand Lodge."

His reports on Foreign Correspondence, which he originated, form an important part of the printed transactions of the Grand Lodge, and were read with instruction.

In 1832 he was elected General Grand Secretary of the G. G. Chapter of the United States; and in the Grand Encampment of New York, he filled the following offices: Deputy Grand Master, 1829–32; Grand Master, 1834; Grand Prelate, 1836–39. At the grand celebration on the occasion of the G. G. Encampment in New York, in 1842, he officiated as Grand Orator of the Grand Lodge. He was General Grand Recorder of the G. G. Encampment from 1829 to 1835, General Grand Generalissimo from 1835 to 1841. He was present as a delegate at several meetings of the G. G. Encampment, and also a member of the Supreme Council, 33°, (Cerneau), and one of the founders of the Lodge of Strict Observance No. 94, in 1844.

In appreciation of his great merits, the Grand Orients of France and Brazil named him their Representative near the Grand Lodge of New York. He was also honored with honorary membership in numerous lodges and Grand Lodges.

In 1821 he delivered an oration at Flemington, N. J., taking as his text the Bible verse I John, 3, 13, which drew down upon him the attacks of the orthodox portion of the Fraternity, who took offense at his having drawn the Holy Writ into a Masonic discourse.

The great Anti-Masonic movement brought out in full force all the mental energy of our deceased friend. He stood firm as a rock while the hurricane of destruction leveled the greater number of the lodges in the State; and the lodges in the city, as well as the Grand Lodge itself, are indebted to him for their salvation during that stormy period. In spite of threats and dangers he managed to induce the lodges not to cease their regular meetings; he encouraged the surbordinate lodges keeping alive the connection with other Grand Lodges, that were more particularly exposed to persecution, while he bravely combated the most ferocious attacks of the press.

The troubles within the Grand Lodge in 1837, which were the cause of the creation of St. John's Grand Lodge, found Bro. Herring the Grand Secretary of the former body, and, as such, playing an important part during that eventful period, a part which caused him many enemies. In the same year, June 7, 1837, he delivered the eulogy on Grand Masters Elisha W. King and Jacob Morton, in St. Matthew's Church, Walker street, N. Y., at which we were present. It was about this time our late brother organized that extensive system of correspondence with foreign Grand Lodges, in particular with those of Scotland, Hamburgh, Frankfort on Main, Saxony, Switzerland, France, the Netherlands, Prussia, &c., and which has since become of so much benefit and importance, its usefulness being almost universally acknowledged.

On the 24th June, 1840, Bro. H. pronounced the oration on the festival of St. John the Baptist, before Apollo Lodge No. 13, Troy, in the second street Presbyterian Church of that city, which was shortly afterwards published.

The rapid increase of lodges made it appear desirable that a hall should be built, to be devoted exclusively to the purposes of Freemasonry. Bro. H., in 1842, originated a plan to collect funds for that object, in connection with the founding of an Asylum for indigent Masons, or their widows and orphans. The Grand Lodge adopted the plan, and since then the fund has reached over $200,000, chiefly through the care and watchfulness which he extended over it, and which he did not relax, even during the term of the separation from 1849 to 1858.

On the 23d February, 1847, Bro. H. delivered the oration in a Lodge of Sorrow convened by St. John's Lodge No. 1, in memory of their deceased members, Past Grand Masters Morgan Lewis and A. H. Robertson, and others, which has been published; and ten years later, he officiated on a similar occasion, the Sorrow Lodge being convened in memory of the deceased Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Saxony, Karl G. T. Winkler, the transactions of which were published in English and German.

During the agitation of the question as to the prerogatives of Past Masters, which caused so much trouble between the city lodges on one side, and those from the rural districts on the other, Bro. H. was one of the leaders of the former, adhering firmly to the letter of the law, and when in 1849 the separation into two Grand Lodges took place, he still stood up firmly for his views of the case, and happily defended the same against all attacks. The Grand Lodge whose cause he espoused was frequently called after his name. Of his polemic writings, the following merits particular attention: "Historical Narrative, Explanation, and Vindication of the Course Pursued by the Grand Lodge of New York in relation to the Unmasonic and Unconstitutional Attempt of a Portion of their Body to Revolutionize the Organization thereof," which was published and forwarded to their sister Grand Lodges throughout the world by his Grand Lodge.

Since the re-union of the two Grand Lodges in 1858, our deceased brother has rather retired from active Masonic life, though on several occasions prior to his departure for Paris, France, where he died at his daughter's residence, Oct. 8th, he gave the benefit of his ripe experience to his brethren in Grand Lodge, and which was always listened to with respect, even if his wise and conservative views were not, as they might with advantage, have been adopted.

In 1842 he commenced a work, "An Introduction to the study of Masonic Jurisprudence," but was prevented from completing the same by others appropriating the plan he had conceived. A portrait painter by profession, he published "The National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans," in 1832; the portraits and part of the biographies were by himself. Some public Masonic tribute is due to his memory, otherwise, the Craft in New York will fail in their duty.

> "Peaceful he sleeps, with all our rites adorn'd,
> For ever honored, and for ever mourn'd."

—New York Courier.

THE AGED MASON.—In no class of persons does Freemasonry appear so charming, upon none does it sit with so much grace and dignity as upon the aged. To such, it is truly a crown of glory. I always feel like doffing my hat in the lodge-room, even when I am presiding as Master, when an old man comes in. I have paid many a grateful prilgrimage to the graves of aged Masons. The influence of the aged in Masonic workings is deservedly large. Our Order having so much of a traditionary character, this is both natural and creditable to the members.

Isaac Bartlett, P. G. M.

Of Indiana, died in Logansport, in that State, on the 9th of September last, aged sixty-seven years. We made the acquaintance of Bro. Bartlett at the Grand Lodge of Indiana in 1846, and our acquaintance was intimate and pleasant to the close of his life. We could say much of Bro. Bartlett—he was a good man and true, a faithful friend, a devoted Mason; but the brethren of his own lodge have furnished us with just what we needed for the occasion, and we adopt it in preference to anything we could say:

Bro. Bartlett, whose death we deeply deplore, and whose many Masonic and social virtues we honorably cherish, departed this life, after a brief illness, at his late residence, on Monday night, September 9th, aged 67 years. His remains were followed to their last resting-place, in Mount Hope Cemetery, on Wednesday, by a large procession of sympathizing brethren, relatives, and friends. The last ceremonies were performed at the grave by M. W. Grand Master H. G. Hazelrigg, in a most solemn and impressive manner.

Bro. Bartlett came to Logansport in the spring of 1833. He removed from Washington City, where he had made the acquaintance of Gen. John Tipton, then U. S. Senator from Indiana. He was employed by Bros. Higgins, Carter, and others, as a clerk, in which capacity he remained until he was elected Township Trustee, a position he well and faithfully filled for several years past. He quietly performed the duties belonging to him as a brother Mason and citizen, and was constant and untiring in his labors in behalf of the sick and afflicted, and the worthy poor ever found in him a benefactor and friend. He was an old and respected member of the Masonic Fraternity, being one of the oldest members of this lodge, and has filled most of the official positions of the lodge, and was Secretary thereof at the time of his death. His daily walk fully carried out and illustrated the precepts of the Order. He had occupied the most important positions in the Grand Lodge, and possessed the respect of its members throughout the State. He acted as Junior Grand Warden pro tem. of the Grand Lodge in 1839, and was chairman of the Committees on Dispensation and Foreign Correspondence, and was elected Deputy Grand Master the same year, which position he filled until 1845, when he was elected M. W. Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of the State, and served one year with honor and credit to himself and the Order. During a long period he was a faithful attendant at the annual communication of the Grand Lodge, taking a laborious part in the duties of chairman and member of various important committees. In 1841 he acted as Grand Master pro tem., and attended the 50th annual communication of the M. W. Grand Lodge of the State, held in the Grand Lodge at Indianapolis, commencing May 28th, A. D. 1867, A. L. 5867, and the published proceedings thereof bear honorable mention of his name. He was an industrious worker in the Masonic cause, and his efforts and lectures in its behalf through the then new counties of Cass, Miami, and Carroll, are still remembered by some of the older brethren residing here.—Cincinnati Review.

Bro. JOHN W. SIMONS was the recipient, a few evenings ago, of a Grand Steinway Piano, at his residence in Brooklyn. We regretted our necessary absence.

This was a well deserved compliment to our brother, and a recognition of his services in behalf of Americus Lodge. W. Bro. Reeves E. Selmes, in an appropriate speech, made the presentation in behalf of the lodge.

Bro. Simons expressed himself as being specially pleased that, in selecting the honorarium, the brethren had chosen an article pleasant and useful to the wife and little ones, rather than to himself, because it might be considered in some sort as a recompense for their deprivation of his company while engaged in the duties of Masonry, to which he has so earnestly, and for so many years devoted himself. He said that so frequently and so liberal were the Masonic calls upon his time, that he had under serious consideration the propriety of furnishing his children with copies of his photograph, that they might be able to recognize him when from time to time they met him by accident. It was, however, pleasant to know that in many ways the brethren appreciated his efforts in their behalf, and in that appreciation he found the strongest incentive to perseverance. He concluded by warmly thanking the givers for their splendid present, assuring them that himself and children would ever bear in grateful remembrance the munificence of Americus Lodge.

The company of ladies and gentlemen was large, and they had a good time in social intercourse and in the partaking of a bountiful collation. The well known vocalists, Miss Sims and Mrs. Coleman, sung some of their best songs.—National Freemason.

The Four Cardinal Virtues.

Conscience—the most divine and noblest of all senses—is implanted to regulate our highest powers, our affections, and deliberate designs of action; by it we discern what is graceful and becoming, beautiful and honorable, in the affections of the soul, in our conduct of life, our words, and actions. The mind feels most joy in performing and reflecting upon such duties as it recommends. What is approved of by this sense we count right and beautiful, and call virtue. Virtue, therefore, arising from the most divine sense, must necessarily be, and is, the best and most beautiful of all human attributes, and, as a natural sequence, that science which pre-eminently teaches virtue to its initiates is the highest of all human sciences. Virtue inculcates glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good will towards men; inspires a high relish for moral excellence, and a strong endearment of heart towards all in whom we discern eminent virtues, and raises joyful love, esteem, and veneration when we observe it in others. Without it a man does not live. He merely passes away his allotted time on earth, but of the joys or sorrows of life, even of life itself, he has no conception. In the fulfillment of its precepts our chief good consists. It being the foundation of morality, and the pleasures of morality being the highest and most enduring, virtue may be said to be the very foundation of eternal happiness, both here and in the Eternal Lodge, where all the brethren hope to meet. It implants kind affections, urges us on to beneficent actions, and is a qualification of the mind subservient to our happiness, and denotes any habit that perfects the powers of the soul. Its constituents are disposition, skill, application, and force. Corresponding to these constituents, it is divided into four cardinal virtues, which are well known—viz.: prudence, fortitude, temperance, and justice.—London Freemason's Magazine.

Masonry Among the Indians.

Among the Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, Seminoles, and other southern Indian tribes, there has existed from time immemorial a secret fraternity of sworn friends, having signs, tokens, and words known only to themselves, and confined to the male population. The form of initiation is said to be simple, but their obligations to each other are held to be of the most solemn and binding nature through life. If one of the fraternity is in danger or trouble, his claim for the protection or aid of his brethren is not to be disregarded; and if at any time flight from enemies becomes necessary, he is at liberty to mount the horse of a brother and flee from his persecutors. I am informed by many intelligent Indian Freemasons, that there is enough in the ceremonies and obligations of this fraternity to justify the conclusion that it had a genuine Masonic origin, though at what period it is impossible to determine; perhaps centuries before this continent was known to the Anglo-Saxon race.

An instance is related to me by Judge Field, of the Cherokee nation, wherein a party of U. S. Commissioners, sent to treat with the Seminoles in Florida, early in the present century, when surrounded by enraged savages and about to be put to death, were saved by a half-breed attached to the Commission, who gave the mystic sign of the fraternity, which in a moment turned the fury of the savages into the warmest demonstrations of friendship. "The grand hailing sign," if not derived originally from genuine Masonry, answered every purpose in saving the lives of these white men, and who can say that it had not a true Masonic origin?

Another peculiar and striking feature in this Indian fraternity is found in the fact that, in starting out upon the hunt or war-path, the Indians form in groups of three, five, and seven, who, on such occasions, adhere to one another even to the death. These mystic numbers, three, five, and seven, are significant to Masons, and their existence among this Indian fraternity can not be supposed to be the result of mere accident, for they are traditional numbers, and are adhered to with the most scrupulous fidelity. If this custom is not a vestige of Freemasonry, the coincidence is at least somewhat remarkable, and it reminds us of the sworn friendship between Jonathan and David, anterior to the time Freemasonry assumed form under the Jewish fathers.

DeWitt Clinton.

In 1824, this eminent brother wrote as follows:

"A Mason is bound to consult the happiness and to promote the interests of his brother; to avoid everything offensive to his feelings; to abstain from reproach, censure, and unjust suspicions; to warn him of the machinations of his enemies; to advise him of his errors; to advance the reputation and welfare of his family; to protect the chastity of his house; to defend his life, his property, and, what is dearer to a man of honor, his character against unjust attacks; to relieve his wants and his distress; to instill into his mind proper ideas of conduct in the department of life in which he is called to fill; and, let me add, to foster his schemes of interest and promotion, if compatible with the paramount duties a man owes to the community. If such are the obligations which a man owes to his brother, they are precisely the duties that one Freemason ought to perform to another. Our Order enjoins them as rules from which nothing can justify a deviation, and considers their infraction a violation of honor, conscience, and religion; a prostitution of all that is deemed sacred and venerable among men.

"But Masonry does not confine the benignity of her precepts to her followers; she rises higher in the scale of excellence, and enjoins the observance of honor, honesty, and good faith to all men; she espouses the cause of universal-benevolence and virtue; she declares as unworthy of her patronage those who violate the laws of rectitude, and her votaries exememplify in their lives the truth of the remark that, although there be vicious men in the Fraternity, yet that they are better than if they were not Masons."

Masonic Precepts.

TALENT.—Attempt nothing, brother, for which the talent given thee by the Great Architect of the Universe is unsuited or insufficient.

PRESCIENCE.—Brother, prescience is part of thy reason; and thou hast sufficient prescience if thou wilt only rightly use thy reason. For does not thy reason inform thee that virtue will be rewarded, and vice will be punished, either in this world or in another? And is not this all the prescience thou needest for thy guidance in life?

TRANQUILITY.—Brother, let not thy tranquility depend on the amendment of another's faults.

ANGER AND INDIGNATION.—Brother, anger and indignation, when under the control of reason, are, in many circumstances, rather virtues than faults. There are instances of vice which may fitly call forth manifestations of anger: and, in like manner, there are instances of injustice which may fitly call forth manifestations of indignation.

SELF-EXAMINATION.—Brother, at night, before composing thy limbs for slumber, omit not self-examination. It is a custom which even the Pantheist-Metempsychosist could rigidly observe.

OUR UNDERTAKINGS.—Brother, in our undertakings we should pause before we begin anything which, when completed, may cause us sorrow.

TWO THINGS ANTAGONISTIC.—Brother, thou art a British merchant; know then, that two things are antagonistic—honest commerce and speculation.

ILL-GOTTEN WEALTH.—Brother, the son, if virtuous, avoids making the ill-gotten wealth of his father subject of boasting.

TEMPTATION.—Thy brother has been tried by temptation, and has done wrong. If thou hast not been tried by the like temptation, then thank the Great Architect of the Universe, and forbear to blame thy brother.—Magazine and Mirror (Eng.)

The Revival of 1717.

DEAR BROTHER COURIER:—I have often heard of the revival of Freemasonry in 1717. Will you be kind enough to inform me how, and by whom, it was brought about?

It was mainly brought about by Brother Desaguliers, who having intimated his intention of renovating the Society, soon found himself supported by a large number of active and zealous brethren; and as their names are worthy of preservation, we would state they were—Sayre, Payne, Lamball, Elliott, Goften, Cordwell, De Noyes, Varden, King, Morrice, Calvert, Ware, Lumley, and Madden. These included the Masters and Wardens of the four existing lodges which held their assemblies at the Goose-and-Gridiron, the Crown, the Apple-tree, and the Rummer-and-Grapes, and they succeeded in forming themselves into a Grand Lodge, and resumed the quarterly communications, which had been discontinued for many years; and having thus replanted the tree, it soon extended its branches to every quarter of the globe.—N. Y. Courier.

Benedict Arnold.

This celebrated man—infamously celebrated—was made a Mason in Hiram Lodge, at New Haven, Conn., which lodge is still in existence. A contemporary, in sketching its history, says:

> Over this lodge, which has continued its sessions without intermission for more than a century, have presided some of the most worthy and honored men of New Haven, and the catalogue of its members includes a great multitude. It is a singular fact, that while its roll is graced with the names of David Wooster and other patriots, it has also the name of Benedict Arnold, who, for his great crime of treason to his country, has covered that name with infamy. Yet a true Mason, who would give to each "according to his due," should be glad to know that even Arnold possessed some Masonic virtues. His patriotism and his bravery, up to the time of his great fall, were undoubted. He, more than any other man, turned the tide of battle at Saratoga, that decided the struggle for our national independence, so that Arnold was both the savior and the betrayer of his country. He had great faults before his treason, and he had great merits likewise. His care for and partial education of the children of the brave General Warren, the brother Mason who fell at Bunker Hill, should be greatly remembered by all Freemasons. Arnold was shamefully treated by the Continental Congress, by Gates and others, who were jealous of his fame; but he always found a steadfast friend in no less a brother Mason than George Washington. In deserting Washington and his bleeding country, the brilliancy of his fame was tarnished forever; and old Hiram could do no less than obliterate his name from her roll of members.—Freemason's Mag.

MASONIC SCHISMS.—Masons ought always to bear engraved in their hearts these noble words, pronounced by the Count Alexandre de Laborde, responding, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, on behalf of the visitors from the Grand Orient to the Supreme Council of France: "Differences may distinguish, but should not divide Masons; all dissension should be merged in the immutable principles of our beautiful Institution; in that equality that causes rank to be forgotten; in that love of human kind, which reminds us of our duties; in that reciprocal good-will that should bind all men together."

THE MASONIC TROWEL.—This able publication in the service of Freemasonry is published in monthly numbers, at Springfield, Ill., at $1.25 per annum. In its zeal for the good of the Craft, and the ability of its editorials, and diversity of matter interesting to Masons, it is second to no publication of the times. We thank Bro. Reynolds for the good words in behalf of the Olive Wreath. He is a Past Grand Master of the jurisdiction of Illinois, and is qualified to judge of the merits of Odd-Fellow publications.—Olive Wreath.

THE MASONIC TROWEL.

Annual Dues.

We have a few words to says and a few hints to give in regard to the collection and non-payment of dues, which will probably apply to other jurisdictions as well as to Illinois.

In the early days of Masonry in the West, and, very likely, in a large majority of lodges now, dues are charged by the quarter. This makes large work for the Secretary, frequent collections, and is liable to many objections which we do not care to name here. The lodges in this city have adopted the practice of collecting dues once a year. It is found to be far less laborious, to cause less friction, and to be financially much better than the quarterly system.

In Illinois, and we presume in all the Mississippi States, the elections of lodge officers are held mostly in December. In nearly all the lodge by-laws that have come under our observation, the non-payment of dues for a given length of time, say one year, is a forfeiture of the right to vote. This forfeiture creates a condition equivalent to bad standing, and should be avoided by all means, if possible.

The agreement to support and obey the laws of a lodge includes the obligation to pay dues, and a refusal to pay them is a violation of Masonic covenants, and creates a liability to Masonic discipline. Where the collection of dues is neglected until just about election time, considerable trouble, and oftentimes hardship, is the result.

Some good brethren are poor; some are unfortunate; some have been sick; and perhaps their bills are presented so closely upon election that inability, necessity, or pressing family demands, render it impossible to meet the just claims of the lodge. In this way, the non-paying brother is deprived of his right to vote, and, perhaps without any fault on his part, is reduced to the condition of bad standing. It should be the pride of every lodge to promote and preserve harmony, and keep its membership intact and in good condition as far as possible, consistently with its by-laws and Masonic usages. There is scarcely any man living but what can be cornered. Masons do not intend any such thing, yet such is practically the case in many instances, where a prudent foresight, careful management, and brotherly treatment might prevent.

In Colorado, Kansas, Missouri, Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, Minnesota, and Illinois, the grand lodges meet in October. Of course the financial year terminates some time previously.

This furnishes a hint which our lodges may act upon profitably. Let the by-laws of all lodges, where the elections are held in December, make provision for annual instead of quarterly collections, and let the fiscal year terminate on the last day of August in each year. Let there be a finance or auditing committee, who shall see that the accounts of every brother are properly posted and bills made out for unpaid dues by the Secretary at the close of the fiscal year. Require the Secretary to present these bills, within the month of September, to every one within reach of personal application or letter, and to repeat the same in October and November. In December, let all delinquents be served with written notice to appear on the night of election and pay their dues. By this patient and brotherly course, ninety per cent. of dues within reach will be collected, and in many instances the entire amount. Do not let an unpleasant word, an expression of impatience, or anything that will cause a painful reflection, escape the lips of any brother charged with this official duty, even in retort or reply.

It should be the constant study of all officers, to let fall no word that will disturb the harmony of the lodge.

In the West, no brother will "plead poverty;" many ought to do it, but their manliness shrinks at the idea. We have never known a Mason to do it. It is often in the knowledge of members that a brother can not and ought not to pay. In the absence of such a brother, square the books, and enjoin silence. If he offers to pay, take the money, for a refusal would wound his manhood and pride.

What shall be done with those who can and do not pay? Carry your lodge to the grand lodge untarnished, if you can. Try between December and June to collect the money; if not paid then, prefer charges at the June communication, and then, if not paid, try the brother and suspend him indefinitely in July; he then has from that time until August 31 to pay up, and avoid disgraceful return to the grand lodge as a suspended Mason.

Book Notices.

THE BOOK OF THE ACCEPTED SCOTTISH RITE OF FREEMASONRY, by Bro. Charles T. McClenachan, 33°, published by the New York Publishing Co., 432 Broome street, came while our Grand Lodge was in session, and arduous duties and want of time for examination prevented a notice in the October number; nor have we had time yet to give the work such attention as the importance of the subject and interests involved really demand.

It embraces 617 pages; has seven superior full page engravings, sixteen smaller ones, very beautiful, and a full representation of the clothing, jewels, furniture, working tools, weapons, and banners of the several degrees.

The work opens with a proem, history, and introduction. These are all modest in statement and short enough to insure perusal. Then follows the manual, from the fourth to the thirty-third degree. The manual seems to be full and clear; the whole book is printed on clear, white and thick paper, large and clear type, and, but for its weight, is a convenient working manual. The weight is no great objection, but it would prove inconvenient in some cases in working.

It is unlike the Cunningham Manual in many things, and does not conform generally to the order of the Rite as we received it. We do not say this to condemn or approve the work; we are not competent to that task; the Supreme Council alone is authorized to decide. It is probably framed with the view of meeting the disagreements between the northern and southern jurisdictions, and the disagreements existing in the north also. Whether any one man, or any few men, acting on their own responsibility, will be able to effect so desirable an end, is questionable. No one man is so powerful or potent in Masonry, however worthy or competent, as to be able to control conflicting views and opinions without investigation, argument, and deliberation. Before any manual can be framed which can meet even general approval, it will require the work of able men of different views, met in mutual council, there to compare opinions, modes of work, precedents, and history. Partisans and theorists will not succeed. Such men as Rockwell, Gardner, Palmer, Mackey, Woodbury, Lewis, Hillyer, Drummond, Carson, and Paige, would bring out a satisfactory work.

The book undoubtedly supplies a present want, and, we doubt not, is as perfect as conflicting systems will permit, and we hope it may have a profitable sale.

Ceremonies of constitution and installation follow the working-manual, together with much other valuable matter.

The book is defaced with a ceremony of baptism, which usurps the province of the church, and which the northern jurisdiction will reject. It will be sent from the publishing office free of postage, in cloth, gilt, for $5.00.

MACKEY'S MASONIC RITUALIST, is a pocket manual of 611 pages, "The Manual of the Lodge," "Book of the Chapter," and "Cryptic Masonry," or monitorial instructions from Entered Apprentice to Select Master; also, embracing the Ancient Charges, old constitutions, the Order of High-Priesthood, valuable forms, and complete dedication and installation ceremonies in the nine degrees. The work is valuable to the learner and student, and should be in every Mason's family for reading, learning, and constant reference. Valuable plates and engravings are interspersed through the book. Published by Clark and Maynard, 5 Barclay street, New York. Price, $1.60, postage paid from the publishing office.

How to Send Money.

In August last we gave notice that from and after the 31st of August we would not hold ourselves responsible for money sent by mail, unless it was sent by REGISTERED LETTER, POST-OFFICE ORDER, OR BANK DRAFT.

The letters that come to us saying that money has been sent by ordinary mail conveyance are numerous. We supply all we can for money sent before that time, and we make all such good on our books. But we can not carry the losses after that time. Our actual losses for money sent, which has never reached us, from December 15, 1866, to August 31, 1867, will not fall much short of five hundred dollars. No concern can publish such a paper as we do at $1.25 and carry such losses; so we urge on our brethren and friends, all who are now subscribers, to renew their subscriptions, without reference to the time that they expire, and pay to our agents who may have prospectuses, so that losses by mail may be avoided.

Advance Payments.

We started on the system of advance payment for THE TROWEL. Our very best friends advised us to carry over to the next year all who had paid for the previous year. We did so until the present volume, successfully. On the first of January last, we transferred to the volume for this year, over 3,000. These, added to such as have been carried over since, would make the whole number more than 4,000. Of this amount, at least 2,000 are unpaid, and we expect that nearly all of that sum is a total loss. This, with our losses by mail, and the expense attendant upon a thorough effort to collect unpaid subscriptions, leave us no margin whatever. We shall, after the December number, strike the name of every subscriber from our subscription list who does not renew when his subscription expires.

Chicago.

The Garden City is the wonder and enigma of all outside of it. Very few of its own residents have any adequate idea of its spread and growth. The action of its Board of Trade affects prices in our large cities. More railroads terminate in Chicago than in any other city in America. It is the leading grain, lumber, and meat market in the world. Its hotels and churches vie with those of the Atlantic cities. Its compact, systematic, and economical management of business can not be surpassed. Its public improvements are upon a scale of simplicity, utility, and grandeur unknown in the history of any city on the continent. Where frogs and water were staple commodites, now stand vast ware-houses, elegant and permanent structures, and palatial mansions. All this and vastly more, in a city whose first Mayor was elected less than thirty-one years since.

W. Bro. Wiley M. Egan, President of the Board of Trade, has kindly sent us the "Ninth Annual Statement of the Trade and Commerce of Chicago" for the year ending March 31, 1867. The pamphlet contains 146 pages, and is a thorough and condensed epitome of Chicago trade.

The grain warehouses have a capacity of 9,980,000 bushels. The shipments of flour and wheat, at grain measure, were 21,330,484 bushels; of corn, 32,953,530 bushels; of oats, 9,564,223 bushels, of rye, 1,489,895 bushels; of barley, 1,398,528 bushels. Total, 66,736,660 bushels.

The number of hogs received was 1,341,656; the number of beef cattle, 373,277.

The receipts of lumber were 730,057,168 feet of lumber; 400,125,250 shingles; 123,992,400 lath.

The trade in seeds, salt, hides, highwines, fish, coal, wood, lead, and wool is immense.

Nine steamers, 90 propellers, 151 barks, 39 brigs, 652 schooners, 51 scows, 2 barges, and 3 sloops, ply constantly upon the lake and river waters of Chicago, carrying 251,077 tons.

The business by canal increases steadily, and there is not one moment's cessation in the vast and almost incomputable railroad traffic and business. The membership of the Board of Trade amounts to 1,259; at $35.00 each, the annual membership fees amount to $44,065.

This statement does not embrace the vast system of manufactures, dry goods, hardware, grocery, or general trade. Neither the prescience, foresight, or mental calculation of man ever contemplated such results in any city less than thirty-one years of age.

And what is true of Chicago, is equally true of Illinois. Thirty-one years since, its population stood at 157,000; now it numbers full two and a half millions. It almost seems like a sacrilegious attempt to measure Omnipotence, to make calculations for the future of either Chicago or Illinois.

VIRGIL PRICE MANUFACTURING COMPANY.—This company is located at 144 Greene street, New York, and has a patent for hanging swords, specimens of which may be seen at our business house. The company manufactures all kinds of Masonic materials, and special attention is paid to the manufacture of fine presentation, Templar, Masonic, and military swords.

Brethren in search of Masonic goods will do well to visit this house when they are in New York city.

Impostors.

The country is full of them. We are tired of publishing them, and mean to discontinue the practice. Just before the meeting of the Grand Lodge, an old man, who looked like a grand and weather-beaten apostle, visited us and related a plain, simple story, in good language, and without any seeming embarrassment; he spoke tearfully of his separation from his wife and children, in Charleston, S. C., and produced letters which we were sure were those of two of our old and distinguished Grand Secretaries in the east. We told him that our Grand Lodge would assemble on the following Tuesday, to remain, and tell them his story, and he would obtain substantial relief, and that we would provide for his care until that time. From that moment his whole manner changed to that of apparent distrust and fear. We took him to the hotel, arranged for a week's board, and invited him to call the next day. He ate his dinner, stepped out, and disappeared. We say to our brethren, to grant no relief upon any pretense or story to any traveling Mason, until he brings unmistakable evidence of his Masonic identity and good standing. It has become a positive necessity to require this much. No more descriptions of impostors need be sent us for a while, for it seems to increase the breed. Keep your money until absolute proof of good standing is furnished.

Change of Partnership.

Bro. John P. Fults has retired from the partnership, and the business will hereafter be conducted, as before, under the firm name of H. G. Reynolds & Son. Bro. Fults was greatly endeared to us before he entered into business relations with us, but he is much more so now. He has a thorough commercial education, was for several years head clerk in the freight department of the railroad from Indianapolis to Louisville, and is well skilled in book-keeping and accounts, and has established a genuine character for honor and honesty far more priceless than honors or gold. We commend him to all Masons and business men, as a true Mason and thoroughly trustworthy business man.

I. O. O. F.

The Grand Lodge of Odd-Fellows met on the second Tuesday in October, at Centralia. J. F. Alexander, of Greenville, was elected Grand Master; Amos Watts, of Nashville, Deputy; W. F. Kelsch, Chicago, Grand Warden; Samuel Willard, of Springfield, Grand Secretary; A. S. Barry, of Alton, Grand Treasurer; H. S. Herr, of Bloomington, Grand Representative, full term, and John G. Rogers, of Chicago, for the vacancy caused by the death of P. G. Master Scroggs.

The Grand Encampment met at the same time and place. J. O. Harris, of Ottawa, was elected Grand Patriarch; Thos. Long, of Enfield, G. High Priest; A. N. Lichty, of Mt. Carroll, G. S. Warden; N. C. Nason, of Peoria, Grand Scribe and Treasurer; I. S. Armstrong, of Metropolis, G. J. Warden; Charles Perkins, of Brickton, G. Representative. The next sessions are to be held at Alton.

MARKING THE MINISTER.—A small boy out West, one cold day, was assisting his father to mark sheep with paint and brush. The father would catch a sheep and say to the boy, "Mark that." After the job was done, the boy started for his home, which was at some distance, and was overtaken by a minister on horseback, who seeing the boy barefooted, invited him to ride behind him. After the boy was seated he began to catechise him thus:

"My lad, do you attend the Sabbath-school?"

"No," was the reply.

"You should attend the Sabbath-school, mark that! All good children attend both church and Sabbath-school, mark that!"

After many other things the minister ordered the boy to do, he replied:

"I have marked your back all over now, and it looks like thunder!"

The reverend gentleman was somewhat astonished when he examined his coat.

The Evergreen.—Guilbert, Barnes & Co., of Dubuque, Iowa, are about to start a new paper "devoted to Masonic culture, uniformity, and progress," to be issued by Dec. 1. Subscription price, $2.00 per annum. To be published monthly. M. W. Bro. E. A. Guilbert, P. G. M., editor. We cordially welcome him to the corps editorial.

Minooka Lodge No. 528 was constituted by Bro. T. R. Willard. Breth. G. Dahlem W. M., A. K. Knapp S. W., G. C. Griswold J. W., J. T. Van Dolson Treas., G. E. Cowell Sec., S. Adams S. D., W. H. Smith J. D., Jacob Gedelman and E. N. Weis Stewards, John Colaps Tyler. A repast was prepared by the ladies.

E. R. Ranney, conductor on the fine railroad from Chicago to St. Louis, sends us four subscribers picked up along the route. Many thanks; and we reciprocate the wish for a better acquaintance.

Maquon Lodge No. 530 was constituted Oct. 18, by Bro. Benjamin Kersey. Robert Proseus, M. D., W. M., Wm. Swigert S. W., L. J. Dawdy J. W., A. Donason Treas., G. W. Selby Sec., B. F. Talman S. D., R. J. Cook J. D., J. Borbon and S. Freemole Stewards, P. Morrison Tyler. The occasion was a pleasant one.

Chatham Lodge No. 523, twelve miles south of Springfield, was constituted by Past Grand Master Lavely, immediately after the close of the Grand Lodge.

Alexis, third son of the Russian Czar, is about to visit America. We presume that the kings and princes of the United States have no objection.

Grand Master Gorin constituted Illiopolis Lodge No. 521, Oct. 18. This Lodge is the nearest to the exact geographical centre of the State. It is 23 miles east of Springfield, on the T. W. & W. R. W.

Bro. M. H. Wilmot, of Illiopolis, constituted the flourishing Dawson Lodge No. 556, at Dawson, 12 miles east of Springfield, on the T. W. & W. R. W., Oct. 11.

R. W. Charles Fisher, of this city, Deputy Grand Master, laid the corner-stone of the Macoupin county Court-House, at Carlinville, Oct. 23. An elegant oration was delivered by Hon. John M. Woodson, of the State Senate.

W. Bro. E. R. Maples, of Pontiac, constituted Ancona Lodge No. 552, Oct. 19. A genuine feast followed. This makes the sixth lodge in Livingston county, with five more on its border.

The Masonic Record of Western India, for September, is at hand, filled with valuable matter, news, and desirable information.

Disastrous Fire.

By a letter from R. W. D. G. Burr, we learn that a terrible conflagration occurred Oct. 30, at Paris, which consumed the lodge-room, together with the charters, clothing, furniture, and records of Prairie Lodge No. 77, Paris Lodge No. 268, Edgar Chapter No. 32, and Young Council No. 9. Not a shred was saved. The First National Bank, a large hardware store, and two printing offices, with all their contents, were entirely consumed.

The greatest average in proportion to population is in DeKalb, 1 to 35; the smallest in Henderson, 1 to 213. The opposers of Masonry will find an instructive lesson by examining these proportions. In the middle and southern portions of the State the opposition to Masonry is but trifling, and the proportion of Masons to the population is far less than in the north, whence so much opposition comes.

We will instance those counties where the opposition is the strongest and the most fanatical: Bureau, 1 to 74: DeKalb, 1 to 35; DuPage, 1 to 90; Henry, 1 to 66: Kane, 1 to 45; Knox, 1 to 48; Lake, 1 to 66; LaSalle, 1 to 73; Lee, 1 to 56; McHenry, 1 to 37; Peoria, 1 to 62; Will, 1 to 83; Winnebago, 1 to 43. Masonry courts neither favor nor opposition, but the same fanaticism in the center and south of Illinois that prevails in the counties above named, would double the number of Masons in two years.

The greatest average membership in any county is in Cook, 103 to the Lodge, and 19 more than in the county of Winnebago; and the average in Winnebago, is 12 more than in any of the other lodges, so that in reality the average in Cook is about 30 larger than in any county but one. This is owing to the immense memberships of Oriental, Cleveland, Kilwinning, Blair, W. B. Warren, Blaney, and Wabansia Lodges, in Chicago, while several others are above the average. The smallest average memberships are in Union and Hardin, 22 to each lodge.

Kentucky.

We tender our grateful acknowledgments to Bro. Wm. C. Munger for abstracts of proceedings of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, through the columns of the Louisville Daily Courier.

Grand Lodge.—On the second day, 390 lodges were represented, and about 500 delegates were in attendance. M. W. Bro. Hazelrigg, Grand Master of Indiana, was present as a visitor.

On the third day, the Grand Lodge adopted the following important amendment to the constitution:

> "Electioneering for office in the Grand Lodge is positively prohibited: and any member guilty of the offense shall be ineligible to office, and, if an officer, forfeit the office held by him; and the same rule shall apply to subordinate lodges."

On the fourth day, charters were granted to new lodges at Clarke School-House, Davies county; Henderson's Store, Estill county; Readyville, Sympsonia, El Dorado, Athens, Pinchem, Short-Creek Church, Corydon, Danville, Wingo's Station, Paducah, Ashland Seminary, Bethlehem Church, Covington, Wesley, Shiloh Church, Boonesborough, Walton's Creek, Mouth of Harrod's Creek, Antioch Church, Stringtown, Ray's Fork, Smithfield, Milton, West Liberty, Wrightsburg, Middletown, and New Salem Church. Several dispensations were granted.

Elisha S. Fitch, of Flemingsburg, was elected G. M.; Charles Eglinton, Winchester, Dep.; V. H. Jones, Glasgow, S. G. W.; E. B. Jones, Paducah, J. G. W.; A. G. Hodges, Lexington, G. Treas.; J. M. S. McCorcle, Louisville, G. Sec.; Rev. G. C. Lorimer, Louisville, G. Chaplain; R. C. Matthews, G. Steward and Tyler; E. W. Turner, Richmond, S. G. D.; D. P. Robb, Versailles, J. G. D.; John French, Newport, G. Mar.; L. J. Jones, Hillsboro, G. Pur.; John. M. Todd, Frankfort, D. G. Sec.

A splendid banquet followed, graced by the beauty, wit, and polish of "God's best gift to man."

No account has yet reached us of the doings of the Grand Council and Grand Chapter.

Thomas Todd is Grand President of the Grand Council of High Priests, and Wm. C. Munger is Grand Recorder.

Grand Lodge of Kansas.

Correspondence Peoria National Democrat.

Leavenworth, Oct. 18, 1867.

Editor Democrat—This has been a week of much interest to the noble Order of Freemasons in this city. Masonry is a living institution here, and its future is bright and cheery. I sent you some items of the first day's doings of the Grand Lodge, and I now send you a few items of the last day's proceedings. Much business was transacted at the last session, mostly of a local character, which would not interest the general reader. The minutes show that our beloved Institution is in a very flourishing condition in Kansas at present, and that a uniformity of work has been achieved and will be maintained. Allow me to say that this has been accomplished through the untiring labors of Grand Master Adams, than whom no more zealous Mason lives.

At 7 o'clock yesterday evening the members of the Grand Lodge assembled in Laing's Hall, where the grand officers for the ensuing year were installed in ample form, in the presence of a large audience, composed of the Craft and their families.

P. G. M. Richard R. Rees, assisted by W. O. Gould, as Grand Marshal, and a full corps of grand officers, installed the following officers of the Grand Lodge:

M. S. Adams, of Leavenworth, M. W. G. M.; E. A. Smith, of Fort Scott, R. W. D. G. M.; E. D. Hillyer, of Grasshopper Falls, R. W. S. G. W.; John D. Santer, of Garnett, R. W. J. G. W.; Christian Beck, of Leavenworth, R. W. G. Treas.; E. T. Carr, of Leavenworth, R. W. G. Sec.

APPOINTED OFFICERS.

C. K. Holliday, G. Orator; G. F. Nesbit, G. Chaplain; C. A. Bassett, G. Lecturer; G. W. Hogeboom, G. Marshal; A. R. Bancroft, G. Sw. B.; G. D. Terwilliger, S. G. D.; W. R. Wagstaff, J. G. D.; J. B. Sharp and S. W. McComas, G. Stewards; Geo. M. Kellum, G. Tyler.

ROYAL ARCH MASONS.

The Grand Chapter met on Wednesday morning. The following chapters were represented: Washington, Leavenworth, Fort Scott, Lawrence, Topeka, Wyandott, Ottawa, Oskaloosa, and Olathe.

G. H. P. R. R. Rees announced a quorum present.

In the afternoon the Grand Chapter elected the following officers:

R. R. Rees, M. E. G. H. P.; O. A. Bassett, E. D. G. H. P.; E. A. Smith, E. G. K.; J. M. Price, E. G. S.; M. S. Adams, E. G. Treas.; E. T. Carr, E. G. Sec.

In the evening P. G. H. P. John H. Brown installed the above named grand officers of the Grand Chapter.

After the installation of the officers of the Grand Lodge, the Masonic Fraternity, together with their ladies, sat down to a sumptuous repast, prepared by the generous ladies of the Leavenworth Masons. It is estimated that not less than six hundred ladies and gentlemen were present, and the occasion was marked by much joyousness. A more magnificent supper was never set on any occasion. The tables formed a "cross," and occupied the entire length of Laing's Hall, a room larger than Parmely's.

There will be a supper to-night under the direction of the committee of ladies belonging to the Masonic Fraternity, the proceeds to be devoted to the Ladies' Masonic Association for the relief of the destitute.

Lodge of Sorrow.

From the (Tenn.) Register.

The Grand Lodge of Tennessee, on Thursday night last, held a Lodge of Sorrow at Nashville, to which the public were admitted. This is said to be the first Lodge of Sorrow ever held in this State, which was in commemoration of the virtues of P. G. M. Thomas McCulloch.

The ceremonies were the most solemn and impressive we have ever witnessed. Four beautiful and most appropriate songs were sung, accompanied by excellent music.

The following officers presided:

P. G. M. Chas. A. Fuller, W. M.
P. G. M. John Frizzell, S. W.
P. G. M. James McCallum, J. W.
J. S. Davidson, S. D.
J. W. Hughes, J. D.
Wm. Maxwell and James O'Conner, Stewards.

The lodge was opened in due form. A large number of ladies and gentlemen were present, also a great many of the Fraternity, who entered the room in procession and were seated all at once. The Knights Templar were clothed in their beautiful regalia. In the centre of the spacious concert hall was a catafalque, consisting of a rectangular platform six or eight feet long and about four feet wide, upon which was erected two smaller platforms, representing the three steps. This platform (on which was a coffin) was draped in black, and a canopy of black drapery suspended to the chandelier above it. At each corner of the catafalque was a burning candle. Occupying seats at the four corners of the same, were Past Masters D. R. Rawlins, R. J. Chester, M. Drummond, and W. H. M'Leskey. On the Master's standwas a human skull, and suspended to the wall in the rear of the stand was a large and elegant portrait of P. G. M. Thomas McCulloch, draped in mourning.

Alternately the J. W., S. W., and W. M. marched from the Master's stand to the catafalque, attended with low, soft music, and placed upon the coffin a boquet of white flowers, a wreathe, and a bunch of evergreens, each repeating a beautiful ceremony, after which all the officers marched three times around the catafalque, while the band discoursed sweet, solemn music.

Besides other beautiful and entertaining ceremonies, P. M. Samuel H. Stout, of Nashville, pronounced a timely, original, and beautiful eulogy upon the life, history, and character of Thos. McCulloch, which is familiar, and whose virtues are an ever living monument in the hearts of Masons.

Grand Lodge of Colorado.

The Grand Lodge of Colorado commenced its annual communication on the 7th of October, and closed on the 8th. The following officers were elected:

Henry M. Teller, Central City, G. M.
O. A. Whittemore, Denver, D. G. M.
Aaron M. Jones, Nevada, S. G. W.
Webster D. Anthony, Denver, J. G. W.
Richard Sopris, Denver, G. Treas.
Ed. A. Parmelee, Central City, G. Sec.

Bro. Frank Hall, of Central City, was appointed Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Correspondence.

Grand Lodge of Tennessee.—At the last session of the Grand Lodge of Tennessee, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

Jos. M. Anderson, M. W. G. M.; J. S. Dawson, D. G. M.; J. W. Hughes, G. S. W.; J. C. Abernathy, G. J. W.; Wm. H. Horn, G. T.; Charles A. Fuller, G. S.: John F. House, G. O.; Charles L. McCauley, S. G. D.; W. Peak, J. G. D.; B. F. Dugan, G. C.; E. W. Matthews, G. S. B.; R. S. Evans, G. M.; G. W. Jenkins, Grand Steward; George Stefferle, Grand Tyler.

Masonic.—We are gratified to learn that our fellow citizen R. E. Anderson, Esq., was elected by the Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons, lately in session in St. Louis, Deputy Grand High Priest of the State.

The Grand Master of the Grand Lodge has also appointed Mr. Anderson Deputy Grand Master of the First Masonic District, composed of the counties of Marion, Lewis, Clarke, Shelby, Knox, and Scotland. This appointment will give entire satisfaction to the Craft of this important district. As an administrative officer and lecturer, Mr. Anderson has no superior anywhere, while in the most important department of Masonry, the conferring of degrees, he has earned an enviable reputation as an authority in Masonic scholarship and ethics. —Palmyra (Mo.) Sentinel.

"Little Tommy Tucker."

There were but three persons in the car; a merchant, deep in the income list of the Traveler, an old lady with two bandboxes, a man in the corner with his hat pulled over his eyes.

Tommy opened the door, peeped in, hesitated, looked into another car, came back, gave his little fiddle a shove on his shoulder, and walked in.

> "Hi, little Tommy Tucker > Plays for his supper," shouted a young exquisite lounging on the platform in tan-colored coat and lavender kid gloves.

"O, kids, you're there, are you? Well, I'd rather play for it than loaf for it, I had," said Tommy, stoutly.

The merchant shot a careless glance over the top of his paper, at the sound of this petit dialogue, and the old lady smiled benignly; the man in the corner neither looked nor smiled.

Nobody would have thought, to look at that man in the corner, that he was at that very moment deserting a wife and five children. Yet that is precisely what he was doing.

A villain? O! no, that is not the word. A brute? Not by any means. Weak, unfortunate, discouraged, and selfish—as weak, unfortunate and discouraged people are apt to be; that was the amount of it. His panoramas never paid him for the use of his halls. His traveling tin-type saloon had trundled him into a sheriff's hands. His petroleum speculations had crashed like a bubble. His black and gold sign, J. Harmon, photographer, had swung now for nearly a year over the dentist's rooms, and he had had the patronage of precisely six old women and three babies. He had drifted to the theater in the evenings—he did not care now to remember how many times—the fellows asked him, and it made him forget his troubles; the next morning his empty purse would gape at him, and Annie's mouth would quiver. A man must have his glass, too, on Sundays, and—well—perhaps a little oftener. He had not always been fit to go to work after it; and Annie's mouth would quiver. It will be seen at once that it was exceedingly hard on a man that his wife's mouth should quiver. "Confound it! Why couldn't she scold, or cry? These still women aggravated a fellow beyond reason."

Well, then the children had been sick; measles, whooping-cough, scarletina, mumps, he was sure he did not know what not; every one of them, from the baby up. There was medicine, and there were doctor's bills, and there was sitting up with them at night—their mother usually did that. Then she must needs pale down herself like a poorly finished photograph; all her color, and roundness, and sparkle gone; and if ever a man liked to have a pretty wife about it was he. Moreover, she had a cough, and her shoulders had grown round, stooping so much over the heavy baby, and her breath came short, and she had a way of being tired. Then she never stirred out of the house—he found out about that one day; she had no bonnet, and her shawl had been cut up into blankets for the crib. The children had stopped going to school; "they could not buy the new arithemetic," their mother said, half under her breath. Yesterday there was nothing for dinner but johnny cake, not a large one at that. To-morrow the saloon rents were due. Annie talked about pawning one of the bureaus. Annie had had great purple rings under her eyes for six weeks.

He would not bear the purple rings and quivering mouth any longer. He hated the sight of her, for the sight stung him. He hated the corn cake and the untaught children. He hated the whole dreary, dragging, needy home. The ruin of it dogged him like a ghost, and he should be the ruin of it as long as he stayed in it. Once fairly rid of him, his scolding and drinking, his wasting and failing, Annie would send the children to work, and find ways to live. She had energy and invention, a plenty of it, in her young, fresh days, before he came accross her life to drag her down. Perhaps he should make a golden fortune, and come back to her some summer day with a silk dress and servants, and make it all up; in theory this was about what he expected to do. But if his ill-luck went westward with him, and the silk dress never turned up, why, she would forget him, and be better off, and that would be the end of it.

So here he was, ticketed and started, fairly bound for Colorado, sitting with his hat over his eyes, and thinking about it.

"H-m-m. Asleep," pronounced Tommy, with his keen glance into the corner. "Guess I'll wake him up."

He laid his cheek down on his little fiddle—you don't know how Tommy loved that little fiddle—and struck up a gay, rollicking tune:

> "I care for nobody, and nobody cares for me."

The man in the corner sat quite still. When it was over he shrugged his shoulders.

"When folks are asleep they don't h'ist their shoulders, not as a general thing," observed Tommy. "We'll try another."

Tommy tried another. Nobody knows what possessed the little fellow, the little fellow himself least of all; but he tried this:

> "We've lived and loved together,
> Through many changing years."

It was a new tune, and he wanted practice, perhaps.

The train jarred and statred slowly; the gloved exquisite, waiting hackmen, baggage-masters, coffee-counter, and station-walls slid back; engine-house, and prison towers, and labyrinths of tracks slipped by; lumber and shipping took their place, with clear spaces between, where sea and sky shone through. The speed of the train increased with a sickening sway; old warves shot past, with the green water sucking at their piers; the city shifted by and out of sight.

> "We've lived and loved together,"

played Tommy, in a little plaintive wail,

> "We've lived and loved"—

"Confound the boy!" Harmon pushed up his hat with a jerk, and looked out of the window. The night was coming on. A dull sunset lay low on the water, burning like a bale-fire through the snaky trail of smoke that went writhing past the car windows. Against lonely signal-houses and little deserted beaches the water was splashing drearily, and playing monotonous bases to Tommy's wail:

> "Through many changing years,
> Many changing years."

It was a nuisance, this music in the cars. Why didn't somebody stop it? What did the child mean by playing that? They had left the city far behind now. He wondered how far. He pushed up the window fiercely, venting the passion of the music on the first thing that came in his way, as men will, and thrust his head out to look back. Through the undulating smoke, out in the pale glimmer from the sky he could see a low, red tongue of land, covered with the twinkle of lighted homes. Somewhere there, in among the quivering warmth was our—

What was that boy about now? Not "Home, sweeet Home?" But that was what Tommy was about.

They were lighting the lamps now in the car. Harmon looked at the conductor's face, as the sickly yellow flare struck on it, with a curious sensation. He wondered if he had a wife and five children; if he ever thought of running away from them; what he would think of a man who did; what most people would think; what she would think. She—ah, she had it all to find out yet.

> "There's no place like home."

> "Oh! no place like home."

said Tommy's little fiddle.

Now this fiddle of Tommy's may have had a crack or so in it, and I can not assert that Tommy never struck a false note; but the man in the corner was not fastidious as a musical critic; the sickly light was flickering through the car, the quiver on the red flats was quite out of sight, the train was shrieking away into the west—the baleful, lonely west—which was dying fast now out there upon the sea; and it is a fact that his hat went slowly down over his face again, and that his face went slowly down upon his arm.

There, in the lighted home out upon the flats, that had drifted by forever, she sat waiting now. It was about time for him to be in to supper; she was beginning to wonder a little where he was; she was keeping the coffee hot, and telling the children not to touch their father's pickles; she had set the table and drawn the chairs; his pipe lay filled for him upon the shelf over the stove. The baby was fretting—the baby always fretted towards night—and she was walking about with him; walking very slowly and weekly; singing now and then. Her face in the light was worn and white, the dark rings very dark. She was trying to hush the boys, teasing for their supper; begging them to wait a few minutes, only a few minutes, he would surely be here then. She would put the baby down presently, and stand at the window, with her hands—Annie's hands were not once so thin—raised to shut out the light—watching, watching.

The children would eat their supper; the table would stand untouched, with his chair in its place; still she would go to the window, and stand watching, watching. O! the long nights that she must stand watching, and the days, and the years!

> "Sweet, sweet home," played Tommy.

By-and-by there was no more of "Sweet Home."

"How about that cove with his head lopped down on his arms?" speculated Tommy, with a business-like air.

He had only stirred once, then put his face down again; but he was awake, awake in every nerve, and listened, to the very curve of his fingers. Tommy knew that, it being part of his trade to learn how to use his eyes.

The sweet, loyal passion of the music—it would take worse playing than Tommy's to drive the sweet, loyal passion out of Annie Laurie—grew above the din of the train.

> "'Twas there that Annie Laurie
> Gave me her promise true."

She used to sing that, thought the man—this other Annie of his own. Why, she had been his own, and he had loved her once. How he had loved her! Yes, she used to sing that when he went to see her on Sunday nights, before they were married, in her pink, plump, pretty days. Annie used to be very pretty.

> "Gave me her promise true," hummed the little fiddle.

"That's a fact," said poor Annie's husband, jerking the words out under his hat, "and kept it, too, she did."

Ah, how Annie had kept it! The whole dark picture of her married years—the days of work and pain, the nights of watching; the patient voice, the quivering mouth, the tact and the planning, and the trust for to-morrow; the love that had borne all things, believed all things, hoped all things uncomplaining—rose into outline to tell him how she had kept it.

> "Here face is as the fairest
> That ere the sun shown on," suggested the little fiddle.

That it should be darkened forever, the sweet face! and that he should do it—he, sitting here, with his ticket bought, bound for Colorado.

> "And ne'er forget will I," murmured the little fiddle.

He would have knocked the man down who had told him twenty years ago that he ever should forget; that he should be here to-night, with his ticket bought, bound for Colorado.

But it was better for her to be free from him. He and his cursed ill-luck were a drag on her and the children, and would always be. What was that she had said once?—"Never mind, Jack, I can bear anything as long as I have you."

And here he was with his ticket bought, bound for Colorado.

He wondered if it were ever too late in the day for a fellow to make a man of himself. He wondered.

> "And she's a' the world to me,
> And for bonnie Annie Laurie,
> I'd lay me down and dee."

sang the little fiddle, triumphantly.

Harmon shook himself, and stood up. The train was slacking; the lights of a way-station bright ahead. It was about time for supper and his mother, so Tommy put down his fiddle and handed around his faded cap.

The merchant threw him a penny, and returned to his tax list. The old lady was fast asleep, with her mouth open.

"Come here," growled Harmon, with his eyes very bright. Tommy shrank back, almost afraid.

"Come here," softening; "I won't hurt you. I tell you, boy, you don't know what you've done to-night."

"Done, sir?" Tommy couldn't help laughing, though there was a twinge of pain at his stout little heart, as he fingered the solitary penny in the faded cap. "Done? Well, I guess I've waked you up, sir, which was about what I meant to do."

"Yes, that is it," said Harmon, very distinctly, pushing up his hat; "you've waked me up. Here, hold your cap."

They had puffed into the station now, and stopped. He emptied his purse into the little cap, shook it clean of paper and copper alike, was out of the car and off the train before Tommy could have said Jack Robinson.

"My eyes!" gasped Tommy, "that chap had a ticket for New York, sure! Methuselah! Look a here! one, two, three—must have been crazy; that's it, crazy."

"He'll never find out," muttered Harmon, turning away from the station-lights, and striking back through the night for the red flats and home. "He'll never find out what he has done, nor, please God, shall she."

It was late when he came in sight of the house; it had been a long tramp across the tracks, and hard; being stung by a bitter wind from the east all the way, tired with the monotonous treading of the sleepers, and with crouching in perilous niches to let the trains go by.

She stood watching at the window, as he had known that she would stand—her hands raised to her face—her figure cut out against the warm light of the room.

He stood still a moment and looked at her, hidden in the shadow of the street, thinking his own thoughts. The publican in the old story, hardly entering the beautiful temple with more humble steps than he his home that night.

She sprang to meet him, paler with her watching and fear, and he felt her arms about his neck.

"Worried, Annie, were you? I haven't been drinking; don't be frightened—no, not the theater, either, this time. Some business, dear—business that delayed me. I'm sorry, you were worried, I am, Annie. I've had a long walk. It is pleasant here. I believe I'm tired, Annie."

He faltered and turned away his face.

"Dear me," said Annie; "why you poor fellow, you are all tired out. Sit right up here by the fire, and I will bring the coffee. I've tried so hard not to let it boil away, you don't know, Jack; and I was so afraid something had happened to you."

Her face, her voice, her touch, seemed more than he could bear for a minute, perhaps. He gulped down his coffee, choking.

"Annie, look here?" He put down his cup, trying to smile and make a jest of the words. "Suppose a fellow had it in him to be a rascal, and nobody ever knew it, eh?"

"I should rather not know it if I were his wife," said Annie simply.

"But you couldn't care anything more for him, you know, Annie?"

"I don't know," said Annie, shaking her head with a little perplexed smile; "you would be just Jack, anyhow."

Jack coughed, took up his coffee-cup, set it down hard, strode once or twice across the room, kissed the baby in the crib, kissed his wife, and sat down again, winking at the fire.

"I wonder if He had anything to do with sending him," he said, presently, under his breath.

"Sending whom?" asked puzzled Annie.

"Business, dear; just business. I was thinking of a boy who did a little job for me tonight; that's all."

And that is all that she knows to this day about the man sitting in the corner, with his hat over his eyes, bound for Colorado.

WARLIKE WOMEN.—The most celebrated warlike women among the ancients, apart from the fabled Amazons, were the Helvetian ladies. Cæsar, in his Commentaries on the Gallic War, praises highly their military achievments. In more than one instance the legions of Rome have turned their backs upon the fair ones of Switzerland. One instance may be cited to prove that women are as capable of high and heroic feelings as men—that of the Lacedæmonian mother, who, when giving her son his shield, enjoined him to return with it, or upon it. During the Crusades, women performed the most romantic and chivalrous deeds, dying cheerfully by the side of their lovers or husbands. There have also been instances of gentle-hearted women defending fortifications, leading armies, and gaining victories. There was Joan of Arc (the "Maid of Orleans"), Joan of Montfort, and Margaret of Anjou.

Perseverance and what it Accomplishes.

How much more would be accomplished in this life if every good effort was only persevered in.

Thos. O—— was the child of poor parents. Their humble abode was far off in a secluded spot in the country. It was a lovely spot. The house itself was scarce deserving the name; but the surroundings—the trees, the hills—they made the spot beautiful. The father died when our hero was very young, leaving, besides himself, four others, depending solely upon the widowed mother for their support. That mother toiled hard by day, and not unfrequently by night too; and thus was enabled, by strict economy, to sustain these little ones. Thomas was the eldest. He had seen some ten winters. He possessed an energetic spirit, and one day resolved to try and do something for himself, and thus be enabled to aid his mother. He thought if he could but get to the city of P——, all would be well, and his desires gratified. He sought his mother, who was busily engaged in her routine of duties. He told her all that was in his heart. At first she objected. His boyish reasonings, however, overcame her objections, and she gave her consent. It took but a short time to arrange his wardrobe. The scanty stock of clothing was arranged in a bundle. The hour arrived for his departure, after the good bye to all, he took his seat in the stage-coach, and was rapidly whirled away from the old home, which, to him, contained all that was dear in life, yet he was cheerful in spirit. He felt life was before him, and with the blessing of God, his mark should be made. After a tedious ride of hours, he was landed in P——, a stranger, pènniless, and seemingly friendless. He was not alone, however, God was with him, and He was a father to this fatherless boy. He walked up the street a short distance, and entering a store, asked if they did not want a boy.

The owner gruffly answered "no!"

A little downcast from this rough reception, "for he was a stranger to all this," he was not disheartened, and determined to try again. He entered another store, and then another, until he had visited several, with results alike to the first, until he became almost discouraged. Night was coming on. "What shall I do," said he to himself. Something whispered to him, try again. He entered still another store. It was near the hour of closing. His young heart fluttered as he asked a young man near the door, "Is the proprietor of this store in?"

He was answered in the affirmative, and pointed back to the counting-room. Here he was met by a gentleman, whose very looks indicated a tender heart.

"Well, my little friend, what do you wish," said he.

Thomas was inspired with confidence at once, and frankly told him all.

"But," said Mr. H——, "you know nothing about a store, do you?"

"No, sir, but I can learn."

Pleased with the answer, as also the candor of Thomas, the merchant continued, "What would you like to do in a store?"

Anything you choose to put me at, sir," was the answer.

"Well, my little man, said Mr. H——, I really don't need a boy, but you seem so honest, you may come here to-morrow morning, I will see if I can't find something for you to do in my store, you are very small, but I guess you can sweep out and run errands."

"Yes, sir, that I can do," said Thomas, with a heart too full, the tears could no longer be restrained, and he wept freely as he thanked this kind hearted man.

"Where will you stay to-night," said Mr. H——.

"I have no place to stay, sir."

"Come along with me, Thomas, I am just going home, and will take you with me."

This offer was cheerfully accepted. After arriving at the house, he enjoyed a good supper, and being tired from his journey, was shown to his room. After thanking God for the success of the day, he retired, and soon fell asleep. The next morning he arose very early, was called into family prayers, thence to breakfast. The meal over, he accompanied his benefactor to the place of business, was allowed a little time to look around, and then went to work, sweeping, dusting, and doing the chores about the store. Thus his first day passed. A comfortable boarding-place was secured for him, with a kind lady, who had the fear of God before her eyes. She also loved children, and, as Thomas in after life said, did her whole duty by him. Days and weeks passed, the merchant became attachd to his protege, promoted him in his business, until after a time he was made his confidential clerk. In due course, he became a member of the firm; was successful in business, and was no longer the penniless boy, but the wealthy man. During his entire apprenticeship, he remembered his mother, and never ceased his care for her or the other members of the family. She lived to see his success and receive his support, and when angels conveyed her spirit to Abraham's bosom, Thomas cared for her mortal remains and had them laid in the quiet grave. His means he freely used in deeds of mercy, and his heart was always open to respond to every act of true benevolence. He became a useful man, and valuable citizen. Not long since he died, and was taken to his reward. All this was the result of a persevering spirit, with God's blessing upon it.

Seek that which is right, then persevere.

Farmers, Encourage Your Sons.

Farmers' sons ought to have a chance to earn something for themselves, and be allowed to make ventures in stock-raising for pocket money. Such liberties will make them contented at home. We suppose a great many farmers do this; but some—alas! too many—work their boys with as little consideration as hired men. They take no pains to make farm life attractive, and the boys are off at the earliest opportunity. They have no joyous memories to bind them to the spot that ought to be the dearest to them on earth. To learn the worth of money as the result of their labors; to form habits of faithfulness, carefulness, and economy; these and other virtues must be rewarded. They should have responsibilities put upon them while they are very young, and be encouraged to make money and to save it. Give them a hen, a goose or turkey, a lamb or pig, and let them have all they can make by good care and feeding. A boy of ten or twelve years of age, with a little instruction, can manage the poultry. Let him take it on shares and see what he can make out of it. Give him a patch for a garden, and if near a market let him sell what he can raise. Give him a half-dozen apple trees or pear trees, teach him to graft them if they need it, and let the fruit be his. Give the boys an interest in your business, and make them intelligent in it, and they will not be in haste to leave the homestead. Encourage them to read agricultural papers and books, and the appetite will grow by what it feeds upon. The farm will be the scene of cheerful, well rewarded labor, and always be loved.—Rural West.

"The Old Woman."

From the (Cin.) Review.

We don't know how it is with others, but we know when we read the following truthful—sadly truthful—portraiture, tears came unbidden. We wish every young man in the land could read it. It has been long since we had a mother, for years ago God took her to himself, to share the blessedness of the pure and good, in a world where there is no sorrow. But her love to us—it was pure, and true, and abiding; and when she was laid away in the grave we felt the meaning of—orphanage. Our children, too, are now motherless, but we hope that through all their lives they will not cease to remember and appreciate a mother's love—one of the best of mothers. How can a man, young or old, rich or poor, be so ungrateful as to so requite a mother's love! Yet there are such, and we wish they would read the following.—Ed. Rev.

Once she was "Mother," and it was "Mother I'm hungry," "Mother, mend my jacket," and "Mother, put up my dinner," and "Mother," with her loving hands, would spread the bread and butter, and stow away the luncheon, and sew on the great patch, her heart brimming with affection for the impetuous little curly pate that made her so many steps, and nearly distracted her with his boisterous mirth.

Now she is the "old woman," but she did not think then that it would ever come to that. She looked on through the future years and saw her boy grown to manhood; and he stood transfigured in the light of her own beautiful love. Never was there a more noble son than he—honored of the world and the staff of her declining years.

Aye, he was her support even then, but she did not know it. She never realized that it was her little boy that gave her strength for daily toil—that his slender form was all that upheld her over the brink of a dark despair. She only knew how she loved the child, and felt that amid the mists of age his love would bear her gently through its infirmities to the dark hall leading to the life beyond.

But the son has forgotten the mother's tender ministrations now. Adrift from the moorings of home he is cold, selfish, heartless, and "Mother" has no sacred meaning to the prodigal. She is "the old woman," wrinkled, gray, lame, and blind. Pity her, O grave, and dry those tears that roll down her furrowed cheeks! Have compassion on her sensitive heart, and offer it thy quiet rest, that it may forget how much it longed to be "dear mother" to the boy it nourished through a careless childhood, but in return for all this wealth of tenderness has only given back reproach.

An Incident in the Cars.

On the whole, pleasant traits and characters are not common in the cars, I think. This opinion I expressed to my friend Sumers the other day. In reply to my remarks he related a little adventure, which, as it is apropos, and moreover involves a little love and sentiment, I give it without apology, and in his own words. It appears that in the most unlikely places, love and sentiment may be discovered.

"I was escorting home the lovely Charlotte D——, to whom I was at the time quite devoted. Charlotte could scarcely find room to spread her crinoline and arrange her voluminous flounces. I stood up near her, there being no vacant seat.

"After a few minutes, came in a poor woman, who deposited a basket of clothes on the front platform, and held in her arms a small child, while a little girl hung to her dress. She looked tired and weary, but there was no vacant seat; to be sure Charlotte might have condensed her flounces, but she did not. Beside her, however, sat a very lovely and elegant young woman, who seemed trying, by moving down closer to others, to make space enough for the stranger between herself and Miss D——. At last she succeeded, and with the sweetest blush I ever saw she invited the poor female to be seated. Charlotte D—— drew her drapery around her and blushed too, but it was not a pretty blush at all, and she looked annoyed at the proximity of the new comer, who was, however, clean and decently, though thinly clad.

"The unknown lady drew the little girl upon her lap, and wrapped her velvet mantle around the small half-clad form, and put her muff over the half frozen little blue hands.

"So great was the crowd that I alone seemed to observe. The child shivered—the keen wind from the door blew upon her unprotected neck. I saw the young lady quietly draw from under her shawl a little woolen shawl, which she softly put on the shoulders of the little one, the mother looking on with confused wonder. After a short time she arose to leave the cars, and would have removed the shawl, but the unknown gently whispered, 'No, keep it for her.' The woman did not answer, the conductor hurried her out, but her eyes swam with tears. I noticed her as she descended to a basement, and I hastily remarked the house.

"Soon after my unknown also arose to depart. I was in despair, for I wanted to follow and discover her residence, but could not leave Miss D——.

"How glad, then, I was to see her bowing, as she passed out, to a mutual acquaintance who stood in the doorway. From him, ere many minutes, I had learned her name and address.

"To shorten the story as much as possible, that lady is now my wife. In the small incident which introduced her to me she showed her real character. A few days after our marriage I showed her the blessed crimson shawl, which I redeemed from its owner, and shall always keep as a memento. There are sometimes pleasant things to be found in unexpected places; certainly I may have said to have picked out my wife in the cars."

Evil Overcome with Good.

The following incident is so beautiful and touching, that it should be read to every household in the country. It develops the true, active principle of kindness. How many an erring mortal, making his first step in crime, might be redeemed by the exercise of this sublime trait in the character of the kind hearted Quaker:

William Savery, an eminent minister among the Quakers, was a tanner by trade. One night a quantity of hides were stolen from his tannery, and he had reason to believe that the thief was a quarrelsome, drunken neighbor, called John Smith. Next week the following advertisement appeared in the country newspaper:

"Whoever stole a quantity of hides on the fifth of this month, is hereby informed that the owner has a sincere wish to be his friend. If poverty tempted him to his false step, the owner will keep the whole transaction secret, and will gladly put him in the way of obtaining money by means likely to bring him peace of mind."

This singular advertisement attracted considerable attention; but the culprit alone knew who had made the kind offer. When he read it his heart melted within him, and he was filled with sorrow for what he had done. A few nights afterwards, as the tanner's family were about retiring to rest, they heard a timid knock, and when the door was opened there stood John Smith, with a load of hides on his shoulder. Without looking up, he said, "I have brought these back, Mr. Savery, where shall I put them?"

"Wait till I can get a lantern, and I will go to the barn with thee," he replied; "then, perhaps, thou wilt come in, and tell me how this happened. We will see what can be done for thee."

As soon as they were gone out, his wife prepared some hot coffee, and placed pies and meat on the table. When they returned from the barn, she said: "Neighbor Smith, I thought some good hot supper would be good for thee."

He turned his back towards her, and did not speak. After leaning against the fire place in silence a few moments, he said in a choked voice:

"It is the first time I ever stole anything, and I have felt very bad about it. I am sure I didn't once think that I should come to what I am. But I took to drinking and then to quarreling. Since I began to go down hill everybody gives me a kick. You are the first man that has ever offered me a helping hand. My wife is sickly and my children starving. You have sent them many a meal. God bless you! but yet I stole the hides. But I tell you the truth when I say it is the first time I was ever a thief."

"Let it be the last, my friend," replied William Savery. "The secret lies between ourselves! Thou art still young, and it is in thy power to make up for lost time. Promise me that thou wilt not drink any intoxicating liquor for a year, and I will employ thee to-morrow on good wages. The little boy can pick up stones. But eat a bit now, and drink some hot coffee; perhaps it will prevent thee from craving anything stronger to-night. Doubtless thou wilt find it hard to abstain at first; but keep up a brave heart for the sake of thy wife and children, and it will soon become easy. When thou hast need of coffee, tell Mary, and she will give it thee."

The poor fellow tried to eat and drink, but the food seemed to choke him. After vainly trying to compose his feelings, he bowed his head on the table and wept like a child. After awhile he ate and drank, and his host parted with him for the night with the friendly words, "Try to do well, John, and thou wilt always find a friend in me." John entered into his employ the next day, and remained with him many years, a sober, honest, and steady man. The secret of the theft was kept between them; but after John's death, William Savery sometimes told the story to prove that evil might be overcome with good.

Four Times Tempted.

Boys, I am sure I never told you of Albert's temptations.

"Who is Albert?"

Well, that is one of the things I was about to tell you. But you will have to keep still, if you wish to hear the story, as it is very impolite for two to be talking at the same time; and I never mean to be impolite—do you, boys? Now let me begin at the beginning. Albert French's home was on the banks of the river; his mother took in washing, and his father was a drunkard. "Very low people," did you say, Master Frank? Well, in one sense they were—the father was low enough, certainly, when he lay, as he often did, dead drunk in the gutter. But there had been a time in this man's life when even you, Frank, would have felt honored by his notice, degraded as he has since become.

He was the son of a governor, and wealth, influence, position, and a lovely wife, were his dower at the age of twenty-two; but, alas! in that aristocratic mansion, where the marble sideboard was loaded with massive silver goblets, he acquired the taste for wine, which has been his ruin.

But it is of Albert's temptations that I wish to tell you, and you will pardon the digression I have made.

The wide river was frozen over at last, and the ice was covered with skaters. Too poor to purchase a pair of skates, Albert stood at the door of his wretched home, and watched the boys as they glided swiftly by. At last he sauntered out upon the ice, and as he stood there, watching a little fellow make the letter "S" in the clear crystal, a great burly boy purposely ran against him, crying out, just as he saw him fall: "Keep out of my way, you son of a pauper.

Albert struggled to his feet, blind and dizzy, and his first impulse was to chastise the overbearing lad who caused his fall; but he remembered his poor mother's oft-repeated maxim:

"Do good to those who evil do to you;
God will reward: His promises are true."

and he turned towards the bank of the river, having conquered his first temptation.

A man with a dog, gun, and a dead rabbit, passed him, and he looked eagerly at the little gray animal. "If it were only mine," he thought—and perhaps if you had eaten nothing but a dry crust of bread for twelve hours you, too, would look with longing upon less epicurean diet than a rabbit.

At length the hunter turned to the bank, and leaning his gun against a tree, laid the rabbit on the ground, and went back upon the ice to teach a little boy to cut a "double pigeon's wing"—whatever that may be—on his skates.

Albert took one step toward the rabbit. "He is rich and don't need it; it would be so easy for me to take it, and he would never know who"—"was the thief!" It was his conscience that finished the last sentence; but Albert started and turned pale, for it seemed as though a living voice had whispered the words in his ear.

"No! a thousand times no! I will never be a thief!"—and thus he conquered his second temptation.

Turning his eyes back towards the river, he saw the boy who had knocked him down skating towards a dangerous hole in the ice—all the more dangerous from the fact that a thin coating had formed over it during the last night. For a moment his revengeful feelings rose, and he muttered, "Good enough for him, if he does get a ducking." But with the next breath he shouted: "A hole! a hole!" The warning came too late—his enemy was floundering in the water, frantically trying to climb out, while the ice broke at every clutch of his numb fingers; and through fright and the intense cold, he was in great danger of drowning before help could reach him.

Albert comprehended his dangerous situation at a glance, and, catching a plank from a pile of lumber, ran to his assistance. He was at length rescued, and Albert hurried away, having conquered his third temptation; he had done good to one who had "despitefully used and persecuted him."

As he went to replace the plank, a pocket-book caught his eye. He quickly grasped it, and looked around to see if any one was watching him; but all were too busy helping the half-drowned boy towards home, and he slipped the treasure into his pocket, and hurried on. As soon as he thought himself secure, he opened it, and a number of bills and some smaller currency met his gaze.

Food, clothing, and fuel!—oh! how much good the money would do! But conscience again whispered in his ear; this time the words of the commandment—"Thou shalt not covet!" Slowly Albert closed the pocket book, and going to the office of the chief of police, placed it in his charge to be returned to its owner; and thus he conquered his fourth and last temptation for that day.

Now people do receive a reward for every good deed. Sometimes the reward quickly follows the act; again, it is long delayed; but, sooner or later, it is sure to come, for God is just.

Albert turned slowly homeward; he was hungry, but he felt, even then, that the pangs of hunger were not half as hard to bear as the sharp sting of remorse and the crushing agony of a guilty soul would have been.

At home a strange and solemn scene awaited him. His father had been found frozen to death, and the police had brought his body home. Death always inspires awe; and it is terrible to think of a drunkard's dying, although his death may be a mercy to his friends; for though unfit to die, he is equally unfit to live.

Nearly a week had passed since the occurrences above related, when a gentleman called, whom Albert recognized as the rabbit owner that he saw on the ice. After a few moments' conversation, he engaged Albert as clerk in his store, at a salary sufficient to support himself and his mother.

Albert was quite as much surprised as overjoyed at his good fortune; and his surprise was in no way diminished when the merchant said:

"Your conduct on the ice last week procured the situation. I saw more than you supposed. You were sorely tempted, but you nobly resisted; and I have no doubt of your ability to conquer all the difficulties of life, and carve out a glorious future; for he that overcometh evil in his own heart is nobler than a king."

And so the sequel proved; and Albert's temptations, bravely conquered, were the stepping-stones to wealth and greatness.—Little Chief.

Queen Victoria.

Grace Greenwood has been giving some very pleasant anecdotes of the English Queen under the title of "Inside the Palace." Among them is the following: One day, when the Queen was present in her carriage at a military review, the Princess Royal, then rather a willful girl of about thirteen, sitting on the front seat, seemed disposed to be rather familiar and coquettish with some young officers of the escort. Her Majesty gave several reproving looks, without avail—"winked at her but she wouldn't stay winked." At length, in flirting her handkerchief over the side of the carriage, she dropped it—too evidently, not accidentally. Instantly two or three young heroes sprang from their saddles to return it to her fair hand—but the awful voice of royalty stayed them. "Stop, gentlemen!" exclaimed the Queen—"leave it just where it lies. Now, my daughter, get down from the carriage, and pick up your handkerchief." There was no help for it. The royal footman let down the steps for the little royal lady, who proceeded to lift from the dust the pretty piece of cambric and lace. She blushed a good deal, though she tossed her head saucily, and was doubtless angry enough, but the mortifying lesson may have nipped in the bud her first impulse towards coquetry. It was hard, but it was wholesome. How many American mothers would be equal to such a piece of Spartan discipline?

Died.

At Freebourg, St. Clair county, Sept. 22, Bro. WM. DARMSTACTLER, a member of Freebourg Lodge No. 418.

The loss to his friends and brethren is very keenly felt. Buried with Masonic honors.

While absent from his home at Fairbury, Comp. H. M. GILLETTE, Scribe of Fairbury Chapter No. 99.

His untimely death is greatly mourned by his devoted wife, the church of which he was a member, and his lodge and chapter, wherein he was greatly beloved.

DECKER & CO.'S

IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

PIANO FORTES!

Warerooms: No. 2 Union Square, corner Fourteenth St. and Fourth avenue,

NEW YORK.

These Instruments are celebrated throughout the country, and are distinguished for

THEIR SINGING QUALITY,
VOLUME and PURITY OF TONE,
SYMPATHETIC, ELASTIC, EVEN TOUCH,
DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION,
and BEAUTY OF FINISH.

Decker & Company's Pianos have always received the First Premiums, whenever and wherever they have competed with the most celebrated makers in this country.

OUR IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

Is an invention beautiful in its simplicity and wonderful in its practical effects. It is the most compact Agraffe ever invented, and its influence upon the tone is to render it mellower, rounder, and more clearly brilliant, while it utterly overcomes that sharp, metalic quality which disfigures the instruments of all other makers.

WHY WE EXCEL.

While other Pianos are rarely in tune,

THE DECKER & CO.'S PIANOS invariably retain their Pitch and Tone.

While other Pianos are made of poor or unseasoned materials,

THE DECKER PIANOS combine the Best Materials, Skillful Workmanship, and Scientific Construction.

While other Pianos are deficient in the great requisites of a good touch,

THE DECKER & CO. PIANOS have a flexibility under skillful manipulation, which not only adapts them to the style of every performer, but which causes the player to feel en rapport with the Instrument, and affords his taste and fancy free expression.

IT IS A FACT—That philosophy of construction is not less important than fitness of material.

IT IS A FACT—That various minute, unobserved appliances, adaptations, and improvements have an influence in the tone, durability and manipulative character of a Piano, in no degree inferior to the more ostensible modifications.

IT IS A FACT—Therefore, that science, as well as experience; artistic discrimination, as well as methodic care; capital, as well as conscientiousness, are requisite in the production of a GOOD PIANO-FORTE. In our

is exhibited the result of an uninterrupted, persevering regard for these facts and principles; and purchasers who have so often spoken of the uniformity of excellence in our Instruments will be led to understand how this superiority and uniformity has been attained—a result which is apparent to even ordinary judges, in the volume and richness of tone, the sustained and human character of their singing quality, while connoisseurs and critics fully indorse all that we have adverted to.

The unanimous opinion of the best artists and the most reliable critics is, that

THE DECKER & COMPANY'S

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte is the only Square Piano-Forte, which, in Voluminous Sonority, and Positive Solidity of Tone,

Can stand comparison with the

BEST GRAND PIANO-FORTES MADE.

☞ Every Piano is Warranted for Seven years.

THE SYMBOLISM OF SACRED PLANTS.

As Developed in Freemasonry and the Kindred Institutions of the Ancient World.

BY ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D.

XVI.

THE IVY.

The ivy is another one of those evergreen plants which was, in the mystical theology of the ancients, adopted as the symbol of immortality. It is the hedera helix of the botanists, and it seems, from the frequent descriptions of poets and from the numerous representations of it on monuments and medals, to have been among the best known plants of antiquity. It is true that several kinds of ivy are mentioned by ancient writers, but the celebrated botanist Martyn thinks that they are all rather mere varieties of the same plant than distinct species.

By the Egyptians, the ivy was consecrated to their god Osiris, and hence it was called by ~~them~~ Chenosiris, or "the plant of Osiris." To him they attributed its discovery, and hence ivy crowns and chaplets were worn in all the festivals which were celebrated in his honor. "They prefer it," says Diodorus Siculus, "even to the vine in their sacred ceremonies, because the vine drops its leaves in autumn, while the ivy remains always green," a fact which the ancients always regarded in the consecration of other plants to different deities, as the myrtle to Venus, the laurel to Apollo, and the olive to Minerva. The perennial nature of the plant, or, if not an evergreen, its great durability or its extreme vivacity, being important elements in the symbolism.

Among the Greeks and the Romans, the ivy was consecrated to the god Dionysus, or Bacchus. Now, Dionysus was, like Osiris—who was indeed the Egyptian Bacchus—the symbolization of the idea of a resurrection from death to life. Of the numerous titles which were conferred upon him by different nations, many were indicative of this fact. Thus, he was sometimes called "the conductor of souls;" sometimes, "the lord of graves;" sometimes, "the lord of the dead;" by some nations, "the arisen one;" and by others, "the returner"—that is, he who has returned from Hades, or the realms of the dead. In all of these appellations, the doctrines of death and the resurrection were concealed. According to the legend of the mysteries, the buried Dionysus arose in splendor after having descended into the regions of the dead. Hence we might expect that, in all his attributes, we would find some reference to a similar symbolism of the resurrection. Hence, the ivy being a symbol of immortality, ivy crowns were worn by him and by his worshipers in all the Dionysiac or Bacchic festivals.

The thyrsus also was used on those occasions, because it was the magical wand appropriated to Dionysus, as the caduceus was to Hermes, or Mercury. The thyrsus was a staff or spear, terminated by a pine cone and entwined with ivy. It was to Dionysus the peculiar ensign of authority, with which he controlled the enthusiasm of his followers and worshipers. This, and the crown of ivy twined around his brows, were the distinctive attributes of his divinity. Thus Euripides, in his "Bacchæ," says: "Blest and happy is he who, initiated into the sacred rites of the gods, leads a pure life; who, celebrating the orgies of the Great Mother Cybele, brandishes on high the thyrsus, and with ivy crowned becomes the worshiper of Bacchus." Or, to borrow the poetic version of Potter:

"To whom the mysteries of the gods are known,
By these his life he sanctifies,
And deep imbibed their chaste and cleaning lore,
Hallows his soul for converse with the skies.
Enraptur'd' ranging the wild mountains o'er
The mighty mother's orgies leading,
He, his head with ivy shading,
His light spear wreath'd with ivy twine,
To Bacchus holds the rites divine."

There was a legend connected with this consecration of the ivy to Dionysus of which we only ~~know this much~~: Cissus, a youth much beloved by Bacchus, was accidently killed while sporting with the satyrs. Bacchus metamorphosed him into an ivy, the Greek name of which is cissos, or kissos, and thenceforth that plant became the favorite of the god. Of these legends connecting sacred plants with the deities to whom they were consecrated, I have already spoken when treating especially of the myrtle. As we now possess them, they are manifestly imperfect and insufficient. Undoubtedly they were complete and full of symbolism as they were taught in the secret instructions of the mysteries. But these associations have passed away, and with them have gone their mystical teachings. Masonry has preserved such a legend in its Hiramic role, and the symbolism of the acacia, as we have it in all its completeness, very fairly indicates what was the true nature and symbolism of the myrtle, the laurel, the ivy, and other sacred plants.

The ivy is introduced in the Homeric hymn to Dionysus. The tale is also told by Ovid, but perhaps not so well. The Homeric one is thus:

Bacchus once appeared on the shores of a desert island in the form of a handsome youth. Being seen by some Tyrrenian pirates who were sailing by, they landed, and supposing him to to be of royal birth, made him their captive and carried him on board. They first bound him with cords; but these instantly fell off. On seeing this miracle, the pilot exclaimed that he was a god, and exhorted the crew to put him on shore again, lest he should excite a tempest. But the Captain rebuked him for his advice, and declared that they would take the captive to Egypt or some other country, and sell him as a slave. They then set sail. The wind was blowing freshly, and they were proceeding joyously on their course, when lo! streams of fragrant wine began to flow along the decks, vines with clustering bunches of grapes spread over the sails, and ivy laden with berries ran up the mast and sides of the vessel. The terrified sailors now called to the pilot to make for the land, but the god, assuming the form of a fiery lion, seized the Captain, while the crew, leaping into the sea for safety, were instantly changed into dolphins. The pilot alone remained on board, to whom the god revealed himself.

Another of these hymns relates that when Dionysus grew up he roamed through the woody vales crowned with bay and ivy, whence one of his Grecian epithets was Dionysos Kissophoros, or "ivy bearing Bacchus."

It was especially to Bacchus in inferis—the Bacchus of the shades—he who had descended to Hades and returned—that the ivy was originally consecrated. Hence, in the nocturnal festivals, called Agrionia, which were celebrated by the Grecian women and the priests of Dionysus, the ivy was used as a sacred or mystical plant. In these mystic rites the celebrants sought the lost god. His loss, if we are to judge analogically from the other mysteries, was typical of his death; his discovery was the restoration to life. It was again the exemplification of the doctrine of the resurrection to immortal life, and; although we do not know what was the esoteric legend of the Agrionian rites, we may well suppose that the ivy was, like the acacia in the Masonic mysteries, the symbol of immortality.

The ivy was, in fact, like all the other evergreen plants of the ancients which had been divinely consecrated, symbolic of a perpetuity of existence, or, in other words, of immortal life; an emblematic meaning which was indicated by the never-fading character of the plant. Bacchus, to whom it was consecrated, was himself a symbol of immortality by his perpetual youth. There was in him no decay. He and Apollo only, of all the gods, were represented as always young. In the language of the poet Tibullus,

"Solis æterna est Phœbo Bacchoque juventas."

Davies, in his "Mythology of the British Druids," shows very conclusively, from ancient authorities, that the rites of Bacchus were formerly celebrated in the British Islands. The druidical god who supplied the place of the Greek Dionysus or the Roman Bacchus was called Aedd, a name which was also given to the priest who conducted his worship. This god was represented as having undergone a resurrection—as having died and been restored to life—and one of his attributes was the carrying of an ivy branch, whence the Britons used that plant when celebrating his rites. Hence Taliesen, the Welsh bard of the Druids, when describing the character of this god in one of his mystical poems, says: "I have died, I have revived, and I have been a leader conspicuous with my ivy branch." This is a description that might well suit the classic Dionysus, who was represented in the mysteries as having been slain by the Titans and then restored to life; but the point in connection with the present subject to which attention is particularly to be directed, is that in all these scenes the ivy, as the symbol of immortality, plays its appropriate part.

The early Christians, borrowing, as they did, much of their ceremonial practices from the pagans, whose effete religion their better dispensation had supplanted, preserved this symbolic character of the ivy and used it as a decoration of their churches on Christmas, the great festival of him who "brought life and immortality to light." Thus Brand cites the following lines from an old poem:

> "At Christmas men do always ivy get,
> And in each corner of the house it set."

The same author gives numerous instances of the decoration of houses and churches with ivy at the great Christmas festival. But what is singular is that in an old carol of the time of Henry VI. the ivy is represented as a plant that was to be used at funerals, selected in this capacity, undoubtedly, on account of its symbolic reference to the doctrine of immortality; for Mr. Pugin tells us, in his "Glossary," that the ivy, "from its remaining continually green, has been interpreted as a symbol of eternal life."

It is not surprising that the ivy, thus symbolized as a plant of immortality, should, like the laurel, the olive, and the palm, have been adopted as one of the insignia of successful poets, and that he whose verses were expected to be immortal should receive as his reward an ivy crown. Thus Horace, addressing Mæcenas, calls the ivy "the reward of learned brows:"

> "Te doctarum hederæ prœmia frontium
> Diis miscent superis."
> lib. I., od. i., 29.

> "An ivy wreath, fair learning's prize, > Raises Mæcenas to the skies."
> Francis.

And Virgil, in that beautiful eclogue in which Meliboeus narrates the alternate contests of Thyrsis and Corydon for poetic pre-eminence, makes the former call on the Arcadian shepherds to crown him with ivy as the expected victor in the literary struggle.

> "Pastores hedera crexentem ornate poetam Arcades."

The ivy was thus selected as the prize of poetic victory not, as some of the commentators have supposed, because poets, like the ivy, were consecrated to Bacchus on account of the enthusaism with which, like the Bacchanals, they were possessed, but because the ivy, as a symbol of immortal life, was significant of the eternal glory of their verses.

XVII.

THE VINE.

The consideration of the ivy as a symbolic plant, very naturally suggests that of the vine of the grape as its mythologic companion. Like the former, the latter has, in ancient mythology, been consecrated to Dionysus or Bacchus. Indeed, the vine was so peculiarly the plant of Dionysus that, in one of his appellations, he was frequently called "the vine-god." "There was no nation upon earth," says the historian Diodorus, "neither Grecian nor foreign, that was not indebted to this deity for some mark of munificence and favor. He taught the people to plant the vine and to preserve the juice of the grape, and to lay up the fruits of the earth in proper repositories. Hence, in consequence of the blessing that he had bestowed upon mankind by giving them the juice of the grape, the vine is said to have been consecrated to him as his own peculiar plant." It need hardly be remarked, after what has been said by me on former occasions and in reference to other plants, that this simple method of explaining the consecration of sacred plants by no means agrees with the real and recondite symbolism of the ancient mythologists.

We have seen, in the instances of the laurel, the myrtle, and the olive, as well as other mystical plants, that there was a legend connecting the deity with the particular plant which was consecrated to him. A similar legend connects the vine with Dionysus as his sacred plant. The word which denotes the vine in the Greek language is Ampelos. Now, Ampelus, says one of the mythologic legends, was a fair haired youth, who dwelt in Thrace, and was the offspring of a satyr and a nymph. To him, says Ovid in his Fasti, Bacchus gave a vine which hung pendant from the foliage of an elm, the vine receiving its name from that of the youth. While he was heedlessly gathering the blushing grapes from a branch of the tree, he fell and was killed, on which Bacchus conveyed him to the stars.

But the legend of Ampelus, thus briefly told by Ovid, is differently related by other mythologists. According to them, Ampelus was a youth, the companion of Dionysus. Contrary to the advice of that god, he persisted in sporting with wild beasts. Ate, the goddess of revenge, persuaded him, on one occasion, to torment a bull, and by doing so, he provoked the moon, to whom that animal was sacred. She sent a gadfly to sting the bull, when, amid its rearings and plungings, Ampelus fell and broke his neck. Dionysus, grieved at the loss of his favorite, applied to the Fates for their assistance, and Atropos, moved by his urgent entreaties, promised to restore Ampelus to him in another form. Forthwith a vine, thenceforth called after the youth, was produced, laden with grapes, from the earth. Dionysus and the satyrs discovered the invention of wine, and the plant from which that beverage was extracted became forever after consecrated to the god.

We see material differences in the details of these two legends, but they agree in the important points that the vine is represented in both by the youth Ampelus, and that in both the slain youth undergoes a transformation or restoration to a new form, in the former legend as a star or constellation, in the latter as a plant. The idea of a restoration to life, or, in other words, of a resurrection, is thus symbolized by the vine, as by the acacia, the laurel, the palm, and other plants.

The true symbolism of the vine can, however, never be thoroughly and fairly appreciated unless we first divest ourselves of the vulgar idea that Bacchus was the god of intoxication. It is true that we find him saying, in the Homeric hymn,

> "The offspring of Jove and Semele's love
> Am I, and the God of Wine;
> Shouting and song to me belong,
> And the gift of the generous vine."

But this was a later thought. In the old Pelasgic religion, we shall find that Bacchus, or Dionysus, as has already been shown in the preceding article, was the deity or divine principle that represented in their mystical theology the productive power of nature—that by which all things were renewed, so that nothing entirely passed away—a great doctrine, which was concealed in the mysteries. In the Dionysiac initiations, Dionysus, like Osiris, his Egyptian prototype, was made by scenic representation to shadow forth the sublime lesson of the resurrection from death to life, he himself dying to be revived.

"In the British Museum," says Mr. Payne Knight, "is a group in marble of three figures, the middle one a human form growing out of a vine, with leaves and clusters of grapes issuing out of its body. On one side is an androgynous figure representing the twice-born Bacchus, and on the other a leopard, with a garland of ivy round its neck, leaping up and devouring the grapes which sprung from the body of the personified vine, the hands of which are employed in receiving another cluster from the Bacchus. This composition represents the vine between the creating and destroying attributes of the deity. The one giving it fruit, and the other devouring it when given. The poets conveyed the same meaning," says Mr. Knight, "in the allegorical tales of the loves of Bacchus and Ampelus, who, as the name indicates, was only the vine personified.

The fact that the vine produces a fruit which has always been of vast importance to mankind, has added to its sacred character among the ancients. The Hebrews used it as a symbol of restoration from an old and effete form to a new and prolific one. Hence the Psalmist, alluding to the restoration of the Jewish people from the bondage and oppression of Egypt to the liberty and religious truth of Palestine, says: "Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt; thou hast cast out the heathen and planted it. Thou preparedst room before it, and didst cause it to take deep root, and it filled the land. The hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars."

Still more beautiful is the symbolism of that sublime passage in the fifth chapter of the prophet Isaiah, where the house of Israel is symbolized as the vineyard of Jehovah, which should have produced grapes, but, by the unkindness of the people, brought forth only berries. Nor must we forget that still more important passage in the New Testament, where the Saviour of men says: "I am the true vine, and my father is the husbandman," a symbolic expression very faithfully explained as meaning, "I am the root, fountain, and head of influence whence my people derive life, fruitfulness, and all good."

Hence the ancients gave a character of great sanctity to wine as the juice of the fruit of the vine. The opaque incumbrance of the body, to borrow the language of a learned symbologist, was enlightened by its stimulating qualities. It was thus looked upon as the means of temporary inspiration, and was supposed to be the medium of communion with the deity; it was used on all solemn occasions as a bond of union and a pledge of faith; it was poured out as a fitting libation in the ceremonies of divine worship, and to such excess did the heathens carry this notion of the religious use of wine, that drinking it to intoxication was, in certain cases, considered as a meritorious act of devotion; for Plato says that to drink wine to excess is never becoming or proper except in the solemn festivals of the deity.

In brief, we must come to the conclusion which has been adopted by Mr. R. P. Knight, that the vine was the favorite symbol of the deity, and seems to have been generally employed to signify the generative or preservative attribute of nature. In the myth of Ampelus, or the vine slain and restored to life, we find renewed the old Hiramic legend of the acacia and the symbolic teaching of the doctrine of the resurrection.

The Rite of Memphis.

BY ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D.

The system called the "Rite of Memphis" has, within a short period, attracted so much of the attention of the Masonic public of this country, by the energetic efforts of its friends and admirers to propagate it in various northern and western states, that a few brief notices of its history will not, perhaps, be unacceptable to the numerous readers of THE TROWEL. I have no disposition to review the rite in anything like a controversial spirit, or to say anything of its value as a philosophical system, or to examine its claims to legality as a Masonic organization. Not being a member of it myself, it would probably be contended that I could not speak understandingly of the former, and, as a member of another rite, it might be claimed that I could not speak impartially of the latter. I propose, therefore to confine myself to a review, based on authentic materials, of its origin, its progress, and its present position. Such a review every competent Mason has a right to make and every inquiring Mason has a right to hear.

It is very universally admitted that the Rite of Memphis is the successor of the exploded Rite of Misraim, and therefore, if we follow the good old rule of "commencing at the commencement," it would be proper that we should first say something of that rite.

Lenning, who wrote his "Encyclopedia of Freemasonry" (a German work) in 1824, calls the Rite of Misraim "one of the latest of the monstrous visionary schemes introduced into Freemasonry." Ragon, in his "Orthodoxie Maçonnique," characterizes it as "a fantastical connection of various rites and degrees." It originated, says Clavel, at Milan, in the year 1805, in consequence of several brethren having been refused admission into the Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Rite, which had just been established in that city. One Lechangeur has the credit of organizing the rite and selecting the statutes by which it was to be governed. It consisted at first of only eighty-seven degrees, to which three others were subsequently added. Sixty-six of the ninety degrees thus formed are said to have been taken from the Ancient and Accepted Rite, while the remaining twenty-four were either borrowed from other systems or were the invention of Lechangeur and his colleagues, Joly and Bedarride. The system of Misraim spread over Italy, and in 1814 was introduced into France. Dissensions in the rite soon took place, and an attempt was unsuccessfully made to obtain the recognition of the Grand Orient of France. This having been refused, the Supreme Council was dissolved in 1817, but the lodges of the rite still continued to confer the degrees, although, according to the constitution of French Masonry, their non-recognition by the Grand Orient had the effect of making them illegal. But eventually the rite ceased altogether to exist as an active and independent system, and its place in Masonic history seems only to be preserved by two massive volumes on the subject, written by Mark Bedarride, the most intelligent and indefatigable of its founders.

In 1839, two French Masons, named respectively Marconis and Moullet, but of whom the former was undoubtedly the leader, instituted, first at Paris, then at Marseilles, and afterwards at Brussels, a new rite which they called the "Rite of Memphis," and which consisted of ninety-one degrees. Subsequently, another degree was added to this already too long list. The rite, however, has repeatedly undergone modifications. This Rite of Memphis was undoubtedly founded on the extinct Rite of Misraim, for, as Ragon says, the Egyptian Rite seems to have inspired Marconis and Moullet in the organization of their new rite. It is said by Ragon, who has written copiously on the rite, that the first series of degrees, extending to the thirty-fifth degree, is an assumption of the thirty-three degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Rite, with scarcely a change of name. The remaining degrees of the rite are borrowed, according to the same authority, from other well known systems, and some, perhaps, the invention of their founders.

The Rite of Memphis was not at first recognized by the Grand Orient of France, and consequently formed no part of legal French Masonry. So about 1852 its lodges were closed by the civil authority, and the rite, to use a French Masonic phrase, "went to sleep."

In the year 1862, Marconis, still faithful to the system which he had invented, applied to the Grand Master of France to give to it a new life. The Grand College of Rites was consulted on the subject, and the Council of the Order having made a favorable decree, the Rite of Memphis was admitted, in November, 1862, among those Masonic systems which acknowledge obedience to the Grand Orient of France, and perform their functions within its bosom. To obtain this position, however, the only one which, in France, preserves a Masonic system from the reputation of being clandestine, it was necessary that Marconis, who was then the Grand Hierophant, should, as a step preliminary to any favorable action on the part of the Grand Orient, take an obligation by which he forever after divested himself of all authority, of any kind whatsoever, over the rite. It passed entirely out of his hands, and, going into "obedience" to the Grand Orient, that body has taken complete and undivided possession of it, and laid its high degrees upon the shelf, as Masonic curiosities, since the Grand Orient only recognizes, in practice, the thirty-three degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Rite.

This, then, is the present position of the Rite of Memphis in France. Its original possessors have disclaimed all further control or direction of it. It has been admitted by the Grand Orient among the eight systems or rites which are placed "under its obedience"; that is to say, it admits its existence, but it does not suffer it to be worked. Like all Masonic rites that have ever been invented, the organization of the Rite of Memphis is founded on the first three degrees of Ancient Craft Masonry. These three degrees, of course, are given in symbolic lodges. In 1862, when Marconis surrendered the rite into the hands of the ruling powers of French Masonry, many of these lodges existed in various parts of France, although in a dormant condition, because, as we have already seen, ten years before they had been closed by the civil authority. Had they been in active operation, they would not have been recognized by the French Masons; they would have been looked upon as clandestine and there would have been no affiliation with them, because the Grand Orient recognizes no Masonic bodies as legal which do not in return recognize it as the head of French Masonry.

But when Marconis surrendered his powers as Grand Hierophant of the Rite of Memphis to the Grand Orient, that body permitted these lodges to be resuscitated and reopened only on the conditions that they would acknowledge their subordination to the Grand Orient; that they would work only in the first three degrees and never confer any degree higher than that of Master Mason; the members of these lodges, however high might be their dignities in the Rite of Memphis, were to be recognized only as Master Masons; every Mason of the Rite of Memphis was to deposit his Masonic titles with the Grand Secretary of the Grand Orient; these titles were then to be vised or approved and regularized, but only as far as the degree of Master Mason; no Mason of the Rite of Memphis was to be permitted to claim any higher degree, and if he attempted to assume any such title of a higher degree which was not approved by the Grand Master, he was to be considered as irregular, and was not to be affiliated with by the members of any of the regular lodges.

Such is now the condition of the Rite of Memphis in France. It has been absorbed into the Grand Orient; Marconis, its founder and head, has surrendered all claim to any jurisdiction over it; there are lodges under the jurisdiction of the Grand Orient which originally belonged to the Rite of Memphis, and they practice its ritual, but only so far as to give the degrees of Apprentice, Fellow Craft, and Master Mason. Its "Sages of the Pyramids," its "Grand Architects of the Mysterious City," its "Sovereign Princes of the Magi of the Sanctuary of Memphis," with its "Sanctuary," its "Mystical Temple," its "Liturgical College," its "Grand Consistory," and its "Supreme Tribunal," exist no longer except in the diplomas and charters which have been quietly laid away on the shelves of the Secretariat of the Grand Orient. To attempt to propagate the rite is now in France a high Masonic offense. The Grand Orient alone has the power, and there is no likelihood that it will ever exercise it. Some circumstances which have recently occurred in the Grand Orient of France very clearly show the true condition of the Rite of Memphis. A meeting was holden at Paris on the 26th August last by the Council of the Order, a body which, something like the Committee of General Purposes of the Grand Lodge of England, does all the preliminary business for the Grand Orient, but which is possessed of rather extensive legislative and administrative powers, as it directs the Order during the recess of the Grand Orient. At that meeting, a communication was received from a lodge in Moldavia, called "The Disciples of Truth," which lodge is under the jurisdiction of the Grand Orient of France, having been chartered by that body. This communication stated that certain brethren of that lodge had been invested by one Carence with the degree of Rose Croix in the Rite of Memphis, and that the diplomas had been dated at the "Grand Orient of Egypt," and signed by Bro. Marconis as Grand Hierophant. The commission of the Council of the Order to whom the subject was referred, reported that the conferring of these degrees was null and void; that neither Carence nor Marconis had any commission, authority, or power to confer degrees of the Memphis Rite or to organize bodies; and that Marconis had by oath solemnly divested himself of all right to claim the title of Grand Hierophant of the rite, which oath, originally taken in May, 1862, had at several subsequent times, namely, in September, 1863, March, 1864, September, 1865, and March, 1866, been renewed. As a matter of clemency, the Council determined not for the present at least to prefer charges against Marconis and Carence, before the Grand Orient, but to warn them of the error they committed in making a traffic of Masonic degrees. It also ordered the report to be published and widely diffused, so that the Fraternity might be apprized that there was no power outside of the Grand Orient which could confer the high degrees of any rite.

The Rite of Memphis has lately been introduced into this country. By what authority it exists and is propagated, I know not; whether that authority comes from the Grand Orient of France, which seems now to be the only legal depository of the rite, or from Marconis, the self-deposed Grand Hierophant, are questions which I am unable to answer, because I have never seen any of the charters or diplomas issued by those who are conferring the degrees and establishing lodges of the rite. But this I suppose will be conceded. The Rite of Memphis claims for itself a high position as a philosophical rite of Masonry. With ninety-two degrees, all bearing high-sounding names, it professes to teach the great moral, historical, and philosophical principles of Masonry in a pre-eminently excellent system. It is not, then, too much to ask for light on this subject, and to request some of the brethren most interested in the propagation of this rite in the United States to lay before the Fraternity an authentic account of their claims to legality, and of their powers to confer these high dignities of the order. When an article is presented to us for the first time, our curiosity is naturally excited to know something about its origin, its character, and its uses. As Masons, we are accustomed, when we are in darkness, to ask for light.

Two Fables from the German.

TRANSLATED BY BRO. R. J. COLBURN, OF PLEIADES LODGE.

THE NIGHTINGALE AND THE CHAFFINCH.

The nightingale went once upon a journey; and for company she took with her a chaffinch. They flew over valley and mountain, and at last, upon a certain day, they came to a beautiful forest, into which they let themselves down. Scarcely had they alighted upon a bush, when a great crowd of the birds of the forest assembled themselves around, in order to see the strangers. All wondered at the chaffinch, and praised his black head, his gray back, and the beautiful red of his breast.

"This must be a very distinguished traveler," said one to another. "The other one is very plain; probably he is the servant." They kept pressing closer and closer around the beautifully feathered chaffinch, and, by degrees, crowded the nightingale into an unobserved corner.

Finally, the birds besought the chaffinch that he would let them hear his voice, for they supposed that his song must be equal to his dress; so he let himself be persuaded, and sang. But the birds that had before wondered, now only laughed at him.

"What a horrid voice!" said they one to another, in a low tone; "If, now, he had only kept silent, we might have thought him a wonder." Just then, the nightingale, from her retired corner, raised her voice: "What is that?" cried all the birds with wonder and pleasure. "What a magnificent song. Why! the unassuming stranger sings so beautifully! O! friend, thou surpassest all singers in beauty and strength of song. The voice puts to shame the dress."

Judge not by appearances, for often in an unassuming dress is hidden the rarest talent.—Grimm.

THE HERMIT AND THE BEAR.

A hermit had brought up a young bear, and, through careful attention, food, and caresses, had made him as tame as a dog. The bear now often brought home to his instructor considerable pieces of game, carried wood and water, watched his hut, and, in short, rendered him all the offices of a servant. Once upon a summer day, the hermit lay stretched out on the grass and slept. Near him sat the bear, and kept away the flies, which swarmed around the old man in hordes. One fly in particular plagued him; full ten times had the bear driven it away, and yet it as often came back again; but now, as it had once more alighted upon the forehead of the sleeper, the bear cried out indignantly: "Wait! wait! I will teach you to stay away!" With these words he seized a stone, took correct aim, and crushed the fly; but alas, with it also, as might be supposed, the head of the old man.

Choose neither simple nor too rude men as your friends! else, with the best intention, they may do you more injury than your worst enemy. —Lavater.

Jacob's Ladder.

Isaac had two sons, Esau and Jacob. When, in his old age, Isaac was about to bless his eldest son, and so to communicate to him the blessings and the promises which he had received from T. G. A. O. T. U., Rebekah, by an unworthy stratagem, taking advantage of the dimness of Isaac's eyes, succeeded in getting the blessing given to her younger and favorite son, Jacob. The history of this, the deceit practiced on the old and infirm Isaac, is very touching. In consequence of this, however, Jacob had to flee from his brother, Esau, for his life. He went to Padanaram to stay with Laban, his maternal uncle. On the road, one night while asleep, he saw a vision—"a ladder set up on the earth and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it." God from above the ladder deigned to make a covenant with Jacob, and in the morning Jacob took one of the stones which he used for a pillow, and set it up as a pillar, and called the name of the place Bethel. This ladder is the original of the ladder depicted in our lodges. It rests upon the volume of the Sacred Law. It has innumerable staves around, of which there are three principal ones, Faith, Hope, and Charity, and its summit is concealed in heaven, symbolized by the cloudy canopy.

We find this symbol universally adopted, but with seven steps. There is much question as to whether Jacob's ladder is the universal antetype, for the Mexican believed in an ascent to heaven by seven steps. "In the midst of a dense forest called Taxin, near the Gulf of Mexico, was the pyramid of Papantha." Humboldt tells us: "It had seven stories, was built of stone, and was beautifully and regularly shaped." When, however, we remember that the Mexicans certainly had traditions of the exodus of the children of Israel, it is perfectly possible that, though we can not now trace how, they originally knew of Jacob's vision.

In the Persian mysteries, the ladder had seven gates, which were symbolical of the soul's approach to perfection. In the initiation, the candidate had to pass through seven caverns, each of which terminated in a narrow orifice, which also formed the entrance to its successor, and through which the candidate had to squeeze his body. This was called the ascent of the ladder. Each round was supposed to be of metal, increasing in purity, represented a state of existence, and was called by the name of a planet. In the table at the end, copied with slight additions from Oliver's "Signs and Symbols," will be found the names of these. The mythological history of the Rustam also contains references to this ladder, for we find him on a certain occasion going along the road of seven stages, during which he passes through six trials.

In the Gothic mysteries, the neophyte met with seven obstructions.

In the Scandinavian mysteries, we have the great tree Torasil, which is supposed to be similar to the ladder.

The Jews believed that the ladder had fifty gates. Moses ascended to the forty-ninth. Joshua could not get beyond the forty-eighth, and even Solomon could not open the fiftieth, which led directly into the presence of T. G. A. O. T. U. There was also an old tradition that the ascent to the paradisaical Mount of God was by a pyramid of seven stages.

The Essenes reduced the steps to seven, and called the ladder the Sephiroth. There were afterwards added three, called Intelligence, Wisdom, and Crown, the original seven being named Strength, Mercy, Beauty, Victory, or Eternity, Glory, the Foundation, and the Kingdom.

There are several theories as to what was the universal origin of this seven-stage ascent. One is, that it arose from the sevenfold divisions in the creation of the world. This is supposed by the fact that each step or stage was assigned to a day in the week and to a planet. We know that in almost every country the seven days of the week and the seven planets corresponded. A second theory is, that they referred to Noah and his seven companions, in support of which is the fact that many nations worshiped seven hero-gods. A third theory is, that they represented the seven stories of the Tower of Babel, which were completed before the dispersion. My own theory is, that the idea arose simply from believing that God was above us; that reception into heaven would be the reward of the righteous; and there were seven steps given to the means of ascent, whether pyramid, pagoda, or ladder, from the general belief in the sacredness of the number seven. A general account of this number and of its universal adoption as sacred, would stretch this paper beyond the limits I have proposed to myself.

In our lodges this ladder is shown as resting on the volume of the Sacred Law, having innumerable steps, the three principal of which are called Faith, Hope, and Charity, and its summit concealed in the cloudy canopy.

In the church of St. Maria Maggiore, in Rome, is depicted a geometrical staircase having three gates, one at the bottom, one half way up, and one at the top. This is, in fact, the equivalent of our ladder.

An explanation of our ladder, as given by Fellows, I quote from Bro. Oliver, and I add his remark at the end; and I am sure most, if not all, of my readers will cordially concur in his protest: "Faith is the genius of spring; Hope of summer, and Charity of autumn. Faith of spring, because faith and work must always come together; Hope of summer, because from that point the sun looks vertically down upon the seeds which have been committed in faith to the fertilizing bosom of the earth; Charity of autumn, because then the sun empties his cornucopia into our desiring laps. Faith is the eastern pillars; Charity is the western; and Hope the keystone of this Royal Arch." To which Bro. Oliver adds: "It will be unnecessary to say that I differ in toto from the above author in his appropriation of those sublime virtues, and solemnly protest against the principle of making Hope, instead of Charity, the keystone of the Arch."—Anon.

NEW HALL AT SHANGHAI, CHINA.—The brethren at Shanghai have erected a Masonic Temple for their accommodation, which was dedicated with public ceremonies in October last. The cost was $6,000, not $600,000, as the telegraph reported it, and as announced in the secular papers. There was a torch-light procession on the occasion of the dedication, in which an American fire engine was brought out, being the first ever seen in China.

Brotherly Love.

Of all the qualities that constitute a true Mason, perhaps none illustrate him more than brotherly love. This must be exemplified and exhibited, because there are hundreds who are unqualified for a constant and warm reciprocation of benevolence, as they are incapacitated for any other elevated excellence, by perpetual attention to their own interest, and unresisting subjection to their inclinations. They do not regard the whole human species as one family—the high and low, rich and poor alike. Some are mutable and uncertain, soon attracted by new objects, disgusted without offense, and alienated without enmity. Others are soft and flexible; easily influenced by reports and whispers; ready to catch alarms from every dubious circumstance, and to listen to every suspicion which envy and flattery shall suggest; to follow the opinion of every confident adviser, and to move by the impulse of the last breath. Some are impatient of contradiction, more willing to go wrong by their own judgment, than to be indebted for a better or a safer way to the sagacity of another, inclined to consider counsel as insult, and inquiry as want of confidence; and to confer their regard on no other terms than unreserved submission and implicit compliance. Some are dark and involved, equally careful to conceal good and bad purposes, and pleased with producing effects by invisible means, and showing their design only in its execution. Others are universally communicative, without the necessary vigilance of caution or the honest art of prudent integrity; ready to accuse without malice, and to betray without treachery. Any of these may be useful to a community and pass through the world with the reputation of good purposes and uncorrupted morals, but they are unfit for close and tender intimacies. How should we find a man answering this description, what matters it, that he calls himself a Mason, for he is not a Jew which is one outwardly, but he that is one inwardly, in the heart and spirit, and not in the letter—and such, too, is the Mason.—Voice.

Forbearing one Another.

"Forbearing one another in love" is a Bible injunction, and if carried out practically in every department of human life as between neighbors, friends, fellow-citizens; as between employers and employed; master and servant; brother and sister; parent and children; minister and people, governor and governed, one-half of all the misery of human life would be averted; millions would be prevented from giving themselves up to habitual crime; other millions would be prevented from being discouraged into thriftlessnesss and degrading indulgencies, and a multitude which no man can number would be invited upwards to fill positions of usefulness, trust, and honor, who otherwise will die by violence, in prisons, or under the gallows.

A gentleman, now a New York millionaire, married a beautiful widow his second wife; they had been mutually acquainted some years. By some means the husband was detained to a late hour in the night, within a week after their marriage; the new wife was found waiting for him; the door being locked she was asked to open it; the request was denied; the husband quietly repaired to another room, and at the end of twelve years has never visited her, nor ever will, most likely.

A young wife, within a few months after her marriage, was horrified one night on going to the door to let her husband in, to find him intoxicated—so much so that he could hardly stand. A thunder-stroke in a clear winter's sky could not have more surprised her; friends were in the drawing-room, expecting him every moment; with a woman's quickness and instinct, she hurried him to his chamber, with loving words put him to sleep, made some excuse for the mutual benefit of friends and servants, watched over him through the weary hours of night, and next morning when he waked, she had no harsh reproof ready for him, no withering rebuke, but tenderly alluded to the facts of the case, and kissed away his confusion. There it dropped. He never tasted another drop; raised a family of sons who are respectable and successful merchants in New York and Philadelphia, and dying, left a name for mercantile integrity which any man might envy.

But the principles may be illustrated with other recitals than our own.

A merchant in London had a dispute with a Quaker respecting the settlement of an account. The merchant was determined to bring the account into court, a proceeding the Quaker earnestly deprecated, using every argument in his power to convince the merchant of his error; but the latter was inflexible. Desirous to make a last effort, the Quaker called at his house one morning, and inquired of the servant if his master was at home. The merchant hearing the inquiry, and knowing the voice, called out from the top of the stairs, "Tell that rascal I am not at home." The Quaker, looking up to him, calmly said, "Well, friend, God put thee in a better mind."

The merchant, struck afterward with the meekness of the reply, and having more deliberately investigated the matter, became convinced that the Quaker was right and he was wrong.

He requested to see him, and after acknowledging his error, he said: "I have one question to ask you; how were you able, with such patience, on various occasions to hear my abuse?"

"Friend," replied the Quaker, "I will tell thee. I was naturally as hot and violent as thou art. I knew that to indulge the temper was sinful, and I found it was imprudent. I found that men in a passion always spake loud; and I thought if I controlled my voice I should repress my passion. I have, therefore, made it a rule never to let my voice rise above a certain key, and by a careful observation of this rule, I have, by the blessing of God, entirely mastered my natural temper."

The Quaker reasoned philosophically, and the merchant, as every one else may do, benefited by his example.—Journal of Health.

The following extract from the annual address of Grand Master English is so full of good humor, hits, and points, that we can not refrain from giving it to our readers:

My Ill. Bro. Edward A. Guilbert, Past Grand Master of Iowa, and chairman of the Committee of Correspondence for that State, whose Masonic papers sparkle with the flashes of genius, and abound with forcible thoughts and elevated sentiments, thinks it would be better for us to abandon the enterprise of maintaining a college, and to devote our means to the erection and endowment of asylums for aged and indigent Masons, or for the destitute widows and orphans of Masons. The suggestion, emanating from so distinguished a source, passes like a shadow over my vision of the future glory of our infant college. But the shadow is transitory, and the light again appears. Away up in Iowa, where the climate is extremely rigorous, the people numerous, and life a battle with cold winds, snows, and sleets, mitigated by brief summers, no doubt asylums are needed for the care and comfort of the aged, the destitute, the infirm, and the helpless. But down here in this sunny land, things are different, and life is not such a struggle. Arkansas is a better country for poor people than Iowa. Here, where the inhabitants are not crowded, the hogs fatten on the mast, the cattle subsist nearly all the year on the range, the forest supplies the hunter with wild game, the streams and lakes furnish the table with fishes, the corn and other small crops are made with three months' labor, pine knots are good substitutes for coal oil, and unless the farmer chooses to cultivate cotton for the mere luxury of laboring in the hot sun, shaking with the chills, and coming out in debt at the end of the year, he has an easy life of it, compared with life in Iowa.

Our people have no great need for poor-houses, and not much fancy to live at them. The career of life has a sad and humiliating termination, when it eventuates in a public home for the aged and the friendless. I never knew an aged Mason, or the widow or orphan of a Mason, in Arkansas, to be driven for food and shelter to a poor-house.

Some years back, the brethren at Pine Bluff got up a grand enterprise of erecting a home for the destitute widows of Masons, and had me down there to lay the corner-stone, and deliver an oration on the occasion. Much enthusiasm prevailed, the contributions poured in, and the house was built; but our good old Bro. Brownfield, the kind-hearted and zealous projector of the enterprise, utterly failed to persuade a solitary Mason's widow to go and make it her home; and the house was converted into an academy!

We want a college in Arkansas, and if Bro. Guilbert will send his sons down here, we will give them free tickets, and have them taught Greek, Latin, French, German, mathematics, astronomy, and all the popular ologies and isms, (except mesmerism and spiritualism;) and when the boys are educated they will have no fancy to go back to his cold country, and Bro. Guilbert will have to move down here to be with the boys; and we will make him chairman of our Committee on Correspondence; and he may rest assured that the brethren will not permit him to take refuge in a poor-house, in his old age, for shelter and bread!

Arab Masons.

To the editor of the Indian Freemason's Friend:

My Dear Mr. Editor.—Looking over "A Trip to Barbary by a Round-about Route," by George Augustus Sala, I observed the following paragraph. Speaking of the town of Mostaganem, he says: "There is also a Franco-Arab School here and a Masonic lodge, with the odd title of the 'African Trinosophists.' The Arabs, as you may have heard, are great at Freemasonry; but they will never enter the French lodges, and very rarely even will consent to communicate Masonically with a Christian. I have been told of instances of their so doing; but they are few and not well authenticated."

Yours fraternally, O.

The Mother's First Gift.

There is no bereaved mother who can read the ensuing lines without tears, both of sorrow and of hope. They are by Mr. Robert S. Chilton, of Washington, and reflect honor upon his heart and his poetical "gift divine." Dempster married them to the most appropriately touching music.

She sits beside the cradle,
  And her tears are streaming fast,
For she sees the present only,
  While she thinks of all the past;
Of the days so full of gladness,
  When her first-born's answering kiss
Fill'd her soul with such a rapture
  That it knew no other bliss.
Oh! those happy, happy moments!
  They but deepen her despair,
For she bends above the cradle,
  And her baby is not there!

There are words of comfort spoken,
  And the leaden clouds of grief
Wear the smiling bow of promise,
  And she feels a sad relief;
But her wavering thoughts will wander
  Till they settle on the scene
Of the dark and silent chamber,
  And of all that might have been!
For a little vacant garment,
  Or a shining tress of hair,
Tells her heart, in tones of anguish,
  That her baby is not there!

She sits beside the cradle,
  But her tears no longer flow,
For she sees a blessed vision,
  And forgets all earthly woe;
Saintly eyes look down upon her,
  And the voice that hushed the sea
Stills her spirit with the whisper,
  "Suffer them to come to Me."
And while her soul is lifted
  On the soaring wings of prayer,
Heaven's crystal gates swing inward,
  And she sees her baby there!

Lord Brougham.—When practicing at the Scotch bar, Lord Brougham joined a vacation yatchting party to the Western Isles. Except himself, the party were Masonic. The Masons having been invited by the brethren of the lodge Fortrose, Stornoway, to pay them a visit, Brougham was entered, passed, and raised on the occasion. On the party's return to Edenburgh, his lordship affiliated into the lodge Canongate Kilwinning, and was a frequent attender till he settled in London.—Freemasons' Magazine.

The Anti-Masonic Movement in Cuba.

By recent intelligence from the Havana, we learn that the Lieut. Governor of Sagua d'Antonia, M. Poras, was sent to Spain on the first of November, under arrest, for having permitted and participated in the formation of a Masonic lodge in that city, in connection with several of the most distinguished inhabitants of the place. The Director of Public Works at Sagua has also been sent to Spain for the same offense, and the civil magistrates, the members of the Secretary's office, the officers of the volunteer corps, and the Director of the City Schools, have also been deprived of their official places for the same cause. The lodge was working openly and with perfect confidence, under the impression that the government tolerated its existence; but its members should have learned from the record of the past that there is no confidence to be placed in tyrants or religious bigots. It is not, however, in view of all the facts in the case, very surprising that our brethren at Sagua should have been deceived by a misplaced confidence; for Masonic lodges are by no means confined to that city; nor have the brethren in other parts of the island been particularly careful in concealing their meetings from the civil authorities; believing that their only danger was from the priests, who are undoubtedly at the bottom of the present movement.

The suppression of a single lodge in Sagua is not, of itself, of much importance, as affecting the continued existence of the Order in the island, for there are other lodges, and two rival Supreme Councils of the thirty-third degree, with their subordinates, in active operation in other places. But the presumption is, that the persecution having been commenced, it will be pushed by the church to its greatest extremity, and may result disastrously to the brethren and to their organizations, at least for some time to come; or, to take the most favorable view of which the case apparently admits, they may be driven to hold their meetings with so much secrecy, and under such embarrassing and dangerous circumstances, as to render their temporary dissolution expedient as a matter of personal safety.

Masonry can not exist where Catholicism is in power. The two are as opposite to each other as religious toleration and sectarian bigotry. It is indeed true that Masonry lives and flourishes in many parts of Europe where Catholicism is in the ascendant, but the religious sentiment of those countries is, at the bottom, rank infidelity, and the masses care no more for the church and its fulminations than they do for the whistling of the winds. The Pope has recently had a trial of his ecclesiastical thunder on the Masons of France, and the result should have taught him a lesson. He and his priests might now profit by a careful comparison of the present status of the Order in Italy, with its condition before the revolution. But tyrants and bigots never profit by experience.

While the Catholic Church has everywhere, during the last six hundred years, been the uncompromising enemy of Freemasonry, as the exponent of liberal principles and religious toleration, Spain, of all the nations in Europe, has been the most relentless persecutor. The Order has never been able to achieve anything more than a temporary foothold in the kingdom proper, since the time of Ferdinand and Isabella, and the establishment of that infernal instrument of papal cruelty, the Inquisition. Its friends, indeed, met with occasional successes in introducing it into South America, before the separation of those States from the mother country; though even in them it had, as it now has, the opposition and bigotry of the church to contend with, and not unfrequently that of the civil authorities also. But in Spain proper, it has met with the steady opposition of both. The first attempt to establish a lodge there, of which we have any certain knowledge, was made by Lord Coleraine in 1727, in which year he gave a charter to certain English brethren then residing at Madrid, who opened a lodge in that city, which maintained a nominal existence for about fifty years, when it was abandoned. The next, and a more successful attempt, was made after the conquest of Spain by Napoleon I., and the setting of his brother Joseph upon the vacant throne. Some Spanish Masons, who had probably been admitted to the Order in France, united with the French brethren attached to the party of Joseph, and organized a Grand Orient for the Kingdom. This gave an impulse to the Order, and for a time the number of brethren increased rapidly; but imprudently interfering with the political affairs of the State, its usefulness and popularity were greatly impaired. At about the same time, and soon after the promulgation of the constitution, the patriots, or liberals, as they were termed, at Cadiz, who belonged to the Order, formed a lodge at that place; but it was soon after broken up by the fulmination of the following decree:

"We (Our Holy Father, the Pope, Holy Inquisitors, and beloved Ferdinand) henceforth offer to receive with open arms, and all that tenderness which has always characterized our ministry, those who, within the space of fifteen days from the date of this decree, shall spontaneously and voluntarily denounce themselves to us; but if any person—which God forbid!—persist in following the road to perdition, we shall employ, to our great regret, rigor and severity, causing the pains and penalties of the civil and canonical laws to be inflicted on the offenders."

This decree was followed by numerous arrests throughout the Peninsula, and many innocent persons were unfortunate enough to fall into the "open arms" of the Holy Inquisitors, whose embraces were like the loving coil of the boa-constrictor. The Grand Orient at Madrid, to which reference has been made, and which was established but a few months before, also fell a sacrifice to the holy decree. Some months after this, an eminent individual by the name of Beramendi, formed the plan of establishing at Grenada a new Grand Orient, in order to strengthen the ties of union among those brethren who had fortunately escaped falling into the "open arms" of the Inquisition. The attempt was at first attended with considerable success; but the existence of the body was not of long duration.

In 1815, the famous mandate of M. Miery Campillo, Inquisitor-General, was published and ordered to be read in every church in Spain, on the first Sunday in Lent. It reads as follows: "His Excellency, the Grand Inquisitor, enjoins all confessors, under pain of excommunication, to denounce to the holy office such persons as may have confessed themselves to belong to the Order of Freemasonry." Many brethren, failing to denounce themselves, were seized and thrown into prison, and subjected to torture and punishment.

In 1819, another decree of similar import was issued; and in 1826, still another. In the latter case, the Inquisitors attempted an exposition of the principles of Masonry, and adduced many sage arguments to show that Masonry and Judaism were synonymous, and had the same end in view! Attempts were also made at this time to suppress the growth of the Institution in the Island of Cuba, where it had been introduced by some brethren from France; and these attempts were so far successful, that they had the effect to drive the lodges into greater concealment. And such will be the result of the present movement at the suppression of the Order in the Island. Less than a century ago, the brethren who have now been sent to Spain, as above stated, on the charge of being Freemasons, would have now been subjected to the fiercest tortures of the Inquisition, and probably sentenced to the horrors of the auto de fe; but there is little danger of such a termination to their present offense. The age is too far advanced in civilization, and the power of the church is too uncertain, to justify any such extreme measure. Official disqualification, or fine and limited imprisonment, will probably be the extent of their punishment.

Since writing the above, the following has appeared in the New York Times. It is from the Havana correspondent of that paper, under date of Nov. 4:

"The anti-Masonic movement on the part of the government still continues. On the 28th ultimo, the rooms occupied by the Masonic lodge in Puerto Principie were visited by agents of the government; but, as the brethren had received information of the proposed visit long previously, no papers or documents were found; and, although it was a regular stated meeting night, only four persons could be found in the building. Male visitors in the houses around the lodge were very plentiful that evening. The four gentlemen found were taken into custody by the guardians of the public peace and morals, and liberated again after a confinement of three hours. What the end of this will be nobody knows. The government is alienating from itself the sympathies and good will of a large body of its most influential citizens, and without the least possible chance of gaining a friend, except among the ignorant."

The movement is at present ostensibly directed solely against the Masonic lodges; but this is deceptive and falls far short of the ultimate intention of its authors, which is the extermination, by means of the civil and ecclesiastical powers, of the liberal principles and progressive ideas in religion and politics which, for the last ten or fifteen years, have been rapidly increasing and spreading among the people of the island; and which, if not suppressed (and this will not be an easy task), will, at no very distant day, work out an entire separation from the mother country, and escape from ecclesiastical bondage and oppression. The authorities see and fear this result, and hence the present persecution of the lodges, which embrace in their memberships the leading minds and influential men of the island. But the result is inevitable, and the course now being pursued will only hasten it on.—Freemasons' Magazine.

The Christianity of Masonry.

It is somewhat strange that any one should be called upon to defend Masonry in this regard. Among the first things which the initiate discovers, is that the Bible is the great light of Masonry. All are instructed to regard it as such, and no lodge can be opened or closed without its resting upon the altar. The principles of this book are regarded as a sacred record by Jews, Christians, and Masons, and as such, in its instructions of faith, hope, love, and immortality, it is a book of divine authority. Viewing this record in this light, how some, who profess to be Christians, and who minister at the Christian altar, can say that Masonry is not a religious institution, is more than we can understand. We do not believe it to be sectarian or dogmatic. It rests upon a broader platform than sect or party. Its great noble principles look above and beyond the bounds of party. And this is the reason why we regard it as a theory with Christian principles, without any of its sectarisms.

We are aware that many of our brethren fear that if we undertake to establish it as a religious institution, that moment we substitute the Masonic lodge for the church. We do not view it in this light, any more than we do when we contend that this government, with its laws and principles predicated upon Christian ethics, is a substitute for the church.

It is what all phases of infidelity would rejoice to see established in the minds of the members of the Masonic Fraternity—to look upon Masonry as not being Christian in its principles. If this can be firmly fixed in the mind as a faith, then a great achievement is won. If it is not religious, it must be infidel, and the lodge would no longer be the proper place for any professed Christian or Israelite, and would be the home of the unbeliever and infidel. And, as we remarked, it is strange that any professed Christian, who has advanced from step to step in Masonry, should ever deny the Christianity of the Institution. It appears to us that the moment we do this, then we virtually declare that it is infidelity, and therefore should no longer close our portals to the atheist and religious scoffer, but oil the hinges of the door and let it swing wide open for the entrance of all, without let or hindrance.

We entertain no fears whatever that Masonry, even if established as a Christian institution, will ever overthrow the true principles of the Christian religion. It is utterly impossible. The supreme principle of Christianity is, that we do to others as we would that they should do to us. This is Masonry. The compass circumscribes us, and imperiously demands that we do justice to all mankind—to every class and condition of humanity.

Christianity teaches her adherents to pray—"Our Father, forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." Masonry does the same. The measure we meet to others will be measured out to us, is a Christian law and principle, and is Masonic. Christianity teaches a firm faith and trust in God. So Masonry. Both say, bow before him as the all-wise I AM. Christianity teaches life and immortality. So does Masonry. Both must and will outlive the narrow views of party and sect of every shade and color. Neither can run their train of unbounded and great principles of love upon the single narrow track of party.

Just as long as we are divided and sub-divided into so many parties and sects, and cultivate our respective prejudices, thus long the system of Masonry will be cherished and loved above party and sect by a large class of our brotherhood. And we hesitate not to say, that we would rather the community should be most thoroughly educated and firmly fixed in the principles of Masonry, than to be rooted and grounded in Catholicism or Mormonism. While the moral, mental, intellectual, and spiritual effect of the one would be good, humane, and virtuous; the other would be cruel, inhuman, and corrupt. The one would fit and polish materials for the temple of God; the others would create and make angular and superfluous corners, unfit for any temple but that of unrighteousness.—Mystic Star.

Life Lengthened.

In all countries and all latitudes, the well-to-do live longer than the poor by an average of eleven years; this shows the deleterious influence of an anxious mind on the bodily health, the anxiety for the morrow's bread. Pensioned persons live indefinitely long; the poor-houses of Great Britain can any day turn out a large army of men and women among the eighties and nineties who have been in those institutions for twenty and thirty years, owing in great part to an habitual feeling of confidence that ample provision is made for the future, and the mind is at rest; but it must not be forgotten that the cleanliness, the plain food, and the regular habits, compulsory in those institutions, contribute greatly to the same end. Insurance companies are ingeniously making use of these facts, and doubtless with some show of reason, for certainly a man feels greatly more at ease in his mind when he feels assured that in case of his death, a handsome amount of money would certainly be paid over to his family, than if the blighting and depressing impression were all the time weighing upon his spirits that his death would leave them in destitution. A British medical journal says that in the annual report of the Providential Assurance Co., it is shown that for three years in succession, the rate of mortality was twenty-three per thousand among the unassured, while it was twenty-one per thousand among the same class and occupation of persons who kept up their assurance. It is beyond all question that a quiet mind contributes to the health and well-being of the body. In this connection it may be stated that outbursts of passion do certainly tend to shorten life, from the disturbing influence which they have on the circulation, for nature loves regularity and equanimity; this important truth is beautifully demonstrated in the ascertained fact that members of the Society of Friends, throughout England, live, on an average, twelve years longer than others in the same stations and callings in life, because they are everywhere a thrifty folk and have a characteristic quietude of deportment, and equanimity and serenity of mind and expression of sentiments, which it is beautiful to see, and is really enviable.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Almost a Centenarian.

Nathaniel Fullerton, President of the Bellows Falls (Vt.) Bank, was born in 1775, and is consequently ninety-two years old. He remembers General Washington, whom he saw at Worcester, Mass., and also many events connected with his Presidential administration, as well as the period of confederation. He was made a Mason in 1797, and has always been faithful in his relations to the Fraternity. By industry and integrity, he has accumulated a large fortune in the various avocations of farmer, merchant, and banker. He still retains much of the vigor of manhood, signs all his bank bills in a full, clear hand, and attends lodge meetings quite regularly. His son, sixty-three years of age, whom he calls his "boy," lives near him, and partakes much of his father's energies and tastes. He is probably the oldest Mason, the oldest bank president in the United States. Better than this, his long life has been marked by a strict adherence to the right, which has brought to his old age honor and competence.

Knoxville Resolutions.

To the editor of the Masonic Trowel.

The following communication was prepared by order of Knoxville Lodge No. 66, A. F. & A. Masons, for transmission to the several lodges of the State. By a subsequent order, the committee was directed to offer it to the Masonic Journals of the State for publication, as the most effectual means of securing for it the attention to which its importance entitles it. The Lodge regards the object worthy, the plan feasible, and the times propitious. It may be added that the returns made to the grand bodies recently in session at Springfield indicate that an addition of nearly fifty per cent. might safely be made to the estimates of the committee.

Sam. L. Charles, Secretary.

To the Masonic Fraternity of Illinois, Greeting:

The undersigned having been appointed a committee of Knoxville Lodge No. 66, A. F. and A. M., to prepare an address to the several lodges in the State upon a subject which has engaged the attention of said lodge, would most respectfully and fraternally solicit your attention to the subject matter of this communication, hoping it will commend itself to you although but inadequately presented.

The question, so frequently asked, whether the Masonic Fraternity is doing all that its wealth and influence would naturally lead its members to expect, took form in the following resolution, adopted by our lodge, to-wit:

"That a committee of three be appointed by the Master to inquire whether it would be expedient for the Masonic Fraternity of Illinois to establish a collegiate institution having for its chief object the gratuitous education of orphans of Masons and children of indigent Masons, and, if in their opinion expedient, then to report a definite plan of procedure for procuring the necessary funds, and for putting into operation such an institution."

As expressing our own views, we adopt a portion of the report of the committee appointed by virtue of said resolution, as follows:

"That, in the judgment of your committee, a portion of the revenues of the Fraternity might with propriety be set apart for the establishment of some kind of an institution wherein the class of persons named in the resolution might receive aid of a permanent character, under circumstances which would neither impose a sense of dependence nor a feeling that they were the recipients of charity under the usual acceptation of that term. It seems not less the dictate of common justice than of enlightened prudence, that the large revenues of the Order should, in part, at least, be so invested that the descendants of its members may receive a positive, unequivocal benefit therefrom. Upon inquiry as to the best disposition of the lodge funds to secure these objects, none seem to promise a more certain accomplishment of the desired result than the establishment of a school as contemplated by the resolution.

"While a hospital or asylum for indigent and disabled Masons, their widows and orphans, commends itself to our sympathies and sense of justice, yet the benefits of such an institution, as applied to individuals, are confined mostly to the life-time of such individuals, and would require for their support a renewal of appropriations annually through all time. On the other hand, the instruction in the various departments of science and morals which would be imparted by a well conducted collegiate institution benefits not only the immediate recipient, but diffuses benefits and blessings upon every individual with whom he comes in contact, or who is reached by the emanations of his mind. They also descend through all time, in increasing volume and force. It, therefore, seems to your committee that the appropriation of funds to the establishment of such a school by the Masonic Fraternity would be such an appropriation as promises more good, both directly and indirectly, than any other.

"The Fraternity in Illinois embraces a vast amount of talent and wealth and consequent influence, and it is perhaps safe to say that no other association in existence enlists more fully the good will, affection, and permanent, abiding regard of its membership. It seems to your committee that this talent, wealth and influence ought to be made available in such a manner as would more fully than now confer the benefits of our ancient Order upon the wives and children of its members.

"In reference to the feasibility of the plan, the following considerations are presented: There are at least four hundred lodges in the State in active, vigorous operation, having an average annual revenue of not less than three hundred dollars, with an average annual expenditure not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars, leaving an annual surplus of fifty dollars, or twenty thousand dollars for the whole State. Nearly or quite all the lodges have a fund on hand averaging several hundred dollars; so that each lodge might easily appropriate from such fund, to an object which should commend itself as worthy, at least one hundred dollars, or forty thousand dollars for the whole State. This would give sixty thousand dollars in one year, a sum sufficient to erect a collegiate building costing forty thousand dollars, a boarding-house costing ten thousand dollars, and still leave ten thousand dollars for the purchase of furniture and apparatus. Having accomplished so much, it seems safe to presume that the lodges would appropriate at least seventy-five dollars the next year, or $30,000 for the State, an amount sufficient to put the school in active operation.

"A first class school having been established it would, of course, receive the patronage of Masons generally, and of others, to such an extent that the revenues thus derived would defray a large portion of its current expenses. Hence, future appropriations by lodges and donations by brethren who might desire to connect their names with the Institution by the endowment of professorships or otherwise, thus leaving a worthy legacy to their posterity and at the same time gratifying a commendable personal pride, could be applied to increasing the extent and usefulness of the Institution, or to its endowment.

"When it is remembered that the number of lodges in the State is considerably more than four hundred, and that it is probable that other bodies of Masons, as chapters, councils, and commanderies, would coöperate in this work, your committee feel a good degree of assurance that their estimates and expectations are not unreasonable. * * * * *

"And, finally, the committee feel assured that the matter, if properly presented, will commend itself to the Fraternity and elicit a favorable response—will be the means of utilizing the funds of the Fraternity more fully than at present—will ultimately result in the establishment of a school which will be a tangible evidence to the world of the beneficent influence of Masonry—will provide the means of relieving a distressed brother and of contributing aid to his orphans, and will be worthy the ancient Order, and stand a perpetual, living monument, in which every member will feel a just pride, and in whose benefits he will feel that he is entitled, through his children, to participate."

In addition to the considerations thus presented, we would call the attention to the now universaly admitted fact that the safety of the State, the perpetuity of liberal institutions, the progress of liberty among the nations, and the enlightened vigor of the church, depend upon the moral and intellectual culture of the people. The pure and exalted teachings of Masonry meet a more ready reception and make a more abiding impression upon cultured than upon uncultured minds. These controlling interests all combine to enforce the duty of making the most liberal provisions for the education of the youth of our State and country. We do not forget that the State has made large and judicious provisions for common schools, nor that the different religious denominations have established schools of higher order; but we can not be blind to the fact that these higher schools are not sufficient in number to meet the demands of the people; neither are they open to any but those who are provided with means to defray the heavy expenses necessarily attendant upon their course of study. By the action contemplated it is proposed to provide means of instruction in branches more advanced than those taught in the common schools for the orphans of Masons who are themselves unprovided with means, and the children of worthy Masons in indigent circumstances, under such restrictions as may be found expedient and necessary, thereby enabling them to earn master's wages, exert a master's influence, and do a master's work in the world, instead of remaining ignorant, inefficient, and incapable of doing work above the capacity of laborers in the quarries.

The establishment and maintenance of a school as proposed, by funds contributed by the whole Fraternity, in the benefits of which each member has a right to partake, will relieve those gratuitously educated there from that feeling of dependence and degradation which ordinarily attends the reception of charity, however skillfully disguised.

All the details of the enterprise may, very properly, be left in the hands of the Grand Lodge.

Brethren, if the suggestions of this paper meet your approbation, and if the subject matter commends itself as worthy and practicable, may we not hope they will receive your serious attention, and that you will make your conclusions known in such manner as may seem to you best? We would respectfully suggest that if your representatives to the Grand Lodge were authorized to give expression to the views of your lodge, it would be of advantage. To us it seems a matter of very great importance, fraught with possibilities of good almost incalculable, and a work in harmony with the spirit of Masonry, and in no wise contravening the interests of our ancient and beloved Order.

In behalf of Knoxville Lodge, No. 66, we subscribe ourselves, respectfully and fraternally yours,

A. W. Martin,
P. H. Sanford,
Sam. L. Charles,
Committee.

THE MASONIC TROWEL.

HARMAN G. REYNOLDS, Editor.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., DEC. 15, 1867.

☞No communication or advertisement is likely to receive attention, if received after the first of each month, in the issue immediately following.

The Closing Year.

In October, 1848, we appeared in Grand Lodge as a representative of Cambridge Lodge No. 49. Wm. B. Warren, for many years the first Grand Secretary, and since Grand Master; J. L. Anderson, Wm. C. Hobbs, both since Grand Masters; N. D. Morse, who had previously been Grand Master; George Davis, Grand Orator; Wm. A. Dickey, then Master of No. 4, and W. E. Russell, Master of No. 38, and both since J. G. Wardens; John C. Heyl, long noted as Master of Temple Lodge; Wm. Mitchell, Grand Secretary; with Whitaker, Scanland, Fessenden, Brown, Trail, and Cady, Masters of lodges, have all gone to the silent land. Cabinis, for many years H. P. and W. M., is also gone, and how many more of the sixty-five officers and representatives, we can not tell.

M. W. Bro. Lavely, then Grand Master, after two long terms of five or six years as Master of Springfield Lodge, has just entered upon a third period of service. We welcome him gladly, once more, to the ranks of the noble army of Masters that represent the lodges from year to year.

Gov. McMurtry, after seventeen years of service as Grand Treasurer, is now giving an exhibition of his fidelity by serving old Hiram as Tyler, under his honored son, who was then a mere lad.

Dr. Roe, then Grand Master, is serving the people of McLean as Circuit Clerk. Rev. Dr. McMasters, Grand Chaplain, is a clergyman of distinction at St. Paul. Dr. Kyle is an honored man and Master at Macomb; O. C. Skinner has sat upon our Supreme bench; Father Happy is a veteran Baptist clergyman at Jacksonville; Father Levi Lusk, P. G. M., is a beloved veteran of Mt. Sterling; Harrison Dills, P. G. M., is now Grand Treasurer; Thomas J. Pickett, P. G. M., is in the full vigor of life, and publishing a paper at Paducah, Ky.; John Bennett, a veteran Master at Petersburg, is now District Deputy; Elias Hibbard, P. D. G. M., and father of James H. Hibbard, who has seen his son pass through the highest positions of symbolic, capitular, and cryptic Masonry, now outlives him in a ripe old age; Dr. Hammond, from a stripling, is in middle life, Master and High Priest at Macomb; Dr. Samuel, for many years the noted Master at Carrollton, is well along in life, but still hale and as plain and courteous a gentleman as in former years; Dr. Wackerlie, of Meredosia, looks as young as he did then; and of the others, some, we think, are living; one or two are in disgrace, but on the whole we should like to meet the same brethren again.

How many brethren have come forward since then, taken their place among our Craftsmen, filled the stations in their lodges, have come up to the annual assemblings, cast their votes, have taught and been instructed, have filled places of trust and honor in Grand Lodge and among the people, and have mingled in that throng in which all must mingle sooner or later? C. G. Y. Taylor was elected Grand Master in 1850, and died before his year expired; Jonathan Young, full of years and honors, will live in precious memories; Michael J. Noyes, the laborious, unflinching, and honest Mason and Christian; Thomas Magee, the popular Chaplain and elegant gentleman; Robert Keith, the genial old Scotchman and zealous Mason; Wm. B. Herrick, Past Grand Master, and a scientific surgeon; J. J. Huntley, noted as a lecturer; Carding Jackson, P. D. G. M.; Col. S. C. Toler, P. D. G. M., and a superior gentleman; the distinguished N. D. Elwood; David D. Irons, Master of Peoria Lodge—these, and a vast number of others, have seen the light of earth for the last time.

So, too, we have arrived at the last number of THE TROWEL for 1867; the last year of service as Grand Secretary, the last month, and will soon reach, if we live, the last day of 1867. When we were initiated by P. G. Master Nye, at Warsaw, in 1842, our eldest son was an infant; when we entered the Grand Lodge as Grand Secretary, he was a mere lad; but now, at twenty-five years, he has all the Masonry we have except the 33d degree. Our second son is also a Mark Master, and we begin to feel old! Yet, how short these years seem. When we came into the office of Grand Secretary, C. W. Moore, of Massachusetts, Jos. H. Hough, of New Jersey, John Dove, of Virginia, James Fenton, of Michigan, T. S. Parvin, of Iowa, and Chas. A. Fuller, of Tennessee, were in the same office, all of whom will probably out-serve us. Many who were then Grand Secretaries, and several who have been elected since, are gone—Adams, of Pennsylvania, Morris and King, of Indiana. O'Sullivan, of Missouri, Bain, of North Carolina. Merrick, of Arkansas, Smith and Hunt, of Wisconsin, Barker, of Rhode Island, Robinson, of Maryland, Rusk, and several others. Notwithstanding, the Institution of Freemasonry is going forward. Death neither thins its ranks, nor stays its march. Fanaticism may assail it; popes may fulminate; powers may suppress; ecclesiastical bodies may resolve; and Masonic editors may quarrel, snarl, and disgrace themselves; but Masonry will survive it all. It knows neither sect nor party, clime nor country. It encourages all that is good, aids education, promotes charity and charities, discourages vice, and respects religion. Men of opposite politics leave their differences with the Tyler, and ministers of different persuasions join with their brethren in promoting those sublime and holy principles and practices wherein all good Masons strive, with noble emulation, to see who can "best work and best agree."

Brethren! The year is rapidly drawing to a close. Think of your mistakes, your errors, your sins—to repent of them and amend them in the year upon which most of you will soon enter. And let the year 1868, in all good things, whether in Masonry or otherwise, surpass this and all previous years. All good things, even in our enemies, are Masonic. And, "LOVE ONE ANOTHER."

Elections.

We have said much in previous years in regard to elections in Masonic bodies. A few words will suffice now. The Grand Master will set aside any election that is the result of fraud, combination, cabal, or corrupt influences. Every officer must be elected by the unsought votes of his brethren. Of course, brethren should confer, but no election of one officer should be made dependent upon the election of another, but each officer should be selected with regard to his fitness for the position he is to fill.

In the work, Master and Senior Deacon are leading positions; in business and finance, the Master and Secretary. Yet, no office is unimportant, and men of character should fill them all.

Pitiful Pettifogging.

The editor of the St. Louis Freemason makes a specialty of opposition to the A. & A. S. Rite, and all other rites in Masonry but the York Rite, in which he includes the chapter, council, and commandery degrees—an assumption as unwarranted and untruthful as is his assertion that the Scottish degrees are atheistical. Those who defend the York Rite against all others, must confine themselves strictly to the first three degrees and the secrets of the chair. The editor of the Freemason assumes that those who favor the A. & A. S. degrees are opposers of the York Rite. He can not possibly be so stolid as to believe what he says. We have, from the very first of our editorial career, planted ourself in the first three degrees, and have steadily maintained the authority of the third degree as the governing degree of Masonry, and shall in the future, as we have in the past, labor assiduously to maintain the doctrine that an expelled Master Mason is expelled thereby from every degree and from every body known as Masonic. We have labored for the individuality of each of the symbolic degrees, and for the recognition of lodges of Entered Apprentices and Fellow Crafts, with their beautiful and instructive opening and closing ceremonies, while the editor of the Freemason has labored to show that Entered Apprentice and Fellow Craft lodges are a myth, and has also labored to concentrate all of symbolic Masonry in the third degree. No one can take the chapter degrees, unless he be a Master Mason; the A. & A. Scottish Rite requires the same. One commences with the Mark degree, the other with the Secret Master.

In regard to preference, in the degrees above the third, we say frankly, that the chapter, council, and commandery degrees are established systems in North America, and we shall stand by them as such. We are for building; NOT FOR PULLING DOWN. The editor of the Freemason is running a feeble tilt with the editor of the Memphis Appeal. They belong to the destructives. The Memphis editor has a right, as the head in the southern jurisdiction, to speak for the A. & A. S. Rite, but it is criminal in him to do so at the expense of any other system, and he shows just as much disregard of obligation in doing so, as the St. Louis editor does in his sneering remarks, that if it was not for certain ties, he would tell!

The editor of the Freemason charges, that the A. & A. S. Rite is in opposition to York Masonry, is semi-political, is semi-sectarian in religion, and is atheistical and infidel in its teachings. So far as the northern jurisdiction is concerned, these charges are untrue in every particular.

No institution on earth could hold such men as Blades, Tiffany, McMurdy, Titus, and hundreds of other divines, if it had even the taint of atheism or infidelity about it. In its political aspects, the A. & A. S. Rite is political in the same sense that the E. A. and Past Masters' degrees are, and no more. The religious character, to the sixteenth degree, is precisely the same as in symbolic, capitular, and cryptic Masonry. From the seventeenth degree, the Scottish Rite is, in its religious character, precisely the same as in templar Masonry, over which the editor of the Freemason presides in Missouri.

Scotch Rite Masonry, on the continent of Europe, bears the same relation to symbolic Masonry there that chapter, cryptic, and templar Masonry does in the United States.

Let every system stand or fall on its own merits, and let symbolic Masonry, the foundation and glory of all, maintain its own character and authority.

Rite of Memphis.

The establishment of this rite in the United States is now a fixed fact. Its march is destined to be neither slow nor uncertain. Harry J. Seymour, who is certified to us by worthy brethren in New York, as a good citizen and worthy man, brought the rite from France, and has propagated it with zeal. In this he was assisted by Calvin C. Burt, but some ten months since they disagreed, and Burt was expelled by Seymour. The present condition of the parties is as follows; Burt is an expelled Master Mason, as will be seen by a letter from the Grand Master of New Jersey, published in this number. Seymour and his party regard him as expelled from the Memphis Rite, while Seymour himself stands expelled from the Scottish Rite.

In Illinois, the adherents of Seymour have bodies in Peoria and vicinity, Wm. Rounsville, Grand Representative, and in Chicago, D. C. Cregier, Grand Master.

Burt has organized a separate body in Chicago, and is associated with such distinguished brethren as Patrick, Allen, Hubbard, Gurney, Bigelow, Younglove, Underhill, Clyde, Smith, Cutler, Swan, et al., which gives him a decided prestige.

We are not a member of the Memphis Rite; we express no opinion as to the relative merits or demerits of either side of the controversy or parties in the Rite, but, inasmuch as all disagreements or contests in any branch of Masonry have an injurious effect upon the body of Masonry at large, we fraternally suggest, in the most friendly spirit, that Burt place himself in a state for restoration; that Seymour do the same; that they settle their dispute, and unite their bodies, and that the brethren on both sides lend their fraternal aid to that end. If both parties, or either (Seymour and Burt), will not labor for so desirable a consummation, then the party refusing is not worthy of confidence.

What we have published or may hereafter publish will be given as news or information, without in any way affecting our own position, until we are ready to speak out. At present, we advise compromise, and that speedily, for there are some things that Master Masons can not lawfully do, however high their standing or distinguished their character.

☞ Since the above was in type, we have an intimation that Burt is about to be repudiated at Chicago, and that a circular to that effect will soon appear. We give this as rumor only.

Consistency.

The editor of the St. Louis Freemason has a good deal to say about premiums, and that he makes no allowance to brethren for procuring subscribers, but that his patrons and solicitors labor for the good of Masonry. Very shrewd in the editor. With two dollars yearly, not more than two-thirds or three-fourths the matter contained in THE TROWEL, no commissions and no contributors to pay, and with 8,000 subscribers, he makes a fat thing of it. Eight thousand copies of such a paper as the St. Louis Freemason can be furnished, exclusive of editorial labor, contributions, and expense of procuring subscriptions, at seventy-five cents per copy, and, with any proper economy, for sixty cents. That would leave $10,000 clear. From this take $1,500 for editing, and $500 for expense of prospectuses, postage, envelopes, &c., leaves the good round sum of $8,000. We congratulate our friends of the Freemason upon their good fortune.

But, such is one of the clever ways of the Freemason to show the astonishing popularity of its editor.

Apologetic.

In announcing the death of Comp. H. M. Gillette, Scribe of Fairbury Chapter, we committed a blunder quite as unpardonable as it is humiliating and mortifying to us.

The numerous friends of Comp. Gillette will rejoice to learn that he is still alive, in good health, and bids fair for a long life of usefulness and honor. His friends and companions will also mourn with him the loss of his amiable wife, while absent from home in quest of health. It is in regard to this that our mischievous error occurred. The Chapter at Fairbury passed the usual resolutions of condolence, and sent them to us for publication. There has been so many objections interposed against publishing formal resolutions, that we have ceased inserting them, even for compensation, but we notice the decease of brethren, their wives or children, as fully as our limits will permit.

In making up sundry notices, and among them, the deaths, we were hard pressed by our printers, were in great haste, merely glanced at the resolutions, caught an idea or two, and wrote what we did. The result of haste is before us, and no one can lament it more than ourself.

Grand Chapter, D. C.

We have heretofore regarded the new Grand Chapter at Washington as regular, but a very candid statement of facts in the report of the Committee on Correspondence in the Maryland Grand Chapter, by Comp. E. L. Stevens, has very much staggered us, and we intend to carefully review the whole question. In the meantime, let us say that we can tolerate no desirable thing, or needful duty, which is reached through a violation of solemn and sacred obligations, deliberately and lawfully taken, save in case of that necessity which knows no law, a necessity which can never arise in forming Masonic bodies.

Sir John Brotherton.

Death has universal dominion. His silent and dread advance none can stay. Kingly palaces, silent cloisters, impenetrable fortresses, and tyled asylums can not resist his relentless march. He has invaded Elwood Commandery, and with icy touch summoned our beloved brother, Sir John Brotherton, a true and courteous Knight, into the presence of an Infinite God. Unshielded by the swords, and unaided by the counsels of his brother Sir Knights, he has entered eternity, and stands in the unveiled and awful presence, alone. He has laid his armor by. His voice is hushed on earth; we shall see him no more until the resurrection; O! may that resurrection be to him and to each Sir Knight a resurrection unto eternal life.

BRO. GEO. D. REYNOLDS, formerly of this city, and a member of Tyrian Lodge, is engaged in the practice of law at Potosi, Mo. He is a noble, generous fellow, and we bespeak the good will of our brethren for him.

Cyclopedia of Freemasonry.

A copy of the second edition of this valuable work, edited by R. W. Bro. Robert Macoy, accompanied by a fine steel engraving of his face and features, natural as life, has been received from the publishers, the New York Publishing and Manufacturing Company, 432 Broome street, New York. It is really an able and meritorious work, and is worthy of extensive patronage. The paper is excellent, the type good, and the mechanical execution creditable to the manufacturers.

It abounds in beautiful plates, designs, and emblems, all well executed, and we feel justified in saying that this book of 528 pages contains much information that can not be found embodied in lexicon form in any other work. It is a credit to the editor, a valuable addition to Masonic literature, and should be in the library of every studious Mason.

Grand Council of Pennsylvania.

Through the politeness of M. P. Comp. ALFRED KREIGH, we have received copies of the transactions of the Grand Council for 1867. Comp. KREIGH is now in his 14th year of service as Grand Master, and is a thorough and earnest propagator of the Cryptic Rite. The degree of Super-Excellent Master is now conferred in Pennsylvania, as the second or intermediate of the three degrees. The Grand Council firmly declines to surrender its powers, or to consolidate with any other branch or organization in Masonry.

Losses by Mail.

As we said in August, so we again say, MONEY MUST BE SENT TO US BY DRAFT, POST OFFICE ORDER, EXPRESS, OR BY REGISTERED LETTER, or we will not be responsible for it.

Our heaviest losses are by letters which should come over the T., W. & W. R. W. The officers and employees have no access to the mails, and no suspicion can rest upon them. Nor do we accuse anyone; but the fact is as we state it.

John W. Banker.

In making up our list of Grand Lecturers for the last TROWEL, the name of Bro. JOHN W. BANKER, of Quincy, was inserted, but omitted in setting the type, and the error escaped the notice of the proof reader. Bro. BANKER is a Past Master of Bodley Lodge No. 1, a zealous Freemason, competent lecturer, and withal a genial friend and worthy gentleman.

Secret Ballot-Box.

We are in receipt of a nice walnut ballot-box from R. W. Bro. John C. Baker, of Waukegan. In form, it is similar to those lately most in use from New York, but is a great improvement in lightness and strength, and finish and interior arrangements, and particularly in the springs, which readily fit to their place, and are not liable to get out of order. Price, $6.00. For sale by H. G. Reynolds & Son.

Subscriptions.

Brethren holding prospectuses are requested to forward them by the 20th, or as soon thereafter as possible. It is important to us, to enable us to make up our mail list, which is a large labor at any time, but will be ten-fold more laborious now. Those desiring other prospectuses can have them at once.

Wm. H. Richardson and J. B. Rose started a Masonic publication at Baltimore, last winter. and entitled it "The Masonic Review," precisely the name of a worthy and celebrated publication in Cincinnati. The publishers, in less than one year's time, find themselves expelled for inserting matter, said to be slanderous of certain grand lodge officers, and the publication is about to pass into other hands. We hope the new publishers will show some honesty by selecting another name, and some respect for decency in the character of their selections and contributions.

Masonic Presentation.

Our fellow citizen, James D. Perry, Esq., was the recipient, on Tuesday last, of a splendid gold headed cane, at the hands of the Masonic Fraternity of this place. The presentation speech was made by A. E. Stevenson, Esq., in presence of the Royal Arch chapters of Metamora and Washington, and was responded to by Mr. Perry in a feeling and appropriate manner. The ceremony of presentation occured immediately after the installation of Mr. P. as High Priest of the chapter, and the exercises throughout were of a highly interesting and impressive character. The cane is indeed a beautiful one, and the Fraternity have the satisfaction of knowing that it could not have been more worthily bestowed. —Metamora paper.

FREEPORT, Ill., Nov. 27, 1867.

Bro. H. G. Reynolds:

DEAR SIR—Herewith inclosed please find a letter from Stamford, Conn., in answer to a letter I wrote them on the 15th of this month, in regard to a loan made to one C. A. TUTTLE.

He came to Bro. Burchard, our W. M., and Bro. L. L. Munn, W. M. of M. R. Thompson Lodge No. 381, and representing that he was in a destitute condition and wanted funds to reach Omaha. Breth. Munn and Burchard examined, and concluded that it was all right, and advanced him five dollars, which, he said, we should collect from the lodge at Stamford, Conn. So here is the letter in answer. The letter was read in lodge last regular, and a motion made that the Secretary should have it published in THE MASONIC TROWEL at earliest convenience.

M. V. BROWN,
Secretary Evergreen Lodge No. 170.

STAMFORD, Nov. 21, 1867.

Mr. M. V. Brown:

DEAR SIR AND BRO.—Yours of the 15th is at hand. Mr. C. A. TUTTLE is not a member of our lodge, and never was. He formerly belonged to Union Lodge No. 31, New London, Conn., but was expelled by that lodge for swindling some brethren of our lodge; since then, yours is the fourth letter we have rereceived from different lodges that he has robbed. If you have any Masonic paper published in the west, you should publish him; last week I received a letter from Milwaukee, where he got $10.00.

Fraternally yours,
GEO. L. LOWND,
Secretary Union Lodge No. 1.

JACKSON, Mich., Nov. 30, 1867.

Sir Knight V. L. Hurlbut:

DEAR SIR—I thought I would drop you a line for the purpose of informing you about one HENRY MILLER, who was once a Sir Knight, but was expelled by Jackson Lodge No. 17 from all the rights and benefits of Masonry, for gross unmasonic conduct, and as I understand he is in your jurisdiction, perhaps it would be well for you to have this published in all your Masonic journals for the protection of the Craft in your jurisdiction, which you have our permission to do, considering it a duty we owe one another.

Fraternally yours,
J. B. TOMLINSON,
Secretary Jackson Lodge No. 17.

MAYSVILLE, Ky., Oct., 1867.

Bro. Reynolds:

You published a Rev. Bro. ELI a month or two since. Well, he has been here. THE TROWEL saved us. He told the same story here; but a brother remembered reading his description, and drew THE TROWEL on him. He could not stand that, and made it convenient to give us the slip, going, without his dinner, a-foot, towards Ripley, as we learned. I immediately telegraphed there, and had two Bro. Master Masons come in the office, and posted them, and requested them, by all means, to get the papers from him, as he had M. M., R. A., R. & S. M., and K. T. diplomas. Sure enough, he tried it on there the same night, but left in a hurry, minus the papers. Look out for him; he is a graceless scoundrel.

Yours, &c.,
J. B. GIBSON.

Expulsions.

HALL LE ROY LODGE No. 221, A., F. & A. M.,
LE ROY, Ill., Oct. 28, 1867.

The undersigned committee, to whom was referred the investigation of the case of the publication of SILAS H. WILLIS in THE MASONIC TROWEL by this lodge, would most respectfully report that we have investigated the case as far as possible, and that we sustain the lodge in making the publication.

Respectfully submitted.

OFFICE OF THE GRAND MASTER,
NEWARK, N. J. November 10th, 1867.

Herman G. Reynolds, Esq., Grand Sec'y Illinois:

R. W. SIR AND BRO.—A day or two since, I casually took up a newspaper, printed at Chicago, and my attention was attracted to the announcement of an extensive celebration to be held by the (so-called) Egyptian Rite of Memphis. Conspicuous among the names connected with the affair, I found the name of one "CALVIN C. BURT."

Now I know nothing of the Rite of Memphis, and have no right or disposition to interfere in any of their matters. But I am informed by the promoters of that rite, that every person connected with it, shall be a Master Mason in good standing.

Fearing, therefore, that this man BURT may be passing himself off in your jurisdiction as a Master Mason, I deem it my duty to notify you, that on the 18th day of January, A. L. 5866, CALVIN C. BURT was expelled from the Fraternity by a unanimous vote of the Grand Lodge of New Jersey, for gross unmasonic conduct, while W. M. of one of our subordinate lodges. He has never been restored.

I have addressed a similar communication to the above to the Grand Master of Illinois, which I enclose. I have not by me his name and address, and beg, therefore, that you will forward the enclosure to him.

I remain yours fraternally,
WM. SILAS WHITEHEAD,
Grand Master of Masons in New Jersey.

P. S. The record of the expulsion of Mr. BURT will be found on page 69, of the proceedings of New Jersey for 1866.

Masonic Temple.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 20, 1867.

BRETHREN:—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Masonic Hall Association, of Washington, D. C., held this date, the Secretary was directed to transmit the following circular to the various Masonic bodies in the United States. Fraternally,

NOBLE D. LARNER, Sec.

To the Masonic brethren in the United States--Greeting:

The erection of a handsome Masonic temple at the city of Washington—the political capital of the great Republic—is a desideratum to be earnestly desired by every Freemason in the United States. The Fraternity in Washington, from the force of circumstances which naturally surround them, are, and always must be, as a Fraternity, poor. The population is ever changing, and in no city of the Union of double the population of Washington is the Craft called upon by brethren in distress, who are sojourners and strangers, from all parts of the Union, to extend the hand of charity, as in the city of Washington; and where the brother proves himself worthy and in actual want, the aid he asks is never withheld.

All these things render the erection of a suitable temple an up-hill business to the Craft here, and they do not hesitate to ask that aid from abroad which they are always willing to bestow on those who come here from abroad.

We have purchased a lot, and have paid for it within a trifle. We have laid the foundation of a temple which, when completed, will be an honor to the Craft. We have paid for it. And we are now ready to lay the corner-stone of our edifice. We want money to go on. We do not desire it without an equivalent. "The Masonic Hall Association" is incorporated by Act of Congress. It is a joint stock company, AND BY THE TERMS OF ITS CHARTER MUST FOREVER BE MANAGED BY MASONS. We sincerely believe that the stock will, as soon as the building is completed, pay at least ten per cent. on any money invested in it. Each share of stock is $20. We ask every lodge and every Masonic body, who may receive this circular, to take one share at least of our stock. For every twenty dollars sent by mail, or otherwise, to N. D. Larner, Esq., Secretary of the Masonic Hall Association, No. 71 Louisiana avenue, Washington, D. C., a certificate for one share of stock will be transmitted. We believe no Masonic body can make a better investment, and we fondly hope that every Freemason who ever expects to visit Washington, and desires to feel while here that he has a Masonic interest in the city, will do all he possibly can to induce the bodies to which he belongs to comply with our wish.

Respectfully and fraternally,
B. B. FRENCH, President,
N. D. LARNER, Secretary,
N. ACKER,
C. KLOMAN,
P. H. HOOE,
Directors.

American Freemason.

Some weeks since, we received a circular from Geo. B. Fessenden, Secretary of the American Masonic Publishing Association, at 114 Main street, Cincinnati, proposing to issue a 48 page quarterly at $2.00 per year.

This Fessenden applied for initiation to one of the lodges in Cincinnati, and was rejected, and the same lodge refused him permission to apply to another lodge. Who the American Masonic Publishing Association are, does not appear. The Freemasons in the United States have seen enough of bogus publications, lottery doings, and gift enterprises, to require every candidate for Masonic favor to show a clean record.

Bombay Masonic General Library.

Several months ago we noticed in THE TROWEL the organization of a Masonic library association at Bombay, East Indies. November 22d we received the following communication, which shows that the association is in a flourishing condition, and is determined to be well supplied with first-class Masonic literature. Long ere this number of THE TROWEL is published, the books Bro. Avron has ordered will be on their way to the land of the orient.

Freemasonry in the Indies, Australia, and Egypt is in a very flourishing condition.

FREEMASONS' HALL, MAZAGON, BOMBAY,
12th October, 1867.

Bro. H. G. Reynolds:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER—I have much pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of eight copies of THE MASONIC TROWEL by the mail of the 10th inst., for the Bombay Masonic Library.

I have to request the favor of your forwarding per registered book post, as the safest and most economical mode of transit, the works named in the accompanying list, the money for which, together with subscription and postage for MASONIC TROWEL for two years, shall be forwarded by return mail, on receipt of your account.

It is the wish of the committee to have the library replete with every ancient and modern Masonic work procurable; also, all works that have been written against the Order, together with every authorized Masonic journal published in the English language. I therefore beg the favor of your assistance, by giving me such information as may be in your power to give, as to the names of the journals published in America, with the address of the publishers; also, a list of such works as you may deem worthy of a place in a Masonic library.

I may mention that an order has gone to England for such works as can be purchased there.

Trusting you will excuse the trouble I am giving you, and Fraternally assist us in the great object,

Believe me,
Faithfully and Fraternally yours,
H. H. AVRON, D. G. R.,
Sec. and Treas. Masonic Library Com.

MASONIC AFFAIRS IN GERMANY.—The Grand Lodge of Hanover recently applied to the Grand Lodges of Berlin to be acknowledged as an independent body. The request was refused, on the ground that according to the Royal Edict of 1798, only the three Grand Lodges, located at Berlin, could exist on the Prussian territory.

DEDICATION.

Masonic Exercises at the Dedication of the New Hall.

The Masonic bodies of this city dedicated their new hall on Wednesday evening, the 6th inst. The hall was constructed and finished by Bureau Lodge No. 112, A., F. and A. M., Princeton Chapter No. 28, R. A. M., Orion Council No. 8, R. and S. M., Temple Commandery K. T., and bodies of the A. and A. Scottish Rite, conferring to the 32d degree, inclusive.

The lodge-room is 23 by 50 feet in the clear, with ante-rooms 23 feet in length, with closets and storeage room above the ante-rooms. The lodge-room was frescoed by Jevne & Almini, of Chicago, and is executed in the highest style of the art, and, in the main, consists of life-size figures on the walls, emblematic of Masonry. On the right side, on entering from the ante-room, and the south side of the hall, are represented the scenes of Jacob's vision, with the ladder ascending from the earth to Heaven; a sheaf of wheat suspended from the branch of a tree; the Sts. John, with the parallel lines; the point within the circle, on the top resting the Holy Scriptures, and the fourth the emblems of mortality represented by the coffin, spade and mallet, also the sprig of acacia. In the East and above the head of the presiding officer, are the hour-glass, the urn, and the rising sun. On the north side are four female figures, also life-size, in four niches, representing Temperance, Fortitude, Prudence, and Justice. In the West is Time with his scythe, a female figure weeping, holding in her hand a sprig of acacia over a broken column. These figures are all represented as if standing back in a recess in the wall. Overhead the ceiling is tastefully decorated with fresco-work, and in the center is suspended a chandelier. The seats in the East are raised from the level of the floor, and are reached by three steps running from side to side of the room.

The ceremonies in the dedication of the hall were presided over by Gen. T. J. Henderson, Grand Master pro tem., assisted by a Grand Lodge specially convened for the purpose, and was in the usual form, witnessed by the members of the Order, their wives and daughters, and a few invited friends—all passing off with harmony and good feeling. The evening closed with a ball at Converse Hall, which was largely attended by the younger members of the Order, and by a number of ladies and gentlemen of the city. The festivities were kept up till an early hour next morning, only interspersed by a splendid supper, prepared by mine host of the American House, J. Ramsdell, Esq.

The brethren took final possession of their new hall on Tuesday evening last, and held their first regular meeting therein. It is now fully dedicated to the uses of Masonry, and we trust that the three cardinal principles of the Order, Faith, Hope, and Charity, may continue to grow and spread until the whole earth shall be imbued with them. "So mote it be."—Bureau County Republican.

New Jersey.

M. E. Comp. Thomas J. Corson reports for the Committee on Foreign Correspondence, and we can not do more justice than transfer into our columns the conclusion of his report:

"Our work, such as it is, is completed; and we are sorry for it. The amount of labor involved in preparing a report of this kind can be known only to those who have themselves performed it. Ofttimes the weary hand almost refuses to obey the will of the over-taxed brain; but it is nevertheless a pleasant task. While culling out from the various proceedings such information as we have thought would be of interest to the Royal Craft, we have enjoyed most pleasant fraternal intercourse with our companions far off in body, but present with us in spirit. We have talked with them, not merely reproduced their words; and we feel in closing like one who is about to depart from the goodly company where pleasure sits enthroned, and joy reigns supreme. While we have not hesitated to use what Gouley so happily terms 'the gavel of criticism,' neither have we failed to bestow, where it was due, the pleasant oil of praise; and why should we not? He who does his work well deserves commendation, and we are unjust if we withhold it. To gain the praise of our fellows is one of the most powerful incentives to the performance of duty, and a pat on the back with 'well done, good fellow,' will accomplish much more good than a kick on the shins accompanied by grumbling growls. In the Masonic vineyards, as in other conditions of life, the 'laborer is worthy of his hire.' And to no other class of Masons more than to the reporters are due honor and gratitude. They laboriously toil for their companions, and with diligence and care select from the mass of material which they have to examine such matters of fact and interest as will interest all who desire the good and advancement of our Order. Through their reports we receive valuable information which otherwise we could not obtain. These reports of course vary in style and manner, ranging from 'grave to gay, from lively to serene,' in accordance with the mental characteristics of the author. And some of these chaps, having a lively sense of humor, sometimes indulge in a vein of pleasantry and even downright fun, which in nowise detracts from the value of the report, and thus the dullness of facts and figures is relieved. As a general rule, the person selected to perform the duty of reviewing the proceedings of other grand bodies, is one whose natural ability and Masonic acquirements enable him so to do his work, as to advance the standard of Masonry in his own jurisdiction, and set for useful information, for the benefit of his brethren. In order that all may see this noble band of brothers, we have issued a call for a convention of reporters, to be held in Masonic Eutopia, which call we hereunto append:"

Come hither, ye reporters all, we'll have a word with you,
The world Masonic wants to know the things that ye can do;
Leave your work—pack up your duds, and give us your attention,
In friendly conclave let us meet and have a grand convention.

Come Alabama—here we rest—preside and take the chair,
There's no one we would rather meet than honest Daniel Sayre;
And Williams from Arkansas, too, the far-off guest we greet,
With Seymour, our Canadian friend, he'll find a pleasant seat.

Now Owen comes from golden shores, with brain so bright and clear,
And Storer, of Connecticut, will very soon be here;
While Florida sends on her Brown, a man both good and true;
(Come Georgia, you must hurry up, we'll wait awhile for you).

Here Reynolds with a trowel comes, and with a friendly hand
Greets Pattison, and Bayless, too, who come to join the band;
And Guilbert of the lion's voice, but with a woman's heart,
Who says such very cutting things because he thinks they're smart.

From bleeding Kansas hear a sound! there comes a first-class Carr,
Kentucky's Graham takes his place without the slightest jar;
And as an admonition just that none of us be lazy,
Louisiana sends to us our good companion Swasey.

Here Stevens comes, warm-hearted man, to speak for Maryland,
Drummond leaves the bluffs of Maine to take him by the hand;
Next Kimball makes a bow profound, with dignity and grace,
And Johnson, shedding smiles around, proceeds to take his place.

The "Cloudy-Water State" so dear has not reported yet,
But Pierson soon will be along, and bring his "Alphabet;"
And Patten, too, is hast'ning on from Mississippi's plains
To join this happy family and sing his sweetest strains.

Next Gouley rushes in the throng, with knitted brow severe,

(His caustic pen is left at home, and we can banish fear);
His words are sharp, his heart is kind—we'll put him face to face
With one of nature's noblemen, New Hampshire's gentle Chase.

New Jersey sends her Jeffreys on, because she knows he's right,
He'll make a splendid tete-a-tete for good companion White;
North Carolina need not fear so long as she has Carr,
And Matthews will command respect where'er true Masons are.

Caldwell leaves his "love of gold" and comes from Oregon,
The Keystone State her silence breaks and sends her Allen on;
Doyle, his voice with anxious care to melody attunes,
To greet Palmetto's noble son, Companion R. S. Bruns.

From Tennessee a Fuller comes, whom we are glad to greet,
(The lone-star State has not arrived, but we'll reserve her seat),
A Britton, too, shall welcome be, right from the mountains green,
And Isaacs, of Virginia, shall grace this pleasant scene.

Wisconsin's wilds shall have a voice, and we'll receive a Cottrill,
And hand in hand, and heart with heart, we'll meet with right good will,
From North and South, from East and West, we'll come both great and small,
And pledging each to each his faith, we'll pray God bless us all.*

We hope to report the proceedings of the convention to the Royal Craft next year.

Frosty Weather.—Few have failed to observe what a vigor and elasticity are imparted to both mind and body by a frosty atmosphere, and what a loss of all these there is in a hot summer day; this is probably owing to the fact that at noon of any clear frosty day in winter, there is ten times as much elasticity in the air as there is at any noon of summer; hence to all invalids, the days most valuable for exercise are those of frosty weather, and those least beneficial are where it is warm or thundery; hence every hour of daylight spent in the open air in frosty weather in some kind of out-door activities is that much gain to the vitality of the system, imparting vigor to the mind, elasticity to the body, and elevation to the moral feelings and power of the man.—Hall's Jour. of Health.

A Word.—Say not a word you had better leave unsaid. A word is a little thing we know, but it has stirred up a world of strife. Suppressing a word has saved many a character—many a life. A word unuttered, and Hamilton would long have lived, the pride of his country. Who can tell the good or bad effects of a single word? Be careful what you say. Think before you speak, and you will never be mortified with yourself, or cause a thrill of pain to flash through the heart of a friend.

Death of an Aged Mason.—Mr. John Foster, one of the oldest members of the Masonic Fraternity, died in Boston, Oct. 29, aged 95 years and 16 days. He was a native of Roxbury, and for more than 40 years a resident of Boston. The Masonic degrees were conferred upon him in the year 1800, by Hancock Lodge of Castine, Maine.

The remains of Bro. Herring were brought to New York, and buried at Greenwood Cemetery, on Sunday, Oct. 26th, with Masonic ceremonies.

Jurisprudence.

To the law and the testimony.—Isa. 8, 20.

☞ We shall endeavor to answer questions of a legal character under the laws and usages of this and adjoining States under the head of States; other matter of a judicial character will be given under the head of "General." Our comments on law are not binding as such; those who desire decisions must get them from the Grand Master; we give opinions only. Questions will be omitted, unless they are necessary to elucidate the point at issue. Decisions and opinions will be regularly numbered through the volume, and will not be repeated, but reference will be made to them.

ILLINOIS.

No. 58.—Under a resolution adopted by the Grand Lodge in October last, an E. A. or F. C. who may be rejected for advancement may apply for another ballot at any subsequent communication.

No. 59.—It is quite common to receive a petition for initiation, recommended by one or more brethren of another lodge. If committees of investigation would not report until the character of the applicant was thoroughly sifted, there would be little or no danger; the practice, however, is irregular, loose, and dangerous, and we advise against it.

GENERAL.

No. 31.—It is not advisable to bring any matters into a lodge for investigation which seriously involve political or religious differences; but if a written petition be circulated containing falsehoods which, if true, would materially affect the standing of a brother Mason, the falsehoods, being libelous, are proper subjects of investigation. The charge should state distinctly and clearly what the falsehoods are, and their effect upon the general and Masonic character of the injured brother is to be considered by the lodge, without regard to his standing in his political party or church.

Miscellaneous Reading.

Initial Facts in our History.

Our children are taught French, moral science and conic sections, and read histories of Greece and Rome. How few of them, and how few men and women, know anything of the history of their own country, except an outline of a few detached facts. How few undergraduates know that Columbus undertook his first voyage in the expectation of finding the Great Kahn of Tartary; that he set sail on Friday, 1492—that unlucky and direful day—and on Friday, ten weeks after, discovered land; that he supposed Cuba to be the continent; that he first reached the continent on the north coast of South America six years afterwards;, that upon his fourth and last voyage he founded the first colony on the mainland, on the Isthmus of Panama; that twenty-one years after the discovery, the old world was astonished to find they had discovered a new world, when they reached the Pacific across the Isthmus; but that Cabot, an Englishman, reached the shores of New England a full year before Columbus touched the continent; that San Augustine, Florida, is the oldest town in America, being over 300 years old; that Santa Fe, New Mexico, is the second town in point of age; that twenty years later—1602—California was discovered and explored; that in 1603 a Frenchman, Sieur de Monts, made the first settlement north of San Augustine, at Annapolis, and twice attempted a settlement on Cape Cod, but was driven off by the natives; that Champlain founded Quebec in 1608; that our coast from Pennsylvania to New Brunswick was named Acadie, afterwards New France; that Canada formerly comprehended our Vermont and New York; that Virginia was so named by Sir Walter Raleigh, in honor of Queen Elizabeth, in 1584, when he made his exploration of the North Carolina coast; that the first English child born in America was Virginia Dare, daughter of Ananius; that the projected colony failed; that Jamestown was the first English town in America, began in 1607, and named for James I.; that the want of wives in Virginia was so great that in 1621 a large number of young women "of good character" were transported to the colony on speculation, and sold to the lonely settlers for a hundred and twenty to a hundred and fifty pounds of tobacco each; that New England was so named by John Smith, in 1614; that at length a settlement was made, without a grant from the King's council, at New Plymouth; and sent its roots deep and wide into the scanty soil by a band of 102 passengers, December 11, 1620, who came in a small craft whose name has been spoken from the occident to the orient, to-wit: the Mayflower.

A Peculiar Situation.

Captain Rodgers had once accepted the invitation of a brother officer, in a totally different part of the island, to try a few days hostilities against the elephants of that neighborhood, and had arrived, after a day's sport, within a mile or two of the bungalow where his host and hostess were awaiting his arrival; when, passing by a delightfully cool looking river, he thought a plunge would be the most renovating luxury in existence; so a plunge he determined to take, sending on his servants with his guns, and an intimation that in ten minutes he would arrive to dinner. So stripping and placing his things very carefully upon a stone, he began to luxuriate in the water. He was a capital swimmer, and had swam to some distance, when, to his horror and dismay, on looking to the place where he had left his habiliments, he perceived a dozen monkeys overhauling his entire wardrobe. One was putting his legs through the sleeves of his shirt; another cramming its head through his trousers; another trying to find if any treasure was concealed in his boot; while his hat formed a source of wonderment and amusement to some to or three others, who were endeavoring to unravel the mystery by ripping the lining, and taking half a dozen bites out of the brim. As soon as he gained his mental equilibrium (for the thing was so ridiculous as to make him laugh heartily, notwithstanding his disgust at seeing his garments turned to such "vile purposes"), he made with all haste toward the shore; but judge of his horror when he saw these "precious rascals" each catch up what he could lay hold of, and rattle off at full speed into the jungle, leaving poor Rodgers without the vestige of an article of raiment to cover himself. All he heard was the glorious chattering as they one by one disappeared, the last one lugging off his shirt, which, being rather awkward to carry, was continually tripping him up by getting between his legs. Here was a pretty pickle for a Christian under a broiling sun! and here he stayed till the inmates of the bungalow, beginning to suspect some accident, came out in search, and found poor Rodgers sitting up to his neck in water, in a frame of body and mind which we may conclude to be "more easily imagined than described."

The Three Giants.

In one of the most lonesome valleys in all Wales, far away from any village or highway, lived a poor widow with two little children, a boy and girl, Reece and Gwendoline. Hard work had that poor woman to feed and clothe herself and children. With difficulty she cultivated some potatoes in her stony garden, and raised a few bushels of oats; often the frost destroyed the former, and the latter failed her from the early incoming of winter. Still, comparative plenty reigned when there was a good store of potatoes in the outhouse, and meal for oat-cakes in the cupboard. Then she had three goats, who yielded a sufficiency of milk for the little household; and in the summer time the widow and her children gathered almost enough wood from the thorn bushes and gorse plants to supply them with thick, warm garments.

You may imagine there was no school near. What the children learned, their mother and nature taught them. Many a happy hour did they spend by the river side, when their mother had no special work for them to do, watched over by the noble Scotch sheep-dog that had belonged to their father; and many a wondrous tale did they invent, as to what the river said, and where the clouds were going, and why the flowers only came in spring. Then they knew a whole troop of fairies who lived in the glen by the dripping well, and all the crags and mountains round were inhabited by giants. If they were poor, they were very happy children.

But a dreadful winter came, longer and more cruel than usual, and sweet little Gwendoline drooped and faded, and Reece had to go alone to the fairies' well, to look for "conkerbells," as their mother had taught them to call the long icicles that hung from every spray (the widow was not a Welsh woman, or she would not have called the icicles "conkerbells;" in truth, she was a Devonshire fisherman's daughter), and Reece felt very lonely, and poor little Gwendoline was very, very ill.

One day the widow looked on the pale face of little Gwenny, and then at the bold, bright boy at her side.

"Reece," she said, "you must go to Llansaul, to the doctor, and bring some medicine for Gwendoline."

Now Reece knew the doctor well, though Llansaul was miles off, for the doctor was a great fisherman, and often came to the famous trout stream than ran through the valley where the widow lived; and he never turned homeward without leaving a plentiful supply of fish at the little cottage.

"Llansaul, mother! I can't go to Llansaul. I'm afraid."

"Afraid, Reece? Afraid of what?"

"Of the giants, mother."

"Giants, Reece! Why there is no such beings as giant."

"Oh! mother! how can you say so! when there's Goliath of Gath, and Giant Despair; and if there was no such things as giants," continued Reece, waxing bold, "pray what was the use of Jack the Giant Killer?"

The widow hardly knew what to say, and the boy continued: "there are three giants who live between this and Llansaul, the Giant of the Bog, of the Fog, and of the Crag. Gwenny and I call them Boggy, and Foggy, and Craggy when we are at play."

The mother was puzzled for a moment, and then she caught the child's meaning.

"Oh! Reece! I understand now. But I know a giant far more powerful than your three giants put together. Go and fetch Gwenny's medicine, and I will give you a letter to my giant, and he will surely help you, even if Boggy, and Foggy, and Craggy all came upon you at once."

So the widow took a sheet of paper, and printed on it in large letters, such as Reece could read, "duty."

Then she wrapped up the boy as warmly as she could, gave him a letter for the doctor, and pinned the message to her giant on his breast. That done, she called the old sheep dog, Scot, and said, "My faithful friend, you know Giant Duty, and have learned many a lesson from him. When your master fell dead on the mountain, did you not bring all his flock home safely, even to the weakest lamb? Go, good dog, and take care of my son."

So little Reece and the dog started, and the widow, after watching them out of sight, came back, and busied herself about her house.

Gwenny's cough was troublesome, and she missed Reece, and was fidgety, and the widow was anxious about her boy; so the day was not a very happy one.

Towards afternoon a fog settled on the mountains, and Gwenny muttered, "Giant Fog will catch hold of Reece."

Many times did the widow go to the door and look out, in hopes of seeing Reece and the dog coming up the valley; but each time she was disappointed.

And where was Reece all this time? Such a road as that little boy had to travel, few little boys have ever seen, much less had to traverse alone. Centuries ago, when that great people, the Romans, came to this island, they made a road in those parts; and so bad was it, in spite of all their cleverness in road making, that they gave it the name of "The Stony Mile" (miles more truly), and to this day the Welsh people, in their own language, call it by a name that means the same thing.

Reece thought little of the road; he walked along bravely, quite proud of his errand, and, above all, his message to the great Giant Duty. As he and Scot climbed the hill-side, and looked down many a stony slope, he almost laughed, and said, "I wonder if our three giants really do live in the mountains, and if there really are such things as giants." Still, though his mother's words had to a degree shaken his faith in giants, he kept looking out at every turn, in hopes of catching sight of the new giant.

He gave his letter to the doctor, received a packet of medicine, had a famous dinner with the doctor's housekeeper, and started in high spirits homeward.

He mounted the steep hill above Llansaul safely, and found himself on the broad, almost pathless moor that lay on the top of the mountain between the hill above Llansaul and the precipice leading down to his mother's cottage.

"I hope Giant Fog won't catch us here, Scot," said the boy. But the words were hardly out of his mouth when they were enveloped in a deep mist, whirling and eddying round, till the poor child was quite giddy and terrified. He put his hand to his breast, pressed the talisman his mother had given him, and cried out "Duty!"

The fog seemed to clear for a moment, and he and his faithful companion stumbled on; but it soon became evident to the child that all shadow of a path was lost. Still bravely he pursued the way, always, when his spirits flagged, crying "Duty! Duty!"

At last they came to a more rocky place than they had hereto encountered, and the fog before them looked inky black. The boy paused, and Scot rubbed herself against him, and looked up whimpering in his face. "Never mind, good dog," said Reece, "even if this were the very castle of Giant Craggy, I am not afraid; we are doing our duty, as the good giant would have us. On, good dog, on!"

The dog drew back; the boy pressed forward, and in a moment he felt he was falling rapidly through the air.

How long he lay at the base of the High Crags none can say; but when he recovered his conciousness, Scot's cold nose was against his cheek. It was some time before he could rise from the ground, and then he found one arm hung useless at his side, and sharp pains darted through every limb. The tears started to his eyes—he was but a little fellow—but placing his mother's charm against his aching breast, he and Scot started again on their travels.

"Giant Foggy and Giant Craggy have done us a bad turn," said the boy; "but with Giant Duty's help, we will conquer Boggy, and then we shall be all right."

But he had a weary way before him yet. He guessed he was at the bottom of the deep valley instead of on the terraced hill-side; and he knew that in the valley Giant Boggy reigned supreme. On they went. The fog cleared a little; but dark night came down, and the poor child had hardly strength to keep on his feet. Numbed and weary, he made false step after false step, till he was fairly in the bog, and had neither strength nor spirit to extract himself.

The widow watched and waited, and every moment her anxiety increased, till she was suddenly started by the ringing of horses' hoofs on the stony pavement in front of the cottage. She flew to the door and met the doctor.

"Where is Reece?" he inquired eagerly.

"Not come back yet," replied the widow.

"Not come back! To tell the truth, the fog made me anxious about the lad, and I have ridden from Llansaul to see that he was safe."

At this moment Scot dashed into the cottage, and it was soon but too evident that Reece was not with her. The dog seemed to beg them to follow her; and hastily tying up his horse, the kind doctor and faithful dog hurried out into the night. They had not far to go. On the edge of a dark and dangerous peat bog, hardly a quarter of a mile from the house, lay little Reece, his legs sunk in the slimy, sticky peat; one arm, broken, hanging at his side, and the other still pressing the magic word "Duty" and the packet for Gwenny to his breast.

Tenderly did the kind doctor lift the exhausted child; skillfully did he nurse him; but for weeks it was doubtful who had really conquered—the three big giants, or the good one.

But at last one day Reece opened his eyes and said, "Mother, I hope Gwenny's medicine is all right."

"Quite, dearest."

"I'm so glad. The three giants were very cruel; but if Gwenny got her medicine, it's all right."

Be sure that one who could place duty as his guiding star at so early an age, must ultimately become an honor to his country and a blessing to all around him.—Balt. Review.

What Prince Did and Suffered.

One day a friend was wondering at the sagacity of the dog, and his master thought he would show off his tricks in a still more original style; and so, calling Prince to him, he said, "Go home and bring Puss to me!"

Away bounded Prince to the farm-house, and, looking about, found the younger of the two cats, fair Mistress Daisy, busy cleaning her white velvet in the summer sun. Prince took her gently up by the nape of her neck, and carried her, hanging head and heels together, to the fields, and laid her down at his master's feet.

"How's this, Prince?" said the master; "you didn't understand me. I said the cat, and this is the kitten. Go right back, and bring the old cat."

Prince looked very much ashamed of his mistake, and turned away, with drooping ears and tail, and went back to the house.

The old cat was a venerable, somewhat portly old dame, and no small lift for Prince; but he reappeared with old Puss hanging from his jaws, and set her down, a little discomposed, but not a whit hurt by her unexpected ride.

Sometimes, to try Prince's skill, his master would hide his gloves or riding-whip in some out-of-the-way corner, and when ready to start, would say, "Now, where have I left my gloves? Prince, good fellow, run in and find them;" and Prince would dash into the house, and run hither and thither with his nose to every nook and corner of the room; and, no matter how artfully they were hid, he would upset and tear his way to them. He would turn up the corners of the carpet, snuff about the bed, run his nose between the feather bed and matress, pry into the crack of a half-opened drawer, and show as much zeal and ingenuity as a policeman, and seldom could anything be so hid as to baffle his perseverence.

Many people laugh at the idea of being careful of a dog's feelings, as if it were the height of absurdity; and yet it is a fact that some dogs are as exquisitely sensitive to pain, shame, and mortification, as any human being. See, when a dog is spoken harshly to, what a universal droop seems to come over him. His head and ears sink, his tail drops and slinks between his legs, and his whole air seems to say, "I wish I could sink into the earth to hide myself."

Prince's young master, without knowing it, was the means of inflicting a most terrible mortification on him at one time. It was very hot weather, and Prince, being a shaggy dog, lay panting, and lolling his tongue out, apparently suffering from the heat.

"I declare," said young Master George, "I do believe Prince would be more comfortable for being sheared." And so forthwith he took him and began divesting him of his coat. Prince took it all very obediently; but when he appeared without his usual attire, every one saluted him with roars of laughter, and Prince was dreadfully mortified. He broke away from his master, and scampered off home at a desperate pace, ran down cellar and diappeared from view. His young Master was quite distressed that Prince took the matter so to heart: he followed him in vain, calling, "Prince! Prince!" No Prince appeared. He lighted a candle and searched the cellar, and found the poor creature cowering away in the darkest nook under the stairs. Prince was not to be comforted; he slunk deeper and deeper into the darkness, and crouched on the ground when he saw his master, and for a long time refused even to take food. The family all visited and condoled with him, and finally his sorrows were somewhat abated; but he would not be persuaded to leave the cellar for nearly a week. Perhaps by that time he indulged the hope that his hair was beginning to grow again, and all were careful not to destroy the illusion by any jests or comments on his appearance.

Such were some of the stories of Prince's talents and exploits which Aunt Esther used to relate to us. What finally became of the old fellow we never heard. Let us hope, that as he grew old, and gradually lost his strength, and felt the infirmities of age creeping on, he was tenderly and kindly cared for in memory of the services of his best days—that he had a warm corner by the kitchen fire, and was daily spoken to in kindly tones by his old friends. Nothing is a sadder sight than to see an old favorite, that once was petted and caressed by every member of the family, now sneaking and cowering as if dreading every moment a kick or a blow—turned from the parlor into the kitchen, driven from the kitchen by the cook's broomstick, half-starved and lonesome.—Mrs. Stowe's "Queer Little People."

The Fisherman and the Porter;

OR,

The Cost of Covetousness.

There was once a nobleman in Italy who was going to be married. Great preparations were made for the wedding-feast. Everything necessary for the occasion had been procured except some fish, of which the Italians are very fond. But the sea had been so rough for many days that the fishermen in the neighborhood had been quite unsuccessful.

The day before the wedding was to take place, however, a fisherman came to the castle, having a fine large turbot for sale. He knocked at the gate of the nobleman's residence, and inquired if they wanted any fish. The porter who kept the gate was a very covetous man. He was ready to take advantage of every opportunity to get a little money, whether the way of getting it was right or wrong. He told the fisherman that they wanted such a fish very much in his master's house, and as it was for a wedding-feast, they would be willing to give a good price for it; but he said he would not let the man in unless he would promise to give him one-half of what he might get for it.

The fisherman thought this was so unjust that at first he refused to do it. But finding he could not get in on any other terms, he consented. As he went in, however, he made up his mind to teach the porter a lesson that he would not soon forget.

He was ushered into the presence of the nobleman, who was so delighted to see so fine a fish that he offered to give the man any price he might ask for it.

"You will think, perhaps, I am naming a strange price," said the fisherman, "when I tell you that a hundred lashes laid on my bare back is the price of my fish, and I will not take anything else for it."

The nobleman was naturally not a little surprised. He thought the man was joking, and tried to reason him out of his strange notion. But finding the fisherman resolute in his demands, he said:

"Well, well, the poor fellow is certainly crazy. We must have the fish, however. Give him his price, and let him be paid in my presence; but lay it on very lightly."

As soon as fifty lashes had been given him, he cried: "Hold! hold! I have a partner in this business, and he must have a share of the price of the fish."

"What!" exclaimed the nobleman, "is it possible that there are two such mad fellows in the world? Who is your partner, and he shall be sent for at once?"

"You need not go very far for him," said the fisherman; "you will find him at your gate, in the shape of your own porter, who would not let me in until I promised he should receive half of what I got for my turbot."

"Oh! oh!" said the nobleman, "bring him in instantly. Let him have his share, by all means; and lay it on soundly."

The porter received his share of the price asked for the fish; then he was immediately discharged, while the fisherman was amply rewarded! The covetous man was caught in his own net!

A Lady's Opinion of a Lady's Man.

Mrs. Stephens, in her monthly magazine, gives a certain set of men, the like of whom are seen in every community, the benefit of her opinion as follows:

Our own private opinion on the "lady's man" is, that he is thoroughly contemptible—a sort of life hardly worth thinking about—a nutshell with the kernel withered up—a handful of foam drifting over the wine of life—something not altogether unpleasant to the fancy, but of no earthly use. A woman of sense would as soon be put to sea in a man-of-war made of shingles, or take up her residence in a card house, as dream of attaching herself to a lady-killer.

Women worth the name are seldom deceived into thinking our lady's man the choicest specimen of his sex. Whatever their ignorance may be, womanly intuition must tell them that the men who live for a great object, and whose spirits are so firmly knit that they are able to encounter the storms of life—men whose depth and warmth of feeling resemble the powerful current of a mighty river, and not the bubbles on its surface—who, if they love, are never smitten by mere beauty of form and features—that these men are more worthy even of occupying their thoughts in idle moments than fops and men about town, with whose attentions they amuse themselves. If we were to tell him this he would only laugh; he has no pride about him, although full of vanity, and it matters not to him what we may broadly affirm or quietly insinuate.

Soft and delicate though he is, he is as impenetrable to ridicule as a clown, and as regardless of honest contempt as a city alderman. Were you to hand him this article, he would take it to some social party and read it aloud in the most mellifluous voice, as a homage to his attractions.

THE SICK ROOM.—Avoid, as much as possible, whispering in a sick-room. In many instances the patient's senses are acutely sensitive, and he will hear every word you utter; but when this is not the case, he seldom avoids perceiving all mysterious signs between those around him, and they are sure to irritate and alarm him. Let your manner to the invalid be kind, frank, and cheerful; and whatever private communication you may have to make to your fellow nurses, make it when you have left the sick-room.

Married.

At Clinton, Ill., on the 7th day of November, at the residence of the bride's father, by Rev. Bro. S. S. Meginnis, Bro. HOMER B. TAYLOR and AMANDA C., only daughter of Sir Kt. Christopher Goodbrake.

Died.

In Ottawa, Bro. GEO. S. STEBBINS, aged 34 years, a member of Occidental Lodge No. 40, Shabbona Chapter No. 37, and of Ottawa Commandery.

The deceased rose from the position of bookkeeper, through the gradations of confidential clerk in the Treasurer's office, chief clerk in the bank, and the office of County Treasurer, to a profitable position in the partnership of Colwell, Clark & Stebbins. The Fraternity in Ottawa and the surrounding towns attended the funeral, and escort duty was performed by the Templars. He was a scholar, Christian, and charitable citizen.

In Springfield, Bro. JOHN BROTHERTON, druggist, a member of Central Lodge, Springfield Chapter and Elwood Commandery.

The Templar burial service was performed in an impressive manner by Elwood Commandery, Sir B. C. McQuesten, Commander.

In Fairfield, Ill., Bro. JOHN M. COPE, a member of Fairfield Lodge No. 206, and of the I. O. O. F.

The deceased departed this life at Olney, where he received the fraternal attention of the Craftsmen. The brethren at Jeffersonville joined in the funeral services.

At Lee Centre, Bro. DANIEL FROST, a member and Past Master of Lee Centre Lodge, aged 69 years.

We knew Father Frost well. He attended Grand Lodge many years, was a useful member, and was honored with several appointments. One by one, the veterans are melting away.

At Windsor, Dr. J. W. YORK, November 3d.

The deceased was a member and S. D. of Windsor Lodge, and a gentleman of ability and much promise. His remains were buried at Peoria, by our Peoria brethren.

At his residence near Litchfield, Ill., of typhoid punemonia, on the 25th day of Oct., 1867, ROBERT W. FINCH, in the 54th year of his age.

November 19, 1867, Comp. JAMES COOK, aged 34 years, a member of Springfield R. A. Chapter No. 1, and of Mechanicsburg Lodge No. 299.

Thanks to the brethren of Orleans Lodge No. 78, A. F. & A. M., who ministered to him in his last illness. Though a stranger, he found friends.

and BEAUTY OF FINISH.

Decker & Company's Pianos have always received the First Premiums, whenever and wherever they have competed with the most celebrated makers in this country.

OUR IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

Is an invention beautiful in its simplicity and wonderful in its practical effects. It is the most compact Agraffe ever invented, and its influence upon the tone is to render it mellower, rounder, and more clearly brilliant, while it utterly overcomes that sharp, metalic quality which disfigures the instruments of all other makers.

WHY WE EXCEL.

While other Pianos are rarely in tune,

THE DECKER & CO.'S PIANOS invariably retain their Pitch and Tone.

While other Pianos are made of poor or unseasoned materials,

THE DECKER PIANOS combine the Best Materials, Skillful Workmanship, and Scientific Construction.

While other Pianos are deficient in the great requisites of a good touch,

THE DECKER & CO. PIANOS have a flexibility under skillful manipulation, which not only adapts them to the style of every performer, but which causes the player to feel en rapport with the Instrument, and affords his taste and fancy free expression.

IT IS A FACT—That philosophy of construction is not less important than fitness of material.

IT IS A FACT—That various minute, unobserved appliances, adaptations, and improvements have an influence in the tone, durability and manipulative character of a Piano, in no degree inferior to the more ostensible modifications.

IT IS A FACT—Therefore, that science, as well as experience; artistic discrimination, as well as methodic care; capital, as well as conscientiousness, are requisite in the production of a GOOD PIANO-FORTE. In our Poetry.

For the Masonic Trowel.

Unsatisfied.

Why will the soul have longings
  Which earth can never fill?
Why will it roam and rebel
  In defiance to The Will?

For when earth's stores are garnered,
  To pleasure and delight,
The soul grows sick from surfeit,
  Bright morning turns to night.

Fame's gilded throne we fain would reach,
  Her charmed wreath bind 'round our head,
And in the march of triumphs feel
  We grandly ruled and led.

But soon we find that fame can cheat;
  Her throne by frail supports is reared;
Her wreath, which seemed so bright and pure,
  Looks tarnished when it's neared.

Then love! We try its soothing power,
  And weave its folds around our heart;
But start to find it has a sting,
  And oft a poisoned dart.

And then with cheated, love-wrecked lives,
  We turn, for strength, to works of love,
And feel the balm which God can give,
  Descending from above.

Oh! wise is he who finds in love
  And deeds of love his peace and rest;
These cool the fever of the soul
  And make the mortal blest.

Palestine.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Blest land of Judea, thrice hallowed of song,
Where the holiest of memories pilgrim-like throng:
In the shade of thy palms, by the shores of thy sea,
On the hills of thy beauty, my heart is with thee.

With the eye of a spirit I look on that shore
Where pilgrim and prophets have wandered before;
With the glide of a spirit I traverse the sod
Made bright by the steps of the angels of God.

Blest sea of the hills!—in thy spirit I hear,
Thy waters, Gennessaret, chime on my ear:
Where the Lowly and Just with the people sat down,
And thy spray on the dust of his sandals was thrown.

Beyond are Bethulia's mountains of green,
And the desolate hills of the wild Gadarene;
And I pause on the goat-crags of Tabor to see
The gleam of thy waters, oh dark Galilee!

Hark! a sound in the valley! where swollen and strong,
Thy river, oh Kishon, is sweeping along;
Where the Canaanite strove with Jehovah in vain,
And thy torrent grew dark with the blood of the slain.

There down from his mountains stern Zebulon came,
And Naphtali's stag with his eyeballs of flame,
And the chariots of Jabin rolled harmlessly on,
For the arm of the Lord was Abinoam's son.

There sleep the still rocks and the caverns which rang
To the song which the beautiful prophetess sang,
When the princes of Issachar stood by her side,
And the shout of a host in its triumph replied.

Lo! Bethlehem's hill-site before me is seen.
With the mountains around and the valleys between;
There rested the shepherds of Judah, and there
The song of the angels rose sweet on the air.

And Bethany's palm-trees in beauty still throw
Their shadows at noon on the ruins below;
But where are the sisters who hastened to greet
The lowly Redeemer, and sit at his feet?

I tread where THE TWELVE in their wayfaring trod;
I stand where they stood with THE CHOSEN of God;
Where his blessings were heard and his lessons were taught,
Where the blind was restored and the healing was wrought.

Oh here with his flock the sad wanderer came—
These hills he toiled over in grief are the same—
The founts where he drank by the way-side still flow,
And the same airs are blowing which breathed on his brow,

And throned on her hills sits Jerusalem yet,
But with dust on her forehead and chains on her feet;
For the crown of her pride to the mocker hath gone,
And the holy Shekinah is dark where it shown.

But wherefore this dream of the earthly abode
Of Humanity clothed in the brightness of God?
Were my spirit but turned from the outward and dim,
It could gaze even now on the presence of Him!

Not in clouds and in terrors, but gentle as when,
In love and in meekness. He moved among men;
And the voice which breathed peace to the waves of the sea,
In the hush of my spirit would whisper to me!

And what if my feet may NOT tread where he stood,
Nor my ears hear the dashing of Galilee's flood,
Nor my eyes see the Cross which he bowed Him to bear,
Nor my knees press Gethsemane's garden of prayer,

Yet, loved of the Father, thy spirit is near
To the meek and the lowly and penitent here:
And the voice of thy love is the same even now,
As at Bethany's tomb, or on Olivet's brow.

Oh the outward hath gone! but in glory and power
The spirit surviveth the things of an hour;
Unchanged, undecaying, its Pentecost flame
On the heart's secret altar is burning the same.

THE SYMBOLISM OF SACRED PLANTS.

As Developed in Freemasonry and the Kindred Institutions of the Ancient World.

BY ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D.

XVIII.

THE ROSE.

The rose, says Madame de Genlis, is the symbol of sentiments the most different, and of things the most opposed to each other; of it, piety makes the decorations of its temples; of it, love and pleasure form their crowns; grief sheds it over graves, and modesty and chastity receive it as their most glorious rewards. How much the rose was esteemed by the ancients will appear from a fragment of Sappho, quoted by Achilles Tatius, and thus translated by Thomas Moore:

> "If Jove would give the leafy bowers
> A queen for all the world of flowers,
> The rose would be the choice of Jove,
> And blush the queen of every grove."

In treating the symbolism of the rose, we shall find that, like many other sacred plants, it has at different times and under different circumstances assumed a variety of characters. It was supposed to be consecrated to Venus, and therefore it was peculiarly appropriated to festival occasions; but its religious use was not restricted to the worship of Venus. It was employed to adorn the statues of Juno; the votaries of Flora and of Hymen were decorated with crowns of roses, and Lucretius, when describing the procession of Cybele, the mother of the gods, through the principal cities, says that gold and silver were scattered along the paths, and roses were shed like snow.

Among the ancients, the rose was always the principal ornament of a banquet. Thus Horace, when describing an entertainment to be given to his friend on his return from Spain, says, neu desinit epulis rosæ, "nor shall roses be wanting to the feast." Hence, we learn that in all the banquets of the ancients, crowns of roses, sometimes mingled with myrtle, were worn by the guests, because, say those who assign a physical reason for the custom, the crown of myrtle represses the vapors of wine, and the crown of roses is cooling and relieves headache. But it will be seen hereafter that a better explanation of the usage will be found in the symbolism of the flower.

Not only were the guests crowned with garlands of roses, but the floors, the tables, and the couches were covered with these fragrant flowers, so that Cicero can not describe a scene of luxurious living in more fitting language than by saying that one was drinking and feasting on a couch of roses.

Roses were also suspended from the ceiling, over the table. Now, it was a principle prevailing among the ancients that what was said at a banquet, in the hours of intimate friendship and amid the exuberance of spirits and carelessness of expression that belonged to the festive occasion, should be deemed of a strictly confidential nature, not to be divulged elsewhere. Hence it resulted that the expression sub rosa, or under the rose, was used to indicate secrecy. That which was spoken sub rosa was not to be repeated. The phrase has descended to our own time, although the fashion that gave rise to it has long since passed away.

The rose was thus considered as a symbol of secrecy, and this symbolism was, of course, sanctioned by a legend—the legend either springing out of the custom or the custom induced by the legend, it is difficult to say which.

This legend runs thus: Venus, flying to the relief of her lover Adonis when he was attacked by a wild boar, was wounded by the thorns of a thicket of white roses through which she was passing. The blood of the goddess falling on these flowers, changed them to the red hue which they have ever since possessed. The rose was thereafter dedicated to her honor, and in memory of the wound which its thorns had inflicted. Cupid subsequently bestowed it upon Harpocrates, the god of silence and secrecy, that he might conceal the numerous gallantries of Venus, and it was ever after placed among his attributes. This legend is preserved in a Latin epigram, which also accounts for the custom of using roses at banquets:

> "Est rosa flos Veneris, cujus quo perta laterent
>   Harpocrati matris dona dicavit amor:
> Inde rosam mensis hospes suspondet amices
>   Convivæ ut sub ea dicta tacenda sciant."

The rose is the flower of Venus, to conceal whose love intrigues Cupid bestowed it upon Harpocrates. Hence, the host suspends the rose above the hospitable board, that the guests may know that whatever is said under it is to be kept secret.

Sir Thomas Browne has cited another old Latin epigram, which gives a different reason for the symbolism: .

> "Utque latet rosa suo putamine clausa,
> Sic os vincla ferat, validisque arctetur habenis
> Indicatque suis prolixa silentia labris,"

Which has been thus almost literally translated:

> "As lies the rose in bud inclosed,
> So the mouth's shut and bit imposed,
> Full tight, too, are the lips disposed."

Unfortunately for the appositeness of the explanation, it is not the rose bud, but the full blown flower, that is accepted as the symbol of secrecy.

This symbolism of secrecy which attached to the rose among the ancients has, as I have already observed, descended to modern times, and been preserved, not only in the adage of "speaking under the rose," but in the customs of many peoples. A rose is often placed over the confessional, in Roman Catholic countries, to indicate the inviolable secrecy which is to be observed in reference to what is there said. Newton, in his "Herball to the Bible," a work printed in the year 1587, has the following pertinent passage:

> "I will here adde a common country custom that is used to be done with the rose. When pleasaunt and merry companions doe friendly meete together to make goode cheere, as soon as their feast or banket is ended, they give faithfull promise mutually one to another that whatsoever hath been merrily spoken by any in that assembly should be wrapped up in silence and not to be carried out of the doores. For the assurance and performance whereof, the terme which they use is, that all things there said must be taken as spoken under the rose. Wherefore they use in parlours and dining rooms to hang roses over their tables, to put the companie in memorie of secrecy, and not rashly or indiscretely to blab out what they heare. Likewise if they chance to show any tricks of wanton, unshamefast, immodest, or irreverent behaviour, either by word or deed, they protesting that all was spoken under the rose, doe give a strait charge and pass a covenant of silence and secrecy with the hearers, that the same shall not be blown abroad nor tattled in the streets among any others."

Brand, to whom I am indebted for this citation, also quotes Peacham, a writer of 1638, as saying: "In many places, as well in England as in the Low Countries, they have over their tables a rose painted, and what is spoken under the rose must not be revealed."

Those who are familiar with the various applications of a symbol in which the ancient mythologists indulged themselves, will not be surprised to learn that the rose was also a funereal plant. Innumerable instances might be adduced from classic authors to show that the rose was used in adorning graves and monuments of the dead, as well as the corpse itself before interment.

St. Jerome, an early Christian father, says:

> "The ancients scattered roses over the urns of the deceased, and in their wills directed that these flowers should adorn their graves and be annually renewed. It was also the custom for husbands to cast roses, violets, and lilies on the urns which inclosed the ashes of their wives. These modest flowers were emblematic signs of their grief. Our Christians were content to place a rose among the ornaments of graves as an image of life."

So highly was this custom esteemed by the Romans, that wealthy citizens often bequeathed entire gardens to be devoted to the cultivation of roses which were to be scattered upon their tombs, and a legacy was frequently left upon the express condition that the heir would annually, on the anniversary of the testator's death, adorn his grave with roses. Not unusual, too, was the inscription upon tombstones; Sparge, precor, rosas supra mea busta, viator; "I beseech thee, O! passenger, to scatter roses upon my tomb."

To this custom of scattering roses over the sepulchres of the dead, Virgil alludes when he describes the ceremonies performed by Æneas at the funeral games which he instituted in honor of his father, Anchises:

> "Æneas then advanc'd amid the train,
> By thousands follow'd through the flow'ry plain,
> To great Anchises' tomb; which when he found
> He pour'd to Bacchus, on the hallow'd ground,
> Two bowls of sparkling wine, of milk two more,
> And two (from offer'd bulls) of purple gore.
> With roses then the sepulchre he strew'd,
> And thus his father's ghost bespoke aloud."

Statius, too, in the "Thebaid," thus describes the funereal honors paid by his grateful countrymen to the body of the patriot Menœcus:

> "On youthful shoulders borne, amid a train
> Of either sex who break into a lane,
> He passes on, to rank celestial rais'd,
> And more than Cadmus or Amphion prais'd;
> These, o'er his lifeless limbs gay garlands fling;
> Those, single roses, produce of the spring,
> And in his ancestor's time-honor'd tomb
> Depose the body, od'rous with perfume."

The primitive Christians, while refusing to imitate the heathens in crowning the corpse with garlands, did not abandon the custom, which they reckoned innocent, of strewing the grave with roses and other flowers. St. Ambrose alludes to this usage when, in eulogizing Valentinian, he says: "I will not scatter flowers upon his grave, but perfume his spirit with the odor of Christ."

The custom has been handed down to our own days, and roses and other fragrant flowers often adorn the graves of modern Christians as in ancient times they did those of the heathens.

Camden, in his "Britannia," has this illustrative passage when speaking of the village of Ockley, in Surrey:

> "Here also is a certain custom, observed time out of mind, of planting rose trees upon the graves, especially by the young men and maids who have lost their lovers, so that this churchyard is now full of them."

In a work written by Malkin in 1804, entitled "Scenery, Antiquities, and Biography," he describes the same custom as prevailing in Wales, and says that "the white rose is always planted on a virgin's tomb, and the red rose is appropriated to the grave of any person distinguished for goodness, and especially for benevolence of character." The use of the white rose in decorating the coffin of a maiden who has been early called from life, is a familiar custom which is, I think, almost universal.

In the Roman Catholic church there is a ceremony practiced at Rome on the middle Sunday of Lent, which is thence called "Dominica de rosa" or Rose Sunday. On that day the Pope carries in his hand a golden rose, which he exhibits to the people in the streets as he goes to celebrate the eucharist, and at his return. Durandus explains the ceremony by the symbolism which he attaches to the rose. The day itself was one which the church intended to be an occasion of general enjoyment for the faithful, who might be supposed to be worn out by the long fast, and who were now permitted to indulge themselves. Three things, therefore, Durandus says, belong to this day—charity after fasting, joy after sorrow, and satiety after hunger—all of which are typified in the qualities of the rose; for the rose, above all other flowers, delights by its color, refreshes by its perfume, and comforts by its flavor. In addition to which, the rose in the hand of the Roman pontiff signified the joy of the Israelites when, by the grace of Christ, they were permitted to return from their Babylonish captivity. And this will lead to the Christian, or modern, symbolism of the rose.

An essay on the symbolism of the rose would be incomplete without some reference to its use by that curious sect of philosophers in the seventeenth century who are so well known in history, and especially in the history of mysticism, as the Rosicrucians, and from whom the Masonic Order has most undoubtedly derived its very beautiful and philosophical degree designated as the "Rose Croix."

The Rosicrucians borrowed the name of their sect, as well as that of their mythical founder, Rosenkreutz, from the two conjoined symbols, the rose and the cross, which were peculiar to their order.

Of the origin of these symbols and of their relative signification when thus conjoined, there have been many opinions. Some have endeavored to trace them to the heraldic arms of John Valentine Andrea, who was the real founder of the Rosicrucian sect. These arms were a St. Andrew's cross between four roses. But the theory is untenable, for the symbolic cross is that of Christ, and not of St. Andrew. A better derivation is to be found in the fact that the rose was a well known alchemical symbol of profound import, and that the cross was among the same Hermetic philosophers the symbol of lux, or light, because the three letters of which the word LVX is formed are present to the eye in the configuration of the cross. "Hence the Rosy Cross," says Mr. Soane, in his "Curiosities of Literature," "is intended to express alchemically the great secret of Rosicrucianism." But the learned investigations and the exhaustive essay of Hitchcock on the Hermetic philosophy, has shown that that "great secret" was nothing other than the doctrine of the future life.

From the Rosicrucians the Freemasons borrowed the symbols of the rose and cross, and transferred them to their philosophical degree of "Rose Croix." There the symbolism will be very readily understood.

The cross was to the ancients, long before the establishment of Christianity and the consecration of that instrument of death by the sufferings of the founder of the Christian religion, a well known and universally accepted symbol of eternal life. The crux ansata, or cross with a handle, always had that signification, and was therefore the attribute of many of the Egyptian deities. But after the crucifixion of the Saviour, the cross, without losing its reference to the dogma of eternal life, became peculiarly and appropriately the symbol of Christ's death. It was the instrument on which he suffered for the sins of the world.

The rose, as a Christian symbol, is therefore constantly applied to Christ. In the Book of Canticles he is metaphorically called "the rose of Sharon." And it is to this combination of the rose and cross as symbols of Christ, that the well-known lines of Luther allude:

> "Des Christen Hertz auf Rosen geht > Wenn's mitten unter'm Kreutze steht."

Or, in unmusical English,

The Christian's heart on roses goes
When close beneath the cross he stands.

The rose and cross are then, in Freemasonry, or rather in that exalted portion of it known as the Rose Croix, or the Rosy Cross, the symbols of Christ, including the Christian doctrine of immortality. Hence, in this degree, the great doctrine of Freemasonry, the doctrine of the resurrection to eternal life, is taught by the symbolic rose, just as the same doctrine is taught by the acacia in the Master Mason's degree, and by the olive, the myrtle, and other sacred plants in the ancient mysteries.

And shall we not find this same symbolism of the rose in the ancient mythology? Rhigellini, and after him Ragon, in describing the Masonic jewel of the Rose Croix, which contains, among other things, a rose resting on the centre of a cross, at the foot of which is a pelican feeding her young from her own bosom, say that as the cross was in Egypt a symbol of immortality and the rose of secrecy, the rose united with the cross was the simplest mode of expressing the secret of immortality, which was the esoteric doctrine of the ancient mysteries.

Ragon, however, subsequently dismisses this theory, which can only be characterized as fanciful and arbitrary, and approximates nearer to the truth when he says that, as the rose was the symbol of the female principle, and the cross, or triple phallus, of the male, the two together, like the Indian lingam, symbolized universal generation.

In the philosophical theory of the ancient mythologists, the doctrine of universal generation was not far removed from that of immortality—nay, they were sometimes, perhaps, confounded. All of the deities of the heathen pantheon were considered only as personifications of the attributes of the ONE—the Supreme Father of All. His wisdom was symbolized by Minerva, his strength by Hercules, his creative power by Venus, and so on, through the entire class of Olympic gods and goddesses. Hence, when the Latin poet says, est rosa flos Veneris, "the rose is the flower of Venus," he so designates it because it symbolizes that creative power which was typified in Venus—that power which is constantly reproducing, and out of decay and death bringing forth renovation and new life. So it was an ancient superstition that the rose, like the phœnix, could be renewed out of its own ashes—a mystical idea which the Hermetic philosophers seem to have appropriated in their "golden rose," the production of which was the "consummation of their work," language under which, we have reason to believe, they concealed their doctrine of a resurrection to immortal life.

To this idea of a restoration to a better life we must refer the sentiment of Apuleius, who describes the goddess Isis as restoring Lucius from his brutal and degraded state to the life and form of man, by making him feed on roses.

Anacreon, too, in that beautiful ode to the rose, than which, Barnes says, antiquity has produced nothing more beautiful, alludes to this symbolism of the rose as "the helper of the dead and the conquerer of time." Moore has very faithfully transferred the sentiments and language of the Greek poet into our vernacular English:

"The rose distils a healing balm
The beating pulse of pain to calm;
Preserves the cold, inurned clay,
And mocks the vestige of decay.
And when, at length, in pale decline,
Its florid beauties fade and pine,
Sweet as in youth, its balmy breath
Diffuses odor e'en in death."

The ancient Mexicans called their Eve by a name which signified "the lifting up of the rose," which was, they said, "the fruit of the tree," by the eating of which she sinned and fell. A strange coincidence, this, which, if traced out, would undoubtedly bring us to all the mystical philosophy and recondite symbolism of the tree of life.

We conclude with this remark, that everywhere among the ancients this symbolic idea was preserved, and the rose, whatever parts it may have played as a festival or a funereal plant, however the poets, in their ornate phraseology, may have called it "the crown of Spring," "the trophy of the Graces," "the sport of Venus" and "the flower of Love," was really, primitively, and philosophically, the symbol of the creative power of nature.

Letter from Capt. Hill.

FORT TOTTEN, ON DEVIL'S LAKE, D. T.,
November, 1867.

FRIEND REYNOLDS—I promised you I would drop you a line after I got here, and let you know how I got here and how it looks here. Well, I left Springfield, August 28th, went to St. Joe, where I waited for a boat till Sept. 10; I then went on board the Amaranth, and floated up the Missouri to Fort Stevenson (it is a new fort, on no map, but lies at the mouth of Snake Creek, about 30 miles below Fort Berthold), where we landed October 20th, rather tired of the float among the laying on sand bars, the rocks, the double tripping, and the snags that poke their ends at you up through the cabin; but, amid all the delays and dangers, we landed safe at Fort Stevenson.

We lay there a week, and then took our way for Devil's Lake, 140 miles north-west from the Missouri River, taking six days to make the trip, through a country where there is no wood the whole distance, having to burn buffalo chips to do all the cooking, and seeing no water from the time we left camp in the morning till we stopped at night, and then not always good. We arrived safe, and are now housed for the winter in a log house, the cracks filled with mud, and the roof covered with mud. There is plenty of wood around the lake, consisting principally of white oak, with some white birch and poplar. There are some elk, a few deer and antelope, plenty of grouse and buffalo, for game. The lake is full of fish (pike, principally), averaging 30 inches long, and in weight from 10 to 15 pounds, we have them plenty for eating.

The lake is a beautiful sheet of water, about 60 miles long and 30 miles wide in the broadest place; in some parts it is not more than half a mile wide, owing to the conformation of the country around it. The water is slightly salt—so much so that it can not be used for culinary purposes, yet the cattle and horses like it and live on it, and not more than twenty rods from the bank of the lake is a spring of clear, nice, fresh water, sufficient for all purposes of the garrison of 350 men. We are about 450 miles from St. Paul, and 170 miles from Fort Abercrombie, to which point is a telegraph, and by that route we have mails quite regular.

Fort Totten, where I am, is on the south side of Devil's Lake, just below the 48th parallel of N. latitude and on W. longitude 99, so you see it is quite cool here. We had quite a snow storm (the first) October 28th, which I was out in on my way from the Missouri River, and another on November 8th. The snow of both storms has gone, yet it has been freezing weather all the time, and now the ground is covered with snow which will be likely to lay all winter. The men have been skating here for three weeks. I am well and hearty here, and don't know how long I will be here. We have a very few Indians here, but I do not apprehend any difficulty with them this winter. There are a plenty of French half-breeds about, and quite a large settlement not more than seventy miles away.

Fraternally and respectfully yours,

GEO. W. HILL.

Seventy Years a Mason.

DUNLEITH, Ill., Dec. 20, 1867.

R. W. Bro. H. G. Reynolds:

SIR:—Seeing a notice in the last TROWEL of the death of Bro. John Foster, of Boston, Mass., as one of the oldest members of the Masonic Fraternity, I thought I would give you an account of Bro. David Styles, who resides near this place.

He was born in Litchfield, Conn., in 1766, and is nearly 102 years old. His father was killed in the revolutionary war. He went to Toronto, in Upper Canada, and was there initiated into the mysteries of Masonry in 1797, and has been a Mason in good standing over 70 years. Subsequently, he was a charter member of a lodge in Portland, Ohio, at Ann Arbor, Mich., at Marion, Iowa, and again at Hazel Green, Wis., which is still in a flourishing condition, and of which he is now a member in good standing. He has been a pioneer as well in the settlement of the great West as in the spread of Masonic principles; he has raised a large family, who all occupy respectable positions in the community, and who, with his grand and great grand children, now number over fifty; he is a good Mason, and a good Christian, and probably the oldest Mason in the country. He is yet hale and hearty, able to go about and see his friends, and often walks five or six miles.

What a record to look back upon, with the consolation of a well spent life, in that trying hour when he shall be called from the labors of the lodge below, to the refreshment of that celestial lodge above, where the Grand Master of the Universe presides.

Fraternally yours,

JOHN M. DAGGETT.

Palmyra—Ruins—Bro. Virden.

Bro. H. G. Reynolds, Springfield, Ill.:

DEAR SIR AND BRO.—On Tuesday, 7th inst., I visited Palmyra Lodge No. 463, for the purpose of installing their officers and lecturing the lodge for a few days. On my arrival, I found the ladies had prepared a splendid supper in a portion of the hall, and, although the weather was very cold, the hall was well filled. After installing the officers in public and listening to some addresses delivered by brethren present, and partaking of supper, we had a good social time, in which all seemed to enjoy themselves very much. The crowd dispersed, well pleased with what had transpired, about half-past ten o'clock. I stopped with Bro. D. N. Solomon, some 50 yards from his store, over which is the Masonic hall. About one o'clock I was awakened by the smell of burning pine and the light against the window of my room. I sprang out of bed and aroused Bro. Solomon. We rushed to the store; I ran up stairs to see if I could save any of the jewels and furniture of the lodge, but the smoke and heat were so great that I could not endure it.

The brethren have lost everything. We succeeded in saving a portion of Bro. Solomon's goods, but the building, which was 23 by 70 feet, two stories high, was entirely consumed. They have lost their charter, which, I suppose, will be furnished them free of charge.

I am almost sick this morning, having rode to Palmyra on Tuesday in an open buggy, about 18 miles, worked a great portion of the night at the fire, and rode home yesterday again; but I promised the brethren I would write you this morning, although I hardly know what I have written, I am so unwell.

Fraternally yours,

A. L. VIRDEN.

From our Exchanges.

The Curtain Falls.

> "Here is my journey's end, here is my birth,
> The very sea mark of my utmost sail."

With this issue is completed the third, and, we grieve to say, the last volume of the Masonic Eclectic. During the years of its publication it has been to us the source of very great pleasure and of no little toil; but the labor has appeared light because we have cherished the idea that it was doing something toward the great work Masonry has in hand, and which Masons have to do. This work will never receive its full impetus until the mass of the Fraternity come to appreciate the need of instruction in something beyond the mere forms of the ritual, till they comprehend that the body can only develop its real energy by vitalizing the members, and this, the most careful and minute practice of forms will never accomplish. We may multiply lodges and make Masons to our heart's content; but, comparitively speaking, we shall be exhausting our strength in firing up the boiler without moving the machinery or applying the real power of the institution to its legitimate and exalted purposes. Believing thus, it has been our endeavor through the pages of this journal to awaken a taste for study and reflection on the various topics of Masonic interest which will account for the somewhat elementary character of the work. Made up, as our institution is, of men of every rank and condition of life, engaged, as almost the entire body are, in the active pursuits of life, we have believed that they could not reasonably be expected to wish for or appreciate too great a degree of profundity, and we have, therefore, sought to mingle the useful with the agreeable, and thus aid in preparing the fraternal mind for studies of a more serious character. Believing, too, that every effort in the right direction must have some success, be it ever so little, we flatter ourselves that our labors have not been altogether in vain, and that in due time the seed we have scattered will germinate and ultimately bear fruit. But we are so constituted that we must eat and drink, and we can not consistently appear in public without clothing, neither of which have ever yet been afforded by this publication. We say with some degree of pride that from its inception to this time neither editors nor publishers have ever received a dime of profit from its issue. Its entire receipts have been absorbed in the expenses of publication. So long as this account balanced we were content, but latterly we have been at considerable expense in addition to our time and labor, given without the hope of other fee or reward than the consciousness of contributing our share to the welfare and stability of the Craft. This expense we are unable to bear, and we have, therefore merged the Eclectic into our gigantic and flourishing neighbor the "National Freemason," within whose columns we shall have ample room and verge enough for our communications with the brethren.

We ask our friends who have stood by us in this enterprise to transfer their patronage to the National Freemason. It has the advantage in its weekly issues of presenting the latest intelligence from all points while yet the news is fresh. Having no local interests to subserve but aiming to be, as its name indicates, the organ of the Craft universal, it will be found of value and interest to Masons wherever dispersed. The time is upon us when, in the face of a renewed attempt to revive the defunct Morgan and incite a new crusade against the Fraternity, we need a candid and firm advocate of our interests as a society, and we truly believe that in maintaining the Freemason, and heeding its conservative teachings, the brethren will secure to themselves a strong arm against their enemies.

Finally, in taking leave of the readers and patrons of the Eclectic, we desire to renew to them our thanks for their support during its existence, our regret that it is no longer to serve as a medium for the interchange of thought between us and our hope, that its memories may assist in promoting the object of its establishment and existence.—Eclectic.

A Masonic Funeral.

The first Masonic funeral that ever took place in California occurred in the year 1849, and was performed over the body of a brother found drowned in the bay of San Francisco. An account of the ceremonies states that upon the body of the deceased was found a silver mark of a Mark Master, upon which were engraved the initials of his name. A little further investigation revealed to the beholders the most outre exhibition of Masonic emblems that were ever drawn by the ingenuity of man on human skin. There is nothing in the history or traditions of Freemasonry equal to it. Beautifully dotted on his left arm, in red or blue ink, which time could not efface, appeared all the emblems of the Entered Apprentice. There were the Holy Bible, the square and compass, the twenty-four-inch guage, and the common gavel. There were also the Mosaic pavement representing the ground floor of King Solomon's Temple, the indented tessel which surrounds it, and the blazing star in the center. On his right arm, and artistically executed in the same indelible liquids, were the emblems appertaining to the Fellow Craft degrees, viz.: the plumb, the square, and the level. There were also five columns, representing the five orders of architecture—the Tuscan, Doric, Ionic, Corinthian, and Composite.

In removing the garments from his body, the trowel presented itself, with all the other working tools of operative Masonry, besides all the emblems peculiar to the degree of Master Mason. Conspicuously on his breast were the great lights of Masonry. Over his heart was the pot of incense. On other parts of his person were the bee hive, the book of constitutions, guarded by the Tyler's sword, the sword pointing to a naked heart, the all-seeing eye, the anchor and the ark, the hour glass, the scythe, the forty-seventh problem of Euclid, the sun, moon, stars, and a comet, the three steps, emblematical of youth, manhood, and age. Admirably executed was the weeping virgin, reclining on a broken column, upon which lay the book of constitutions. In her left hand she held the pot of incense, the Masonic emblem of a pure heart, and in her uplifted right hand a sprig of acacia, the beautiful emblem of immortality of the soul. Immediately beneath her stood winged Time, with his scythe by his side, "which cuts the brittle thread of life," and the hour-glass at his feet, which is ever reminding us that "our lives are drawing to a close."

The withered and attenuated fingers of the Destroyer were delicately placed amid the long and gracefully flowing ringlets of the disconsolate mourner. Thus were the striking emblems of mortality and immortality beautifully blended into one pictorial representation. It was a spectacle such as Masons never saw before, and in all probability such as the Fraternity may never witness again. The brother's name was never known.

DeWitt Clinton.

The venerable printer, Conger Sherman, who died not long ago in Philadelphia, occasionally indulged in reminiscences of the early days when he worked in the printing house of Barber & Southwick, at Albany. Here is one of his stories:

It was at this time that I had frequent opportunities of seeing some of the public men of that day—among others, Daniel D. Tompkins and De Witt Clinton, both eminent Freemasons. In person, manners, and mind, Clinton was a splendid man. Sedate and reserved, he yet appeared to me always cheerful and kind. He had just been appointed by the Senate of New York one of the Board of Canal Commissioners, and was engaged in perfecting the plan of the Erie canal, of which he was the originator. I was sent to him one morning at his room for copy. When I entered, I doffed my cap, made my bow, and said, "Please, sir, I was sent for some copy." "Sit down, my son," was the kind and encouraging reply.

He took up from the table before him a neatly prepared manuscript, fastened at the top of the leaves like a lawyer's paper book, and asked me if I could read that. I looked at it; it was written in a clear, round hand, as plain as print. "Yes, sir, I can read it," was my reply. He said, "I have here a duplicate copy which I wish to verify before I give you the original; stand up before me and read." This was the first report of the commissioners appointed to survey the route of the great Erie canal. I did my best at reading. I was accustomed to reading copy—bad manuscript generally; this was good. I read on in a clear, firm tone, and with emphasis, pronouncing every word correctly, until I came to the estimated cost of the work—five millions of dollars. I drew a long breath, more perhaps from some natural cause than a comprehension of the enormous sum of money in those days. The grave statesman looked at me as if I did understand it financially. "Large figures, sonny," said he; "I may not live to see the work finished; but you will, and paid for, too, I hope." I then read on to the end of the document, put the copy into my pocket, felt highly honored, and returned to the printing office with it, where I came very near getting a good thrashing for loitering about the State House, which I sometimes did, for it was a very agreeable place for me to spend my time.—*Nat. Knights Templar Festival.

Fifth Annual Soiree of Apollo Commandery No. 1.

The fifth annual festival of Apollo Commandery—Knights Templar—of this city was given last evening, in the Tremont House, and was, as has been all the previous festivals of this Order, the affair of the season—thus far at least. It may be that the grand charity ball of the 20th may eclipse it in the items of attendance, and even of display; but, if so, then there will be wanted that brotherly acquaintance, each with all, that makes the whole gathering kin, and includes all within the freedom which at home characterizes the family circle.

The peculiarity of the K. T. festivals is, that they are exclusive, not even a Master Mason having the right—simply as such—to enter the charmed circle. The attendence is limited to the members of the Order—those of the Commandery here, and their invited guests from abroad—members of the same Order in other cities. Perhaps the outside world has no right to peep into the charmed circle, which it may not enter; perhaps it has. There is no harm in knowing what is transpiring in royal courts, even though the palace doors be not swung open to our presence, or the lackeys of the throne bow before us.

We say royal, for the Order of Knights Templar stands at the top of the Masonic column; it is, in fact, its crowning entablature. The Grand Lodge may be the keystone of the arch which keeps in place, and gives strength to, the grand circle whose charity spans the earth, and reaches, like the bow set in the cloud, into the realms of the infinite. But while the blue lodge equality which recognizes mutual support as being indispensable to individual existence, appeals to the feelings of a common humanity, to the fraternal sentiment, the successive grades of the Order stimulate to emulation in that which makes the perfect Craftsman, and furnish the regal column whose summit, like the top of Jacob's ladder, rests in the clouds above. And so the Knights Templar, with the rich garniture of their degree, their high aspirations, their professions, as made in the insignia, are objects of high regard, not only on the part of the ignorant wonderers, but among their Masonic brethren.

Their professions are high. Basing them on the knightly ethics of the chivalrous ages, the Templars of to-day go not out to Jerusalem, nor wait with lance a-tilt at the crossing, anxious for a trial of skill; they take the cross as the emblem of their faith, and the sword to signify that they are ready to work, as all true knights should be, for the eradication of error, the suppression of evil doings, and the spread of the truth. Faith and works are thus made to go hand in hand, in true effective union, as, when separated, the one is dead and the other is ineffective.

The gathering of last evening was one of the most brilliant that was ever met with, and was one of the most enjoyable that can be conceived of. The party numbered some three hundred, embracing, besides the Chicago commandery, invited brethren from other cities, and a brilliant array of ladies.

At 9 o'clock the Sir Knights marched into the room, and forming in double column, received the guests of the evening, several short speeches being made, extending a welcome and accepting it. The party then proceeded to the less formal exercises of the evening.

The room was tastefully decorated for the occasion, and to the best of music, furnished by the Great Western Light Guard Band, the merry hours flew rapidly by, with no one incident to mar the harmony of this occasion. The Sir Knights were courteously sociable with each other, and the ladies who were privileged to attend were waited upon as gallantly as was ever known in the poetic days when the smile of a maiden was incentive enough to make a score of cavaliers brave death on the field of tournay strife. The supper embraced all the delicacies of the season, and was served up in the style so well recognized as characteristic of the Tremont. Indeed, it seemed as though Drake surpassed all previous efforts on the occasion, as if anxious to assert his sole supremacy on this, the first festive gathering under the new management.—Chicago Tribune.

Jurisprudence of the Order.

Masonic law has little of the republican or democratic spirit about it. All its greater principles, termed in Masonic parlance landmarks, and most of the minor details of its government polity, are provided to our hands, as they were provided to our fathers' hands ages since, in the traditions and publications of the Order. Of all the wretched theories, into which even some learned in the economy of Masonic government have been misled, none have been so pernicious in their results as that assumption which places the original and sole authority of Masonic government in the consent of the governed. This error strikes a blow at the very base of the structure on which all government and order rests among men, the inviolable sanctity of the law. It substitutes popular caprice for the authority of antiquity, and, perhaps, it is not too much to add, in view of the high and mighty purpose for which the Masonic Institution was originally set up, the authority of God. It writes upon the sand of the wave-washed sea-shore, the laws which ought to be carved in the rock of eternal justice.

Every Freemason has placed himself under the most sacred obligations to obey the laws and preserve the landmarks of the Order; and there is implied in this undertaking, another—to know and understand them; else how is he to obey them? But what efforts are made, by the great body of Masons, to know and understand these laws and landmarks? Brethren, think of these things—think of duty, find out what it is, and then do it. Let none be ignorant of the laws, much less violate them. Mere fragments of time, now thrown away, can be used in the acquisition of such knowledge as will be of more value than rubies to the diligent Mason.

Destitute of Masonic knowledge, a Mason is without Masonic reputation among his brethren, and incapable of that usefulness in the Order to which every member should aspire. The laws of Masonry are simple, and easily comprehended; while their application is more a matter of judgment and justice than of a critical knowledge of legal principles. The fundamental laws of Masonry are brief, and can easily be committed to memory.—Masonic Review.

SAY but little—think much—and do more.

M. W. Bro. Vincil's Address.

We have listened several times to speeches and orations by M. W. Bro. VINCIL, P. G. Master of Missouri.

As a speaker he is emphatic, direct, and eloquent; rather sharp, but profoundly earnest and impressive. Of course we looked for an able and finished address. In this we are not disappointed, save that it greatly exceeds our expectations. We have looked in vain for the best part to give our readers, so we select that part which precedes the notice of the venerated O'Sullivan, which we know will be eagerly read by all our patrons:

Since the adjournment of our Grand Lodge, seventeen months ago, portions of our jurisdiction have been fearfully visited by a blighting epidemic, especially St. Louis. The destroying angel, as of old, sped forth on dark wing, entering homes where hitherto all had been light and joy. How many paled in his presence and drooped at his touch! The dark shadow that crossed so many domestic thresholds in city and country, unannounced, passed the sacred portals of Masonry, regardless of Tyler and drawn sword, and shrouded our mystic temple in weeds of woe. For he summoned from our ranks many of the noblest and the best, and hurried them through the misty vale to the undiscovered land. We to-day mourn the absence of many loved and departed. For one,

"I stand on mem'ry's golden shore
And muse and dream thro' saddened days,
Recalling forms that never more
Shall greet on earth my anxious gaze."

"The pestilence that walked in darkness, and the destruction that wasted at noonday," swept down many members of this Grand Lodge. The strong men bowed themselves to the imperious heel of that tyrant before whom all tyrants tremble. The silver cord was loosened, the golden bowl was broken, the pitcher at the fountain and the wheel at the cistern were broken, and oh! how many hearts were well nigh broken, too. But, while there was "fear in the way," and "mourners went about the streets," or followed their loved dead to their silent homes; while many were afraid of the "terror by night and the arrow that flew by day," where were found the true and faithful Craftsmen? At the post of duty, nobly battling for the suffering, and standing, as in the midst of a pest-house, ministering to the dying. Masonry, embodied in the actions of such men, was like a pure seraph from heaven, with gentle wing hovering where the death angel had brooded. See, in that home where dark, dreary, heart-crushing desolation reigned—where contagion thickened—whence nearly all the home-lights had faded, and silence, deep as the low-twelve of the grave, wrapped the few remaining, or perhaps dying, remnants of a once happy home! Whose presence is that, like the sun breaking through a cloud, now shining amid that scene of gloom, or standing, as a mercy messenger, with the dead, the dying, and the despairing? Once gazed upon, that sweet-faced angel will never be forgotten; once heard, that gentle voice will ring forever through the deep chambers of man's immortality. I need not introduce you, and say that angel is MASONIC CHARITY. How many homes were brightened by her presence that otherwise had remained forever shrouded in the sable shades of sorrow—how many hearts were gladdened by her voice that otherwise had never joy known again, the opening archives of God will only unfold at the grand convocation of the final judgment. May the Great Architect of the Universe bestow on these faithful benefactors and good Samaritans the highest benedictions of Heaven. Such men did not count their lives dear to themselves, but literally took their lives in their hands, and periled every interest dear to humanity at the high altar of DUTY. What commanding types of noble, disinterested manhood they present, as viewed in contrast with others of loftier pretensions and higher aspirations for official position, who, like the hireling, basely flees at the first approach of danger, and leaves the flock to the destroying wolf. There were those in this city during the terrible reign of pestilence who refused to flee the danger or leave the post of duty, while others were far away enjoying the healthful quiet and salubrious retreats of uninfected regions. Had the "faithful among the faithless found," who fell martyrs to duty, left the scene of danger, they might have been living yet. The hireling "seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep; the hireling fleeth because he is a hireling, and careth not for the sheep."

He that scares and runs away
May live to run another day.

During the cholera season of 1866, while, perhaps, ten thousand Masonic hearts beat with heavy throbbings in Missouri for the suffering and the falling, the blackest cloud of gloom that ever darkly swept the horizon of this jurisdiction suddenly arose. On the 11th of August, 1866, Anthony O'Sullivan, the Solon of this Grand Lodge, was called from the earnest labors of life by the desolating scourge that then hung like a pall over this teeming city. I was immediately telegraphed by Bro. Gouley, but did not receive the telegram till the 13th—too late to attend his funeral. I at once dispatched Bro. Gouley as follows:

CHILLICOTHE, August 13, 1866.

R. W. Bro. Geo. Frank Gouley, St. Louis:

Dispatch just received. Too late to come. Take charge of the office; will write you to-day. Take charge of the funeral, convene the Grand Lodge, and bury him with all honor.

JOHN D. VINCIL, Grand Master.

From the New York Dispatch.

Rebold's History of Freemasonry is a work that we have already noticed in these columns. Its translation (from the French) is now sought to be sold throughout the country, and it is proper that the Craft should be warned against it. This, or any similar book, which conveys the repugnant idea, the Masonic infidelism, that a man can be a Freemason and not believe in Deity, or that a lodge can exist without recognizing, and at all times asserting, the existence of the Supreme First Cause of all things, should be placed under the unequivocal ban of every Craftsman. In noticing this work, the National Freemason says:

"We find our name used in an unqualified indorsement of this work. We never gave such indorsement. We commended it as giving evidence of great research and acquaintance with ancient history, and the philosophy and religious faith of nations; we expressed our regard for it as an addition to Masonic literature; but we dissented from its theory, objected to its conclusions, pointed out a material unfitness on the part of its author in the essential qualifications for a historian, and condemned, in no unsparing terms, the use of his work under a Masonic name to propagate his peculiar theological views, at variance with the Masonic sentiment of this nation. If this is an indorsement of the work, Bro. Rebold and his friends are welcome to it."

The above is, doubtless, from the pen of the Rev. Dr. Bro. McMurdy, and we coincide in all that he says. It appears that a Mason of the name of Brennan is the agent for the sale of this book; and how he can cause its circulation is a mystery to us and to all true and right-minded Masons.

PARTON, in his life of Dr. Franklin, thus speaks of his inestimable wife:

"To promote her husband's interests, she attended in his little shop, where she bought rags, sewed pamphlets, folded newspapers, and sold the few articles in which he dealt, such as ink, paper, lampblack, blanks, and other stationery. At the same time, she was an excellent housekeeper, and besides being economical herself, taught her somewhat careless, disorderly husband to be economical also. Sometimes, Franklin was clothed from head to foot in garments which his wife had both woven and made, and for a long time she performed all the work of the house without the assistance of a servant. Nevertheless, she knew how to be liberal at proper times. Franklin tells us that for some years after his marriage, his breakfast was bread and milk, which they ate out of a two-penny earthen vessel, with a pewter spoon; but one morning, on going down to breakfast, he found upon the table a beautiful china bowl, from which his bread and milk was steaming, with a silver spoon by its side, which had cost a sum equal in our currency to ten dollars. When he expressed his astonishment at this unwonted splendor, Mrs. Franklin only remarked, that she thought her husband deserved a silver spoon and china bowl as much as any of his neighbors. Franklin prospered in his business until he became the most famous editor and most flourishing printer in America, which gave him the pleasure of relieving his wife from the cares of business, and enable him to provide for her a spacious and well furnished abode. She adorned a high station as well as she had borne a lowly one, and presided at her husband's liberal table as gracefully as when he ate his breakfast of bread and milk from a two-penny bowl."

Benjamin Brown French.

PAST GRAND MASTER OF TEMPLARS, U. S.

We copy from the National Freemason the following sketch of the Masonic life of the above named distinguished Freemason.—ED.

Benjamin Brown French was born at Chester, in the state of New Hampshire, on the 4th day of September, 1800. His father was Hon. Daniel French, an eminent lawyer, and for several years Attorney-General of the State. His mother was Mercy French, daughter of Benjamin Brown, Esq., a merchant of Chester, and father of Rev. Francis Brown, D. D., well known as a popular President of Dartmouth College, who died while holding that office.

Bro. French was deeply impressed with the benefits and solemnities of Freemasonry upon attending a Masonic funeral at about the age of fifteen. He then witnessed the kind attentions of the brethren to the bereaved family, whose head was removed by death, and the solemn and imposing ceremonies with which the body was borne to and deposited in the grave. From that time onward, he turned his attention particularly to the exoteric teachings of the Order, and determined, at the earliest possible moment after arriving at the proper age, that he would become a Freemason. There was no lodge within twenty miles of his native town, and not until he settled at Sutton did the desired opportunity present itself.

King Solomon's Lodge No. 14, on the registry of the Grand Lodge of New Hampshire, was located at New London, four miles from Bro. French's residence; and in the autumn of 1825, but a few weeks after he became a resident of Sutton, he made application to that lodge for the degrees of Masonry, and during the following winter was initiated, passed, and raised in that lodge, Worshipful Bro. Moses S. Harvey, now a Judge in one of the western States, being at the time Master of that lodge. Bro. French gave the utmost attention to the work and lectures, and in a very short time became perfectly informed in all that could be there taught.

In September, 1827, he removed to Newport, Sullivan county, N. H., when he demitted from King Solomon's Lodge, and became a member of Corinthian Lodge No. 28. In 1828 he was elected Senior Warden of that lodge, and in 1830, Master of it. He became ex-officio a member of the Grand Lodge of New Hampshire, the annual meetings of which, at Concord, he never failed to attend.

In 1830 he was appointed by the Grand Lodge District Deputy Grand Master, and in 1832, Grand Marshal, which office he held, as well as the Mastership of Corinthian Lodge, when he came to Washington, in December, 1833.

Anti-Masonry, caused by the Morgan excitement, was then sweeping over the United States, and many of the lodges all over the Union were closed for the time being, and it is believed that after Bro. French left Newport, Corinthian Lodge was never again opened.

On the arrival of Bro. French in Washington, upon inquiry, he found that Freemasonry was at a very low ebb; and, although he visited the lodges and the Grand Lodge a few times, he did not affiliate with any one until National Lodge No. 12 was formed, in 1846. He affiliated with that lodge, and was elected one of its representatives in the Grand Lodge at its next meeting, in November of that year.

He attended the meeting of the Grand Lodge on the 3d day of November, 1846, and was then elected Grand Master, to which office he was annually re-elected until November, 1852, when he declined a re-election.

Bro. French was made a Royal Arch Mason in Columbia Chapter No. 15, of the City of Washington, on the fifth day of November, 1846, M. E. Comp. Charles Gilman being present and aiding in the work.

In 1847, Bro. French, then being High Priest of Columbia Chapter, was elected Grand King of the Grand Chapter of Maryland and District of Columbia. In November, 1848, he was elected Deputy Grand High Priest, and in 1850, Grand High Priest, to which office he was annually re-elected until November, 1855, when he declined a re-election.

Bro. French received the encampment orders in De Witt Clinton Encampment, Brooklyn, N. Y., on the 8th day of April, 1847. There being at that time no regular encampment working any nearer to Washington than New York, he went to New York for the express purpose of receiving those Orders.

Immediately after his return to Washington, he united with other Templars, some of them being the old members of Washington Encampment, which had been dormant for a number of years, in reviving that encampment, which was done through the M. E. Deputy G. G. Master of the G. G. Encampment of the U. S., Jos. K. Stapleton. And upon its re-assembling for work, Sir Knight French was unanimously elected Grand Commander, which office he continued to hold, with the exception of a single year, for twelve years.

In September, 1850, Bro. French attended, for the first time, the triennial meeting of the two G. G. Bodies of the United States, at Boston, and was elected G. G. Recorder of the G. G. Encampment, and G. G. Secretary of the G. G. Chapter, which offices he held until September, 1859, when, at the triennial meeting of the G. G. Encampment at Chicago, he was elected Grand Master of Templars of the U. S., and declined a re-election as G. G. Secretary of the G. G. Chapter.

M. E. Sir Knight French was re-elected Grand Master in 1862, so that he held the office for six years.

About the year 1851 (we have no data by which to fix the exact time), Ill. Bro. Giles Fonda Yates came to Washington with the dispensation of M. P. Sov. G. Commander E. A. Raymond, of the Northern Supreme Council of the A. and A. Rite of the U. S., authorizing him to confer on Bro. French all the degrees of that Rite, up to and including the 32d, which Bro. Yates did.

Ill. Bro. French was soon after elected by the Northern Council to receive the 33d degree, but a question having arisen between the Southern and Northern Councils as to jurisdiction, and it being doubtful to which jurisdiction the District of Columbia legally belonged, Bro. French declined receiving that degree until the matter should be settled.

It was finally settled and mutually agreed that Mason and Dixon's line was the true boundary which divided the jurisdiction, leaving Maryland and the District of Columbia in the Southern jurisdiction. This matter being settled, Ill. Bro. French was duly elected by the Southern Council to receive the 33d and last degree of the A. and A. Rite, as active Sov. G. I. Gen. for the District of Columbia; and on the 12th day of December, 1859, M. P. Sov. G. Commander Albert Pike conferred that degree upon him in the city of Washington, and on the 21st of April, 1866, he was elected Grand Chancellor, ad vitam, of the Supreme Council. Bro. French was again elected Grand Master of Masons of the District of Columbia, on the 5th day of November, 1867, and is now the incumbent of that office.

We have thus given a running history of the life of our M. E. and Ill. Bro. Benjamin B. French. In everything he has ever undertaken he has striven to do all that might devolve upon him with a zeal, industry, and perseverence that has done him honor, and which has crowned all his efforts with success.

As Grand Master of Masons he laid the corner-stone of the Smithsonian Institution, of the Washington Monument, and the Capitol Extension, besides many other corner-stones of edifices not as imposing. The addresses delivered by him at the laying of the corner-stones of the Monument and Extension, were impressive and eloquent, and have been preserved in the printed archives of the Grand Lodge, as well as in many other publications.

All the printed proceedings of the grand bodies at the head of which he has been abound with able addresses, reports, &c., from his ever active pen. He has delivered several eulogies on eminent deceased brothers, which are worthy of careful preservation, particularly the one delivered before Naval Lodge, on the death of M. W. Grand Master Yelverton Peyton Page, who was a member of that lodge, and an intimate and beloved friend of Bro. French.

He has delivered addresses at the tomb of Washington, at Portland, Me., Richmond, Va., Charleston, Jefferson county, Va., Watertown, N. Y., Boston, and, it is believed, other places outside of the District of Columbia.

Masonic Asylum for Boys, near London, England.

The following brief sketch shows what may be done by the Craft when the object is a good one, and the members "have a mind to work." The case should stand as an example to our American brethren, to incite them to noble deeds of a kindred character:

The institution was founded in 1798. Its object was the clothing and education of the sons of needy Freemasons, whose circumstances were such as to forbid them giving those advantages to their children. The fund raised, was, however, so meagre that it sufficed only to provide clothing of a very inferior description, and such education as common day-schools in the neighborhood of the residences of the boys' parents could furnish. Subsequently, as the annual subscription for this worthy purpose increased in amount, the boys were better clothed, and their education most carefully attended to.

This arrangement was found, however, to fall short of what was desired by the Masonic brethren, for there could be no satisfactory supervision of boys, like that which worked with such admirable effect in the management of the girls' school. A movement was, therefore, organized in London, to provide funds for the purchase of a building, with lands attached, in order to place the boys under one roof, and afford them a class of education which would prove of benefit to them when they entered the world to commence the great battle of life.

The funds required to carry out the designs were large; but a few leading members of the Order—active, energetic men, applied themselves to the task, and succeeded in obtaining the means of purchasing a mansion, with ten acres of land attached, situated in Lordship lane, Wood Green. The sum paid was $18,000, and in 1856 the house was opened, with a school capable of accommodating twenty-five boys.

After two or three years' experience, the experiment was found to be so successful that further funds were raised; and in 1860 the mansion was enlarged to such an extent that seventy boys were received and maintained. It was found, however, that even then the requirements of the institution were insufficiently met; and that further enlargements and alterations, involving a large outlay, would become necessary. After long and anxious deliberation, the committee appointed to manage the school affairs decided to erect an entirely new structure; and a handsome and commodious building is the result of their labors.

The old mansion has been entirely removed; and the new school was opened with a full Masonic ceremonial, which was very largely attended by the brotherhood, on July 8th, 1865. It cost $175,000, and will accommodate 150 boys, and $5,000 of this was paid by wives and daughters of Freemasons.

All of the other institutions are placed on the same substantial footing, and yet the brethren of England are not "satisfied," and are still devising new charities. Heaven speed them in their course, and may the Masons of America imitate their noble example.

From the Square and Compass.

Light and Truth.

There are many who cultivate so much bitterness of heart and soul against Masonry, that it is very difficult for them to have a good thought or express a truth concerning it. Their own minds are darkly shuttered to all the rays of light reflected from the Institution; and no truth breaks through the hardened shell of their fossilized understanding. They are like thousands who traverse upon the green carpet of God's earth, having the beautiful flowers springing into life, perfuming the morning and evening with their precious odor, without noticing them. They rise in the morning and heed not the lovely sunshine, the sparkling dewdrop, or the cheerful notes of the songsters of the grove. All is dark and unlovely; and all music is grating sounds to their benighted comprehensions and closed senses.

So with many in regard to Masonry. The beauty which adorns her portals and decorates her temple are not seen. We have some who do not see the moral and spiritual grandeur of the great system of Christianity. The plumb-line of divine truth applied to the preparation of an upright life, every action squared by virtue, and leveled by the horizontal will of the Great Architect of the Universe, are not seen, felt, or observed by many. Does it prove anything against Christianity? It is true, our Masonic organizations are not theological schools of sectarian divinity; at the same time we are taught the useful lessons of "pure and undefiled" practical religion, moral uprightness, humanity, and true friendship. We are taught to shun all persecution, to live peaceably in the government where we reside.

In this way, we, as Masons, prove that light and truth are the great essentials of the Masonic brotherhood. In the Bible, our great light, we are taught that God is light, and in him there is no darkness at all. And who of us are worthy to be called the sons of light, while continuing in darkness? This fellowship of the mystic tie is vain, unless we walk in that light and do the truth.

What a sacred light! a glorious light! whose orient rays make plain the truth, uniting all worthy and trusty Craftsmen in one heavenly fellowship, where the partings of time come not, where the trials of earth are over, and the light of truth gladdens the wasteless cycles of eternity in that Grand Lodge above, which never calls off.

Freemasonry Considered — Worthy and Unworthy Brethren.

The query, Who ought to be a Freemason? has for sometime occupied my attention. We are taught that the object and duty of the Craft is to be allied with mankind for the good of mankind. Reading an article in a back number of the Freemason's Magazine, reminds me, in words similar to the above, of our duties as members of the Fraternity. Each brother should question himself, Have I done my duty? Have I exercised myself in those "cardinal virtues" we profess to uphold? Have the three "great principles" found in me an exponent? Am I a worthy member of that Fraternity which claims the great and good of all ages as fellows? which has existed from the very dawn of time; whose origin is lost in the dim vista of the past, which has out-lived all other societies; has seen the various ancient mysteries rise and fall, while it is steadily progressing in its onward march to perfection, spreading its ramifications in every corner of the earth, exalting those virtues we prize.

We have men of all shades of political and religious opinion in the Fraternity; men who are an honor to any society with which they are connected; men who are earnest and zealous in the cause they are pledged to maintain; whose course of life is one of well-squared conduct, and upright actions; whose love for their fellows is known by their practice of those leading principles we are proud to acknowledge as the firm base of our great superstructure. Their life is strictly associated with that which is great and good. These are Masons indeed. 'Tis such as those men who have preserved our Fraternity through countless generations. These are truly brethren. These are men who have done honor to the Craft, honor to the country and times in which they lived. To such as those the poet alluded when he wrote—

> "Lives of great men all remind us
> We may make our lives sublime,
> And, departing, leave behind us
> Footprints on the sands of time."

For surely such are the great men, the truly noble, great, and good in every age. Men who devote their talents and their substance for others' welfare, whose aim through life is good to men, and honor to their God.

The question should occur to every worthy brother, How can I best serve the Craft? My answer would be in the words of Bro. Fox (as stated in page 254 of the F. M. for September). He attributed the perfect harmony with which they worked, to the "scrupulous care they exercised in admitting members," and I quite agree with him in advising and strongly impressing it upon every brother to study quality rather than quantity, in admitting members to a lodge, and not excuse an admission (as did a member of a lodge which I venerate) on account of the lowness of the funds.

A Freemason, after all, is but human. The lodge can have but little influence over the rampant passions of the man when without its doors, yet I ask of my brethren, is it not their duty to deprecate the conduct of a brother, and, if possible, bring him to a sense of his unworthiness? When he has not only been guilty of an offense against the recognized laws of the Fraternity, but has also been publicly pronounced guilty by one of the tribunals of his country, ought he not to be censured for his conduct, denounced as an erring, unworthy brother, who was inadvertently admitted to the sacred mysteries of the Craft.

The case which has elicited the above remarks, was that of A. H. W., who was recently convicted at Cambridge, of an assault in a railway carriage on a child of tender years. He, too, ranking as P. M. in a lodge in the province. If the Fraternity tacitly acknowledge such conduct in a prominent member, it will materially damage the interest of the Craft in the neighborhood—of which the following testimony of a gentleman is ample evidence: "If such men (alluding to——) are prominent in your society, you must know that to the outside world, as you call it, it appears the greater honor to have no connection with it."

In a Fraternity wide-spread as Freemasonry, we must of necessity have many erring brethren. Where we have not influence enough to reclaim, where publicity can do no good in that line, would it not be well to exercise that other virtue—silence? And as there is no great honor attached, individually or collectively, by acknowledging pirates or brigands as having belonged to the Fraternity, it would have been well if the passage alluded to had remained among the unwritten annals of Freemasonry.—Lux.—Freemasons' (London) Magazine.

A Doubtful Investment.

Casting about for some means of increasing the number of subscribers to the papers employed in echoing the dogmas of certain sects of religionists, the conductors thereof have dropped upon the rather brilliant idea of reviving the dead Morgan and inaugurating a new crusade against the Masonic Institution. If these persons entertain the idea that they can arrive at a successful issue in this undertaking, they must have a very limited idea of American common sense. To suppose that any considerable number of sane persons will now be willing to renew the foolish and unprofitable business of 1826, and run wild after the ghost of a dead slander, is to assume that the world stands still, or that the wary gentlemen conducting the journals aforesaid possess the power of galvanizing the dead past, and of organizing anew the frenzied cohorts of intolerance and fanaticism who fought and died in the great war of anti-Masonry. There can be little doubt that a new crusade against Masonry would be profitable—to the gents in question—but no one supposes that it can be of any benefit to the people, or any injury to Masonry. Morgan has served his purpose, and elected all the candidates likely to run on his platform; he is a dead cock in the pit, and will have no more power against Freemasonry than the paper Guy Fawkes paraded in England about this time will have upon the stability of the British Parliament. Hence, as a speculation, the attempt will fail. A few elderly dames here and there may lift up their hands in horror at these "Masoners," and bedew their specs with tears of sympathy for the lost and infatuated men who still cling to the wicked concern; but it is hardly within the bounds of probability that any of our lodges will be so affected as to surrender their warrants or meekly bow themselves to the earth until the storm is past; and what is of vastly greater importance, it is not probable that a single subscriber will be added to the paying lists of the crusaders as the result of their efforts.

When this thing began a few months since, we innocently imagined that the editors were in earnest in supposing that Masons taught or countenanced opposition to any sect or mingled their institution in the bitterness of political strife, and we did the best we could to disabuse their minds of error by displaying the truth before them, and, so far as opportunity served, to convince them that we entertain no desire to interfere with any prejudices of a religious or political nature, entertained by the brethren or the world at large. We repeated time and again the leading tenets of our profession, and the fact that men of every rank and condition in life, of every country, sect, and opinion, of all religions and all parties, are united with us, and deem it no interference with their religious faith or political preferences to patronize our assemblies and uphold our Institution, but we might as well have held our peace. The reason is now apparent. It is not principle these men care about, but interest. They have more or less money invested in their papers, and they are always on the lookout for some attraction which, by drawing public attention to them, might bring more coppers to the bag. A discussion on Masonry would naturally interest more people than any other topic they could select, and Masonry was therefore selected. The cloven foot is now apparent, but as far as we are concerned, the exhibition of it will be confined to their own columns. They may fire away at us to their hearts content, but we shall treat them as the burly man did his little wife who let out her spite in thumping him, and like him, console ourselves with the thought, "It amuses them and don't hurt us."—Eclectic.

The Freest Place is a Masonic Lodge.

Equal rights, equal laws, and equal privileges constitute true liberty, masonically understood. Thus defined, a Masonic lodge is the freest place on earth.

It has ever been so, in all ages and climes—before the Saxon set foot on Britian—before the Franks had passed the Rhine—when Grecian eloquence still flourished at Antioch—when idols were still worshiped in Mecca; by the inhabitants of the torrid zone, or of the ice bound regions of the world, no matter by what cruel and formidable despotisms it may have been and may still be surrounded. It is thus that the members of our ancient and honorable Fraternity are pre-eminently entitled to the proud distinction of the Free! For although this distinctive appellation was, according to our legends, originally conferred only upon worthy Craftsmen, among the enslaved multitudes of ancient laborers, when duly initiated into the councils and taught the science of the master-builders, it has from the beginning implied every privilege, every enjoyment, and every security which perfect liberty can confer. Strict equality of individual rights and opportunities of advancement; a perfect liberty of conscience on politics and religion, which is entirely exempt from all inquiry and disparagement, and the exalted consciousness which fills every Mason's heart that his fair fame, whether he be personally present or separated from us by boundless oceans; that his nearest and most cherished ties in domestic life; that his business interests and most pressing exigencies, together with every lawful secret of his breast, are secure and sacredly safe in the hands of his brethren, constitute a kind and degree of reciprocal liberty which no state or phase of society, in the vague world of mankind, could possibly afford. And thus it is that our Institution has ever been the purest, the most enduring, and the most universal of republics that ever existed within the history of the human family. The Masonic Institution, governed by its own organic laws and codes of mutual obligation, and conscious that no earthly power, not even the greatest, can annul them, since they are deeply engraved and impressed upon ever Mason's heart, has flourished amid the deserts of despotism, and desires no new favor from political power in this happy land, so fertile in freedom and prosperity.

The Inquisition.

The establishment of the Inquisition by Dominie, in 1204, enabled the papal court to direct all its efforts to the extirpation of heresy. The leading features of this odious tribunal were the impenetrable secrecy of its proceedings, the insidious mode of accusation, the use of torture, and heavy penalties. This weapon of the church was first successfully employed against the Albigenses, but was afterwards suppressed in France. Introduced into Germany in 1231, it was abolished after the lapse of three years, on account of the violence of the inquisitor, and never again restored. In Italy it succeeded in crushing the reformation; but it was successfully resisted by the Neapolitans, who were alarmed at the cruelty with which it was administered in Spain. In that country it possessed a formidable power, and there an auto da fe was solemnized so lately as 1783.

THE MASONIC TROWEL.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., JAN. 15, 1868.

The Mission of Freemasonry.

The prevalent idea among the members of the Masonic Fraternity seems to be, that Freemasons were originally mere builders only, and that the speculative character of their several bands consisted mainly in some rude forms of government among themselves, and a few principles of relief, protection, and brotherly regard, drawn from the symbolisms peculiar to their profession.

The impression that Masonry put on its organized form at the building of the first temple, also prevails to considerable extent.

We do not accept either. The design of the ark before the flood is consonant with every principle of Freemasonry, and conforms, in length and breadth, to the main features of the temple and tabernacle. The builders of Babel must have wrought in an associated capacity. The Hebrews were not the Masons, par excellence, of the temple. The sculptors, architects, and artisans of Tyre were employed, and the woodmen, stone-cutters, ship-builders, and seamen of neighboring nations found abundant use for their learning, skill, and aptness in their several employments. The man who possessed the skill, cunning, and wisdom to put in form the designs communicated by Deity to Solomon, to shape them with such architectural skill and mathematical exactness that, when the stones and timbers came from the hands of the Craftsmen, they fitted so thoroughly and nicely that neither axe nor hammer were required to adjust them, was the subject and a favorite of the Tyrian King.

Hence, it is but reasonable to suppose that, wherever a new principle in science or the arts was discovered, its discoverer was ranked among the learned, and that the secrets connected with any discovery in science or art were held sacred, and committed to a chosen few. These were probably the chosen of God, and in the early writings are called the sons of God, in distinction from the ignorant many, who were called the sons of men. Let the students of the Old Testament Scriptures keep this idea in mind, and we think they must of necessity come to the same conclusion.

The earliest mission of Freemasonry, then, as more latterly developed in the case of Solomon and the widow's son, was, in a speculative form, to discover and invent, and to reduce the discoveries and inventions to practical use and form, and provide for their transmission from age to age through a chosen few. Hence the necessity for government and rules, and the lessons taught the learners were derived from the symbolism of their own working-tools—a symbolism ever before them, and easily understood. The mission of the operative was to make such work as the plan furnished him required.

It is easy to see how the wise men among those gifted in the speculative mysteries introduced the system of progression by degrees, as the operative manifested skill, ingenuity, and talent. The many were Craftsmen—a lesser number, overseers; fewer still, architects and designers; and yet fewer, governors, planners, or directors, while one here and there was supreme in his own locality, and oftentimes attained to kingly dignity.

These operatives traveled wherever their profession was in demand, and, doubtless, to them were distant nations indebted for the germs of civilization, refinement, government, and skill in the arts and sciences.

The genius and handiwork of the architects of the different ages are distinctly marked in the ruins of ancient cities, bridges, acqueducts, towers, and temples, and in later times in the churches, monasteries, convents, and public buildings, some of which remain as monuments of their learning, patience, and wisdom.

Freemasons have ever been the friends and promoters of that religion in which all good men agree; honor, honesty, industry, fidelity, sobriety, and loyalty; also, in forming and maintaining good and humane governments, mild laws, and a scrupulous observance and merciful administration of them.

Freemasons leave every man to enjoy his own religious and political opinions, and regard every man's right to that enjoyment as sacred and inalienable. Freemasons believe in God, the Creator and Governor of the Universe and all things therein. These things Freemasons have ever held, and still hold. In the speculative form of Freemasonry, it promotes universal education, the intelligence of the masses, discoveries, inventions, application of principles, labor-saving machinery, higher modes of thought, more and more elevated conditions of human progress, happiness, and employment.

Freemasonry mingles in every phase and condition of religious training, example, and expansion. It prevents division in churches, softens and banishes asperities among members, smooths the way for friendly intercourse among men of variant views, brings the good things in which religious men can agree prominently to view, and passes other things out of sight; and so the cement is spread which unites men who might otherwise remain perpetually distant from each other.

Freemasonry steps into the political arena, and moulds the forms of speech and the course of action between brethren of opposite views in such a manner that society recognizes their manliness and forbearance, and is compelled, often against its will, to say, "how these brethren love one another."

Freemasonry delights in architecture, building, improvement, and material advancement. Her architects abound, and are found among public buildings, erecting churches, rearing colleges, constructing immense hotels, building bridges, railways, aqueducts, ships, warehouses, and palatial mansions. Where they flourish, the arts, science, and commerce peacefully reign.

Freemasonry is benevolent. She watches over the orphan, and silently points to him the right path, and with gentle hand guides him in it.

She stands by the bed-side of the sick, listens to the last message of the dying, inters her dead with solemn and reverential rites, weeps with the mourner, comforts widowed hearts, and cheers desolated homes.

In the heart of the good man, every good thing is ennobled, every pure aspiration is sanctified, and every feeling born of love to God or man is intensified by the good genius and harmonizing power of Freemasonry. These, and kindred things, are its mission.

The "Phylactery" Enlarged.

Some months since, when the editor of the St. Louis Freemason saw fit to treat lodges of Entered Apprentices and Fellow Crafts as non-entities, and to go beyond the jurisdiction of his own grand lodge to the Baltimore Convention for proofs which were not there to be found, we endeavored to defend the time-honored usages, laws, ritual, and practices of the Craft as best we could. In the very characteristic and chivalrous manner of the editor, he gave us to understand that the matter pertained to the Missouri jurisdiction, and that it was none of our "put in."

Now we find him, not as chairman of the Committee on Correspondence, but as editor of the Freemason, interfering with the decision of Grand Master Sparrow, of Ohio, in regard to members of lodges U. D. and their position until a lodge U. D. gets a charter.

The Grand Master of Ohio holds that a petitioner for a new lodge retains his membership in his old lodge until a charter is granted. Such is the law of Ohio, as will be seen by rule 27, Code of Masonic Jurisprudence. Such is the rule in the Grand Lodge, Chapter, and Council of Illinois. Such is the rule of New York, and we believe of a large majority of our grand lodges. The rule seems to be different in Missouri. Has anybody found any fault with the Grand Lodge of Missouri? Has anybody held up her Grand Master to ridicule? Has anybody called in question the sanity or wisdom of her law-givers, that the editor of the Freemason should whelm the Grand Master of Ohio, and Dr. Mackey, too, beneath the angry waters of his wrath? Let the editor take his own "gander sauce."

The Masonic Review.

Bro. C. Moore has doffed the weekly and donned the monthly once more, in a new dress. The January number, with a likeness of Howard Matthews, Grand Master of Ohio, has come to hand. The cover is a new design, good and plain, differing widely in appearance from the old familiar one so long welcome to its readers and exchanges, and, to our taste, more symmetrical and appropriate than the present one.

After the cover comes the same old faces and forms we were wont to see, with good rich matter and a plenty of it, scattered through sixty-four pages, of the same size of the old monthly.

Published by Cornelius Moore, at 179 West Fourth Street, Reid's Building, second floor, Cincinnati, Ohio, at $3.00 per annum.

We wish him a happy new year, a richly paying subscription list, increasing every year—and that he may live—as long as he wants to.

Bro. C. A. Tuttle.

In our December number we published a notice of an impostor named C. A. TUTTLE. We beg leave to say to our brethren that this impostor is a far different person from our good brother Charles A. Tuttle, of Decatur, who is a member of Macon Lodge, Macon Chapter, and Beaumonoir Commandery, a good citizen, and worthy gentleman; whatever t'other fellow may be, our Decatur brethren freely vouch that their man claims no wages but what are due, and that he is certainly no impostor, because he has always brought up good work, except once, and then he knew no better, as every one of them have once done themselves. This is a singular but re-mark-able.

"Great is Truth and Mighty above all Things."

The above is the heading of an editorial in the St. Louis Freemason, in which the editor says that our remark in the December Trowel, that he had "labored to show that E. A. and F. C. lodges are a myth," is a gross perversion of his position, and an inexcusable, "absolute inversion of the truth."

Pretty serious words to say, and an imputation that we shall not quietly submit to. To prove our words true, we quote from The Freemason, No. 2, Vol. 1, dated February 1st, 1867, page 28, second column, as follows:

> "Definition of Lodges.—There is no such thing as a 'lodge' outside of the Master's lodge. In other words, there is legally no such thing as an E. A. lodge, or F. C. lodge."

If the editor's assertion be true, E. A. and F. C. lodges are a myth, and we spoke the truth of him; and his imputation of falsehood, or "inversion of the truth" goes home.

J. Fletcher Brennan

Is now Secretary of the A. M. P. Association, 114 Main street, Cincinnati, Ohio, and not Mr. Geo. B. Fessenden, as announced in the December Trowel. Bro. Brennan thinks we have done what we should not have done. We told the matter as it was told to us. But here is Bro. Brennan's letter, omitting his fling and threat; it speaks for itself. He can fire away, if he chooses, when he chooses, and where. We shall have no controversy with him.

Cincinnati, December 26, 1867.

Harman G. Reynolds, Esq., Springfield, Illinois:

Dear Sir—Without due reflection, permit me to believe, you have in your December number of The Trowel allowed yourself to use information of a private nature publicly to blacken the reputation of a worthy young man, and who has not a personal enemy within the circle of his acquaintance. I have reference to your statement that Mr. Geo. B. Fessenden had been rejected as an applicant for the degrees of Ancient Masonry in a Cincinnati lodge. That Mr. F. was rejected by one vote in McMillan Lodge in May last, cannot be denied, and probably no one could so well assign the reason for such act as him who, in all probability, gave you such information. No less a person than the Grand Master of Masonry of this State has assured Mr. Fessenden that he was perfectly satisfied, from inquiry into the circumstances, that there was no just cause for the deposit of that vote; and that it was evident to the majority, if not to very nearly all the members, that nothing but feelings unmanly as unmasonic instigated the act.

Over one month ago Mr. Fessenden removed permanently from this State, and is not now nor has he since that time in any manner been connected with the business of the association of which the writer has the honor to be since that time, as he is now, Secretary.

Obituary.

It is with great regret that we announce to our readers the death of Bro. Charles Lobdell, the genial and talented editor of the Masonic Department of the La Crosse Democrat.

He was a passenger on the train which met with the late fearful accident near Buffalo, N. Y., and it is supposed that Bro. Lobdell was instantly killed.

We assure the friends of the deceased, and his associate editors of the Democrat, that we heartily sympathize with them in their loss, a feeling which we know will be shared by all our readers.

Memphis Rite---A Fraud.

We have a letter from one of the members of the bodies of the Memphis Rite instituted by Burt (an expelled Mason) in Chicago, in which he says that upon ascertaining the facts as they really are, they "let go a foolish thing, after due confession of having been sold cheap."

We hope this is the last we shall hear of this man Burt.

R. W. Bro. S. Stevens.

In consequence of the loss of his left arm, our industrious brother has been made both District Deputy and Grand Lecturer, and his district is the only one extending from the east line of the State to the western, embracing such cities as Peoria, Galesburg, Monmouth, Canton, Lacon, Dwight, Watseka, Pontiac, Knoxville, and Oquawka, and a very large number of important towns.

He writes encouraging letters from Cambridge, Altona, Yates City, Canton, and Monmouth. We should be glad to hear from all the Deputies and Lecturers frequently.

In regard to Lecturers, there seems to be some confusion; Deputies are not Lecturers; Lecturers have no districts, and may lecture anywhere.

This and That.

In the April number of the St. Louis Freemason for 1867, is the following paragraph:

> "Masonic Trowel.—On the 14th page of the paper, under the head of 'Furniture,' lines 1, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 39, and 40. We hope that our allusions will be taken in the spirit in which they are intended, and we can not conceive any motive the advertisers have, except that which arises from a spirit of rivalry in trade; but it is all wrong, and can not be too soon stopped."

The italics are ours. The line 1, referred to, was in relation to the low-twelve bell. In the August and each succeeding number of the Freemason appeared a highly seasoned notice of the bell by Grand Master Vincil, which, with the advertisement by Bro. Pinckard at the foot, occupies nearly half a column.

The editor will doubtless reply that "circumstances alter cases," and that what is wrong in plebian we, is right in patrician him.

Grand Commanderies.

We are reminded of an omission in our November and December numbers in not noticing our Illinois Grand Commandery elections. We have not been furnished with a list, but from information we give such as we can remember: Grand Commander, V. L. Hurlbut, M. D., Chicago; Deputy, J. R. Gorin, Decatur; Grand Generalissimo, Wm. E. Oven, Quincy; Grand Captain General, William E. Munger, Joliet; Robert H. Foss, Grand Treasurer, Chicago; Jas. H. Miles, Grand Recorder, Chicago. Will some Sir Knight furnish us with a complete list?

Wisconsin.—A. B. Alden, Portage, G. Com'r; A. V. H. Carpenter, Milwaukee, Deputy; James Bate, Madison, G. Gen.; J. A. Horlick, Racine, G. C. G.; Rev. Samuel Fallows, Milwaukee, G. Prelate; E. M. Hall, S. G. W.; C. P. Whitford, J. G. W.; W. T. Palmer, Milwaukee, G. Rec.; F. J. Crosby, Milwaukee, G. Treas.

Correction.

It will be seen on page 212, proceedings of 1867, that Vermilion Lodge No. 265 is recorded as located at Vermilion, Edgar Co. It should have been located at Indianola, Vermilion Co. Stratton Lodge is also recorded as located at Stratton, when it should have been Vermilion.

We advise Vermilion and Stratton both to apply for change of names, and take the names of their post-offices, or great confusion may hereafter arise.

DeWitt and Goodbrake.

The Fraternity had a fine time at the installation of the officers of De Witt Lodge and Goodbrake Chapter, December 27. The ceremonies were in the M. E. Church, which was closely packed. The occasion was made doubly interesting by the presentation of a superb set of jewels to the chapter by Comp. Goodbrake, in honor of whom it was named. There was good music, earnest talk, and good feeling. We congratulate Bro. Barber, Master, and Comp. Taylor, H. P., upon the auspicious commencement of their labors.

Very Gratifying.

In the summer of 1856, a dispensation was granted by Grand Master Herrick to Reuben Cleveland and others, to form and open Cleveland Lodge, now Cleveland Lodge No. 211, and the largest lodge of contributing members in the State. W. Bro. Reuben Cleveland was the first Master, and so continued until December, 1858. Since that time he has seen his lodge honored with a Grand High Priest and Deputy Grand Master; has watched with pain and solicitude while it passed through the consequences of the disastrous conflagration of 1859, and has been gratified with its recuperative power and onward progress to the front rank of working, useful, and stalwart lodges in the world. "Cleveland Lodge" is a synonym for personal integrity, individual character, moral worth, Masonic loyalty, and an unscaleable rampart. After passing through the hands of such brethren as Egan, Huntley, Gibson, Cutler, and Gurney, the Mastership returns to Bro. Cleveland again. He will find some old faces, and familiar ones, too, to welcome him in Grand Lodge again.

Our correspondent says that Bro. Goslee is the brightest Senior Deacon that ever conducted a candidate in Missouri.

Peoria Chapter No. 15.—The officers were installed by W. Bro. B. L. T. Bourland, the retiring Master, Dec. 27. An oration was delivered by the Rev. R. H. Pullman. Peoria Lodge is the oldest in Peoria county, and the largest outside of Chicago.

Illinois Lodge No. 363.—W. Bro. Charles Spalding, late Master, installed his successor and the officers, Dec. 27. Bro. Spalding alluded in appropriate terms to the prostrated condition of the lodge when elected Master, and its prosperous condition at the present time. He is now County Surveyor.

The Rural West.—We noticed this valuable agricultural and horticultural monthly, published at Quincy, by T. M. Rodgers, in our November issue. We have seen no notice of it in the paper among those of other exchanges. The price is $1 per annum. So far as we are able to judge, it surpasses any other agricultural paper with which we are acquainted.

Peru Council No. 12.—Ira B. N. Bross Master, John M. Dunn Deputy, Amasa Foot Conductor, Albert Sternfeld Recorder.

Massachusetts.—Charles C. Dame, Newburyport, G. M.; Charles W. Moore (late Grand Secretary), Boston, Deputy; W. F. Salmon, Lowell, S. G. W.; George H. Taber, Fairhaven, G. J. W.; John McClellan, Boston, Grand Treas.; Solon Thornton, Boston, Grand Secretary.

Past Grand Master Alfred E. Ames, of Minneapolis, Minn., formerly of Belvidere and Roscoe in this State, has served eighteen years as Master; also as High Priest, Commander, Grand High Priest, and Grand Commander, and two years as Master. He was the first Master of Nos. 60, 74, 75, and 102, in this State.

Marriages for 1867, in Cook county, 4,180; in Hamilton county, Ohio, 3,141.

We earnestly commend to our friends among the Odd-Fellows, The Memento, a monthly journal published at Peoria, by N. C. Nason, at $1 per year. Its get-up can not be excelled, nor its matter either.

While at Freeport, a few days ago, Breth. Munn and Currier took us through the new Presbyterian church in that city. It is the finest specimen of church architecture, and the best arranged building for church operations, that we have seen in Illinois, outside of Chicago; just such work as one might expect from a congregation embracing such men as P. G Master Turner and P. G. High Priest Munn.

The sweetest word in our language is LOVE. The greatest is GOD. Expressing shortest time, NOW.

Forging iron is no crime.

Cora Council, at Vienna.—J. F. Smith Master, Samuel Hess Deputy, James M. Hogg Conductor, Samuel Jackson Treas., F. M. Simpson Rec.; D. Ragins C. G., S. W. Taylor Steward, J. L. Morton Chaplain, H. T. Bridges C. of C., D. S. Kincey Sentinel.

The Mystic Temple, a new weekly Masonic publication, published at No. 9 Spruce St., N. Y., at $2.00 per pear, is a neat eight-page paper, with good editorials and selections, and seems to be, par excellence, the organ of the Memphis Rite.

Pennsylvania Grand Lodge.—Richard Vaux Grand Master, R. A. Lamberton Deputy, Sam'l C. Perkins S. G. W., A. R. Potter J. G. W., John Thompson, Philadelphia, Grand Secretary.

The Qui Vive is a spirited eight-page sheet published at Shurtleff College, Upper Alton, by committees of the Alpha Zeta, Sigma Phi., and Alpha Sigma Societies. Single copies 10 cents. Six months 50 cents. Address box 200. Several excellent articles appear in the January number from Profs. Howes and Castle.

North Carolina Grand Lodge.—R. W. Best, Raleigh, Grand Master; J. G. Ramsay Deputy, R. B. Vance S. G. W., T. M. Gardner J. G. W., D. W. Bain, Raleigh, Grand Secretary.

The prudent Freemason will avoid disputation with an ignorant man.

We are in receipt of a pamphlet of 52 pages describing the Public Ledger Building, on the corner of Sixth and Chestnut streets, Philadelphia. It is said to be the finest publication building in the world.

No lodge can suspend its by-laws.

The largest county in Illinois is McLean. Its population in 1865 was 39,772; the smallest is Hardin; population 3,863.

Our brethren at Neoga had a grand time at their annual installation. W. Bro. Lefever, of Mattoon, officiated as Grand Master, followed by speeches from Breth. Villiers and Clark, of Mattoon, and the W. M., Bro. Albin. Music, supper, oysters, and dancing were the concomitants.

The officers of Minooka Lodge were installed on Christmas day, by W. Bro. Pierce, Master at Lisbon. An eloquent address was delivered by Rev. G. R. Vanhorn, the Chaplain.

Vermont Grand Council.—Squire Marcy Grand Master, S. M. Southard Deputy, S. G. Heaton G. T. I., M. K. Paine G. Con., J. B. Hollenbeck, Burlington, G. Rec.

Princeton Lodge U. D.—H. F. Royce W. M., D. McDonald S. W.; R. B. Foster J. W., H. Rawson Treas., S. G. Paddock Sec., C. J. Peckham S. D., H. M. Farnible J. D., Geo. O. Ide, G. G. Gibons, Stewards, D. H. Smith Tyler, A. Scott Chapman Organist. We know Breth. Royce, McDonald, Paddock, and Ide very well. If, after due trial, any lodge can excel this new lodge in material or work, we shall be disappointed.

Comp. Ramsay writes that the chapter and commandery in Rock Island are in a flourishing condition, with plenty of material and ability to work it. Good.

The brethren at Bath have a good new hall, which was dedicated by W. Bro. Hillyer, of Havana, Dec. 27.

Desiring rest after long and acceptable servive, the brethren of Griggsville Lodge unwillingly permitted Bro. J. K. Bashforth, the late W. M., to retire, but as a token that his services were appreciated and remembered, immediately after the installation of his successor, his brethren presented him an elegant silver water pitcher. The token was worthily bestowed, and we wish our hard-working Masters were more frequently honored in this manner than is now the custom.

The Fraternity at Litchfield have lately dedicated a fine hall. Hope to get particulars for our next number.

Our friends will be gratified to learn that our former W. M., Hon. O. H. Miner, is again serving Tyrian Lodge No. 333 as Master. Our Master of last year, R. W. Bro. John M. Van Deren, has removed to Chatham, and is W. M. of the new lodge at that place.

The youngest Master that has ever presided over Oriental Lodge, and perhaps the youngest in the State, is the present incumbent. If study, labor, and zeal entitle a brother to an election, Bro. Swan certainly deserved it. Upon retiring, the lodge presented Bro. Clyde, now D. D. G. Master, with gifts and greenbacks valued at $1.000. Good to take, and worthily bestowed.

We are under obligations to Bro. David J. Miller, translator, for a copy of the annual message of the Governor of New Mexico, printed in Spanish, but, unfortunately, it is a sealed book to us. We thank the brother for his remembrance not a whit the less, for it is none of his fault that we can not read it; our mother used to make us "walk Spanish," and our father often threatened to make us "talk Spanish," but he never found time to put his threat in force, and so we can not "read Spanish."

Many thanks to M. P. Grand Master Creigh, for copies of the proceedings of the Grand Council of Pennsylvania.

Bro. John J. Cook, formerly tutor in the college in this city, and a member of No. 333, is now in college at Gettysburg, Pa., undergoing a thorough preparation for the Christian ministry. In a letter to us he says:

"It is quite respectable in the eyes of most people in this place, to be a Mason. The old home of Stevens and his co-workers now contains a Masonic lodge, numbering nearly one hundred members; their lodge-room is elegantly furnished, and those who attend are among the first men of our town."

Impostor.

PLYMOUTH, Ind., Dec. 16, 1867.

Messrs. H. G. Reynolds & Son:

FRIENDS AND BROS.:—Enclosed please find a letter which I received in answer to an inquiry which I made regarding one Capt. A. TUTTLE, who was here last August, and, proving himself to be a Mason pretty well posted, and representing himself in destitute circumstances, obtained money from our lodge (Plymouth Lodge No. 149), also of two other lodges in our vicinity, besides being the recipient of liberal donations from several kind brethren hereabouts.

Besides giving him some means, I loaned him $15 to help him on his way, which he was to return in fifteen days. The enclosed letter is the first and only knowledge I have been able to gain of him since he was here. That you can read for yourselves. In justice to the Fraternity, it is my desire that you publish him through your journal, requesting your exchanges to do likewise.

You can judge for yourselves of the nature of the case, and act accordingly.

Fraternally yours,

L. S. TYRRELL,
Plymouth Lodge No. 149.

NEW LONDON, Conn., Dec. 10, 1867.

Mr. L. S. Tyrrell:

DEAR SIR AND BRO.—I have just received a letter from you written to the P. M. at Niantic, Conn., inquiring in regard to Capt. A. TUTTLE. In reply, would say that he was expelled from the lodge some two years since, since which time he has been traveling around swindling Masons. In regard to his family, I could not say; I have understood that his wife has obtained a divorce from him. That is all I can learn in regard to him.

Yours fraternally,

HENRY A. PARMELEE,
Sec. Union Lodge No. 31.

Warning.

HALL OF ST. ALBANS LODGE No. 68, F. & A. M.,
NEWARK, N. J., Dec. 10, 1867.

W. H. G. Reynolds, Grand Secretary Grand Lodge of Illinois, F. & A. M.:

WORTHY SIR AND BROTHER:—We have been informed by a lodge in St. Louis that a member of this lodge, named M. KEETSON, had borrowed money from said lodge upon his promise to repay the amount within one month (or as soon as he reached home). Bro. KEETSON left Newark some time last summer in search of employment, and at that time his financial condition was such that he could not meet any such obligation.

Under these circumstances, we deem it our duty to warn sister lodges and brother Masons generally, so that they may not be imposed upon by any such promises on the part of Bro. KEETSON. With the Masonic charities of the brethren we have no desire to interfere, but must leave that matter to be decided by those to whom such appeals may be made. Bro. KEETSON is a French Canadian by birth, wears a full (black) beard, is less than medium stature, and by occupation a photographic artist.

THE MASONIC TROWEL.—The December number of this handsomely executed and ably conducted periodical is before us. Dr. Mackey's department opens with an article "the Symbolism of Sacred Plants," which alone is worth the subscription price of THE TROWEL; and this is but a tithe of the valuable information it contains. Every person desiring a Masonic paper should subscribe for THE TROWEL. H. G. Reynolds & Son, publishers, Springfield, Ill. Price, $1.25.—Pana Orient.

Memphis, Tenn.

The installation of the officers of five lodges in Memphis, Tenn., was held in the Baptist church, on Second street, December 27. The attendance was large, and an elegant address was delivered by Albert Pike. We thank Lieut. Hugo for this kindly remembrance, and shall be glad to hear from him frequently.

Literary Notices.

THE RIVERSIDE MAGAZINE.—This is a magazine for all classes, sizes, and ages of young people. It is a monthly of 48 pages, of the size of a majority of annuals published for holiday presents. In the matter of engravings it is unsurpassed. The frontispiece in the January number is the piper of Hamlin, surrounded by children; further along, is the representation of a rude cabin on the frontier, with an honest looking farmer and wife, four children, and a young bear dancing for his supper; this is a charming picture.

The story of the flying squirrels is naturally told, and exquisitely funny and touching; a Christmas tree for cats, is the oddest and most laughable conceit of an old maid that we have read for a long time; the fairy's rescue, with its beautiful pictures, is a pretty story, and every article is full of merit, and withal, throughout, there is a spice of innocent mirth, drollery, and wit, that makes it a pleasant visitor to every fireside. Published by Hurd & Houghton, 459 Broome St., N. Y., at $2.50 per year.

THE CHILDRENS' HOUR.—T. S. Arthur is well known as an author. He is now the editor of The Childrens' Hour, a monthly, published by T. S. Arthur & Son, at 809 and 811 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, at $1.25 per year. In size, it resembles children's books as now published, being nearly square, and contains 48 pages. The January number has 12 nice engravings, and the whole is got up for the amusement and instruction of children from the time they can first read until they are twelve or fifteen years of age. Yet, indeed, we can say truthfully that we have never seen any reading for young children that did not seem as fresh and interesting as it ever did.

THE MASONIC ECLECTIC.—The above-named periodical was started before our late civil war by Breth. Macoy and Sickels, was suspended for awhile, and soon after the war closed was resumed. It has always been a welcome visitor, and we are sorry to say that with the December number it ceased to exist; its patronage is transferred to the National Freemason.

THE RURAL WEST.—We gave a notice of this excellent agricultural and horticultural journal in a former number. It improves with each succeeding number, and far excels any similar publication that comes to our table. Published by T. M. ROGERS, Quincy, Ill., at $3.00 per annum.

THE INDIAN FREEMASON'S FRIEND.—We are indebted to the Hon. N. P. Jacobs, Consul General U. S. A., at Calcutta, India, for the October copy of the above-named valuable monthly.

Jurisprudence.

To the law and the testimony.—ISA. 8, 20.

☞ We shall endeavor to answer questions of a legal character under the laws and usages of this and adjoining States under the head of States; other matter of a judicial character will be given under the head of "General." Our comments on law are not binding as such; those who desire decisions must get them from the Grand Master; we give opinions only. Questions will be omitted, unless they are necessary to elucidate the point at issue. Decisions and opinions will be regularly numbered through the volume, and will not be repeated, but reference will be made to them.

ILLINOIS.

No. 1.—No lodge can lawfully open or call to labor in the absence of the Master and Wardens. (See section 52, Grand Lodge By-Laws.) Any lodge opened or called to labor in the absence of the Master and Wardens is, for the time being, clandestine. One of the three must be present.

No. 2.—Under the present ruling of the Grand Lodge, an E. A. or F. C. may apply for advancement at every regular communication.

No. 3.—The only penalty for non-payment of dues is indefinite suspension by a two-thirds majority, after charges, trial, and being found guilty by a two-thirds vote by ballot.

No. 4.—A man is entitled to petition for initiation at the place where he is entitled to vote, and nowhere else.

No. 5.—Lodge A. initiated T. W.; he removed into the jurisdiction of lodge B., with the recommendation of lodge A. to lodge B. for advancement; lodge B. balloted for him, and two black balls appeared. What is the remedy of T. W.?

It seems to us, from the reading of the law, that two black balls constitute a final rejection in lodge B., for the reason that he was not initiated in that lodge. Perhaps he might receive the other degrees in lodge A.—doubtful.

No 6.—A. B. has been returned as a member for years; has paid dues; says he is a member, and the older brethren say so, too, but the record shows nothing; the presumptions are all in favor of membership, and he would be so held in Grand Lodge or a court of law.

No. 7.—An objection made by any member without reasons, either to the High Priest privately, in open chapter, or in any lodge thereof, is sufficient to stay the advancement of any candidate; any High Priest who advances a candidate in the face of an objection without reasons, is liable to be deposed, and the chapter is liable to a revocation of charter.

No. 8.—The law requires that every candidate for initiation shall be asked, among the other questions immediately preceding his initiation, whether he has been anywhere previously rejected; this question may be dodged in certain cases, unless some care is taken; an objection after election to initiation is declared by the law to be a perpetual rejection unless removed, and notice of the same ought to be given, as in the case of other rejections.

No. 9.—No Mason can be suspended or expelled, lawfully, without charges, notice, and trial.

No. 10.—Lodges are absolutely forbidden to give any credit for fees, and the obligation to pay them after the degrees are conferred rests only in the conscience and honor of the candidate; and we say, both as a Mason and as a lawyer, that payment for degree fees can not be enforced in a court of justice, where the consideration can be shown, nor can the lodge discipline the brother, for the reason that the lodge first disobeyed the Grand Lodge, whose laws are paramount, in giving credit.

No. 11.—The lodge can compromise and arrange indebtedness for lodge dues in any manner that may seem best, and can collect them in a court of law. Yet, no lodge should resort to any such remedy.

No. 12.—The party preferring charges is a competent witness; if interested, the interest is to be weighed in connection with other testimony.

No. 13.—Charges may be preferred by any member.

No. 14.—The accused has a right to make his statement before the committee to take testimony, or before the lodge; the statement should be made in writing, or be carefully reduced to writing and read to the accused when made.

No. 15.—Accused parties are entitled to counsel from members of the Fraternity.

No. 16. The member preferring charges is the prosecutor in fact; but any brother may prosecute for him.

No. 17.—A petition once referred can not be withdrawn, but must be balloted on.

GENERAL.

No. 1.—Any Mason elected to office in any Masonic body, has a right to refuse installation. But no brother should refuse installation except for imperative reasons.

No. 2.—Any Masonic body can fix a period when a member may be exempt from the payment of dues.

No. 3.—No Master or Past Master can lawfully install a Master elect until he has received the secrets of the chair.

No. 4.—The loss of the left hand is a physical disqualification for the honors of Masonry.

No. 5.—If one brother prefers charges and withdraws them, another brother may prefer them again; charges should not be withdrawn without the consent of the lodge.

No. 5.—A brother elected to office has a right to decline installation, and, per consequence, has a right to decline when elected.

No. 6.—Three brethren were elected in succession to the office of W. M.; the first and second declined; the third is the Master elect, and is entitled to installation.

No. 7.—The by-laws of Masonic bodies fix the time of elections; if the night of election passes before the time of installation, the Master can fill any vacancy below that of Treasurer; if the Wardens or Treasurer decline installation, the old officers hold over; if there should still be vacancies in those offices, the Master can fill them for the time being, and the lodge can elect by virtue only of a dispensation.

Ancient Temple of the Sun at Cuzco.

The splendors of the most gorgeous palaces of the Incas, as well as that of every religious edifice throughout the country, was thrown into the shade by the magnificence of the great Temple of the Sun at Cuzco—the sacred city of the Peruvians—the neuclus of the State—the residence of the Incas—the capital of the empire. The interior of this temple, which was distinguished by the name of coricancha, or "Place of Gold," and which consisted of one large edifice surrounded by several smaller buildings, all encompassed by high walls, and was situated in the center of the capital, is described in the following glowing terms by Mr. Prescott, the American historian of the conquest of Peru, who has drawn his description from Spanish writers who had seen the "Houses of the Sun," as the Peruvian temples were called, before the cupidity of the Spaniards had quite despoiled them of their original magnificence:

"The interior of the temple was the most worthy of admiration. It was literally a mine of gold. On the western wall was emblazoned a representation of deity, consisting of a human countenance looking forth from amidst innumerable rays of light, which emanated from it in every direction, in the same manner as the sun is often personified with us. The figure was engraved on a massive plate of gold of enormous dimensions, thickly powdered with emeralds and precious stones. It was so situated in front of the great eastern portal that the rays of the morning sun fell directly upon it at its rising, lighting up the whole apartment with an effulgence which seemed more than natural, and which was reflected back from the golden ornaments with which the walls and ceilings were everywhere incrusted. Gold, in the figurative language of the people, was "the tears wept by the sun"; and every part of the interior of the temple glowed with burnished plates and studs of the precious metal. The cornices which surrounded the walls of the sanctuary were of the same costly material; and a broad belt or frieze of gold, let into the stonework, encompassed the whole exterior of the edifice. Adjoining the principal structure were several chapels of smaller dimensions. One of them was consecrated to the moon, the deity held next in reverence, as the mother of the Incas. Her effigy was delineated in the same manner as that of the sun, on a vast plate that nearly covered one side of the apartment. But this plate, as well as all the decorations of the building, was of silver, as suited to the pale, silvery light of the beautiful planet. There were three other chapels, one of which was dedicated to the host of stars, who form the bright court of the sister of the sun; another was dedicated to his dread ministers of vengeance, the thunder and lightning; and the third to the rainbow, whose many-colored arch spanned the walls of the edifice with hues almost as radiant as its own. There were, besides, several other buildings or insulated apartments for the accommodation of numerous priests who officiated in the service of the temple. All the plate, the ornaments, the utensils of every description appropriated to the uses of religion, were gold and silver. Twelve immense vases of the latter metal stood on the floor of the great saloon filled with grain of the Indian corn; the censers for the perfumes, the ewers which held the water for sacrifice, the pipes which conducted it through subterraneous channels into the buildings, the reservoir that received it, even the agricultural implements used in the gardens of the temple, were all of the same rich materials. The gardens, like those described belonging to the royal palaces, sparkled with gold and silver and various imitations of the vegetable kingdom. Animals also were to be found there—among which the llama with its golden fleece was most conspicuous—executed in the same style, and with a degree of skill which in this instance probably did not surpass the excellence of the material."

Caste Among the Hindoos.

The Hindoo shastrus bears the most evident proofs that the founders of the system of castes must have been men who designed to deify themselves. This institution has been, and ever will be, one of the greatest scourges which can afflict those who are dooomed to suffer under it. It has no regard to merit or demerit. It consigns nine-tenths of the people, even before birth, to a state of mental and bodily degradation in which they are forever shut out from all the liberties, honors, or even religion of the country. But not only is the system of caste repugnant to every principle of justice and policy, but to every feeling of benevolence and humanity. The social circle excludes every person, except of the same caste. It arms one class of men against another; it gives rise to the most insufferable ostentation and pride on the one hand, and to the most abject state of apathy and degradation on the other. It is a sufficient excuse for not giving an act of benevolence toward another, that he is not of the same caste; nay, a man dying with thirst will not accept of a cooling draught of water from the hand or cup of a person of lower caste. In short, the caste murders all feelings of benevolence or pity, and shuts up the heart of man against his neighbor, in a manner unknown even among savage tribes.

The loss of caste is the most terrible calamity a Hindoo can suffer. It is worse than death. Instances have frequently happened where persons have pined away and died on this account. Still, the crime for which a person forfeits his caste is often of the most trivial kind, or perhaps an unavoidable, or even a benevolent act. Perhaps the person has been found eating with a virtuous neighbor of a lower caste, or he has visited other countries on business, and has been compelled to starve or eat food not cooked by persons of his own caste. Or perhaps he has associated with a person of low caste, so far as to help him out of distress. For these, or such like reasons, the caste proscribes from his father's house, and if his mother consents to talk with him, it must be by stealth, at a distance from the place which was once his home, into which he must never enter.

Not only is a person who has lost his caste deprived of his property, and renounced by his friends, but he is excluded from all the services and comforts of religion, and from all its supposed benefits, at and after death, and is of course considered as certainly miserable in a future state. Numbers of such outcasts abandon their homes, and wander about till death.

"That's How!"

After a great snow-storm, a little fellow began to shovel a path through a large snow-bank before his grandmother's door. He had nothing but a small shovel to work with.

"How do you expect to get through that drift?" asked a man passing along.

"By keeping at it," said the boy, cheerfully; "that's how!"

That is the secret of mastering almost every difficulty under the sun. If a hard task is before you, stick to it. Do not keep thinking how large or how hard it is; but go at it, and little by little it will grow smaller and smaller until it is done.

If a hard lesson is to be learned, do not spend a moment in fretting; do not lose a breath in saying, "I can't," or "I do not see how;" but go at it, and keep at it. Study. That is the only way to conquer it.

If a fault is to be cured, or a bad habit broken up, it can not be done by merely being sorry, or only trying a little. You must keep fighting it, and not give up fighting until it is got rid of.

If you have entered your Master's service, and are trying to be good and to do good, you will sometimes find hills of difficulty in the way. Never forget "that's how!"

The Raven and the Ring.

BY REV. J. C. LONG.

In a little Polish hamlet, near Warsaw's steeples tall,
In a cottage very humble, but neat as it was small,
Once there dwelt an honest peasant with wife and children five,
Whom with daily toil and labor he scarce could keep alive.

'Twas the middle of the winter, his quarter's rent was due;
And the landlord, he was pressing—what could poor Dorby do?
What? He summoned all his courage, and with an honest face
Right to the landlord went he and told him all his case.

"Little care I," said the landlord, "for creatures such as you.
If you can not pay my rent-bill the very day 'tis due,
Out from my house, you catiff, to-morrow you shall go."
Said Dorby, "My wife and children will perish in the snow."

But the man so cruel-hearted had from him turned away,
Scorning both his humble tenant and what he had to say.
Dorby, then, though stricken sorely, and sad as sad could be,
Said, "May God to thee be kinder than thou hast been to me."

Round the poor man's simple table, that cold and cheerless night,
Wife and children gathered sadly in the dim taper's light,
While the father took the Bible which he before him laid,
Read the holy evening lesson, and then he knelt and prayed.

Oh, strong were the words of pleading he sent amid his tears,
High up to the Throne of Mercy to greet the Father's ears.
Rising from his lowly posture his faith was stronger grown,
Said he, "Mary, I am certain that God will hear his own."

While they all sat musing deeply, and listening to the rain,
Lo! a rapping and a tapping were at the window pane.
"Dorby," said the woman softly, "your faith is all in vain;
Listen, listen! Don't you hear it? There's hail among the rain."

Thinking, thinking of her children out in the rain and hail,
There sat the wretched mother with tearful face and pale;
And deep in her heart she cursed him, the mean, unfeeling man!—
And a rapping and a tapping were at the window pane.

"Philip, Philip," said the father, "quick to the casement go,
And see what there is that's rapping there at the window so."
Philip did his father's bidding, and on the window-sill
Sat a friendly raven, tapping alike with wing and bill.

"Come in," said the laughing Philip, and op'd the casement wide,
And the raven, thus invited, did through the window glide.
Right to Dorby went he boldly, and, perched upon his knee,
Looked round upon the children—a sly old bird was he!

And the children all were laughing—their grief he had beguiled—
But the raven grimly sat he, nor either winked or smiled,
Dorby's sober eyes, too, twinkled to see the solemn thing;
But the good wife murmured sadly, "Some evil he doth bring."

"Wife, there's nothing strange about it; his story soon is told;
Seeks he here with us a shelter from the bitter night and cold.
And I'm glad that we are able this night to keep him warm,
For we may not have to-morrow a shelter from the storm."

Dorby's voice was rather husky as this he gently said,
And the hand was quite unsteady that stroked the raven's head.
Then, "The Lord be praised," said Dorby, "see what the bird has brought!"
From the raven's beak he'd taken a ring with diamonds wrought.

"Take it quickly said the woman, and sell it in the town;
'Twill pay the quarter's rent bill, and—buy for me a gown!"
Sternest words of condemnation now from the peasant fell:
"Shame upon you, thoughtless woman! It is not mine to sell."

Through the darkness and the sleeting now went the honest man;
And down one street quickly walked he, and down one street he ran,
Till at last he reached the pastor's, and told him of the ring.
'Twas the King's most costly jewel, and Stanislaus was King.

Happy Dorby! happy Mary! and happy children five!
Whom with daily toil and labor he scarce could keep alive!
Now you have a little cottage as neat as it is small,
With no pressing quarter's rent bill—you pay no rent at all.

E'en the poor distrustful mother now has a little faith.
And right often to her children this little speech she saith:
"Children, always seek the owner whene'er you find a ring,
For the Lord is up in heaven, and Stanislaus is King."

VERY MUCH IN LOVE;

Or, A Slight Mistake.

BY MISS C. W. BARBER.

"Are you in love? I'll prove it by fifty things. Oh, there is no use in denying it, Cot—none in the world!"

"No use in denying what, Ophelia?—for once I am at fault in understanding you."

"Now Cotton Mather Royalstone, that is a—a—well, if it is not a fib, it is at least an equivocation. I mean there is no use in denying that you are in love—deeply, inextricably, mortally, dreadfully in love. I've been aware of it—let me see—ever since that first party at Mrs. Swan's. Anybody with two eyes in their head ought to have made the same discovery. You are mortally in love with Rosalie Anderson." And the chatterbox of a speaker, viz., Ophelia Stewartson, held her pretty finger up, and shook it at her cousin meaningly, and saucily, too.

If a blush is any acknowledgment of a fact, then Cotton Mather Royalstone was in love, for the tell-tale blood mounted even into his fine temples, and he cast his eyes down and played with his watch-guard almost as modestly as a girl might have done. Any body would have joined Ophelia Stewartson, and declared our hero to have been in love at that very moment.

"But, Cousin Cot," pursued the girl in that same teasing tone, "Rosa has gone away on a visit to Niagara. She won't be back these three weeks; but that's no reason why you should shoot, hang, or drown yourself—no reason in the world. Act like a sensible fellow, and for that short space of time resolve at least to forget her. There is no use in weeping one's self to death over what can not be helped. Stay here, and we'll do our best to entertain you. I'll sing with you, fish with you, walk with you, read to you, and, if need be, fight for you. You won't find a more self-denying friend anywhere than I'll prove myself to be if you'll only stay here and be sensible and well behaved, as a young man ought to be during the absence of his lady-love. I'll even write to Rosa, and beg her for your sake not to stay too long. Now ain't I exceedingly obliging?" and the little mad-cap took her dress in both hands and waltzed across the room, and half-way across the garden, before her grave cousin, with that grave, reverend name, Cotton Mather Royalstone, could reply or stop her. At length he caught up with her and said, "I'll stay and be sensible, Phele—stay and be entertained famously, if you'll promise me one thing. Don't write to Rosa; I don't want to be the means of curtailing her enjoyment. Instead of writing to her, you may talk to me about her; that will do just as well."

"Agreed," said the girl; "and now bear it in mind, dear Cot, I shall exert myself continually to be vastly entertaining. You, on your part, are not to be love-sick in the least. You are to be grave, sober, unexacting, and most easily pleased; you are not to mention 'Rosalie' or 'waterfall,' or any other obnoxious subject during the whole time, although I may now and then speak upon the forbidden theme myself."

"Hold! hold!" cried Cotton, "turn about is fair play, I've heard that doctrine preached from my childhood. I have no idea of pledging my word that I will not talk upon any subject, while your tongue is at liberty to rattle away at will. A pretty restriction you would place me under, truly. No, no, Miss Ophelia, I demur seriously," and the young man drew a handkerchief from his pocket and wiped his face.

"But I shall talk sensibly, you know—give you good advice, &c. Indeed I expect I shall be deeply and engrossingly entertaining, when I touch upon that subject; while you, on the contrary! Oh, who has not heard of the ravings of a love-sick soul. Who has not, indeed."

The young man laughed a hearty laugh. "Well, cousin Phele," he said, "you are determined, I see plainly, to have things all your own way. My best policy will be to yield as gracefully as I can; but don't be too unmerciful. If you are, I shall, like the lord of the forest, break away from all constraint, and afterwards prove more untameable than ever."

"Oh! I'll be very discreet, indeed; never fear me," and the girl began her fairy-like dance again upon the greensward—a dance which seemed an appropriate expression of her young and happy heart.

Ophelia Stewartson was one of those fresh, laughing, Hebe-like creatures whom it does one good to look upon. Carefully nurtured from her earliest infancy, she knew little of grief or care. Life looked to her a sunny path strewed with flowers. She coquetted and laughed until the dimples seemed playing bo-peep in her full, rosy cheeks. She had a word for everybody and everything—a word which sounded marvelously like the sincere expression of her heart, but which, strange to say, never gave offense to anybody, but always caused a laugh.

Cotton Mather Royalstone was—hem! Well, they said they were cousins, and I, not being very well versed in their genealogy, am not prepared to disprove it. Maybe they were cousins —cousins somewhere in the sixteenth degree. One thing was very apparent—there was great affinity between the two, whether of heart or blood, it matters not. Cotton was just from college, and for the present was safely domiciled in the neighborhood where Ophelia resided. He generally escorted her to parties, and it was at one of these re-unions that Ophelia professed to make the astounding discovery, that Cotton was in love—dreadfully in love.

For days afterwards, Ophelia, true to her promise, did her best to entertain him, but her sly railery was unceasing, and perhaps nobody but Cotton Mather Royalstone could patiently have endured it. But endure it he did—endured it with very good grace; and, gentle reader, was this not another proof positive that he was distressingly "in love?"

The weeks of Rosalie's absence had nearly glided away; she was expected home in a few days, but nevertheless Ophelia came in one day and stood at her cousin's side, with a very serious, condoling air upon her sober face. "Oh, cousin Cot," she said, "I've just heard something so dreadful! I'm sure you'll cry when I tell you about it. Poor fellow! you have my sympathies—I give them to you beforehand; it is really too bad."

"What is too bad?" said the young man wonderingly. "I can not imagine what has happened. Nobody's dead, I hope."

"Oh no! but old Mr. Anderson—the strange old mortal—he's thrown cold water over all your matrimonial prospects, for sure."

"Why, what has he done?" asked Cotton, in a tone of surprise.

"Why, he ain't going to let you marry Rosalia; he's going to object—prove obstinate, as many an incorrigible papa has done before him. I'm afraid you'll have to make a runaway match of it yet."

To Ophelia's surprise, the grave young man laughed a short laugh over this piece of information, and evinced no very great concern. But he kept on questioning her, nevertheless.

"It isn't possible that the old fellow objects to a clever young chap like myself, is it, cousin Phele? What does he say against me?"

"Oh! he doesn't like you at all, Cot; he never will consent to your marrying her, in the world."

The young man bit his lips and said more gravely, while he looked into his pretty cousin's upturned face: "He'll wait until I ask him, I suppose, before he refuses me his daughter's hand."

"Ask him! why it was all settled that you were to ask him as soon as he got home, you know."

"No, I didn't know it, Phele—never dreamed of it."

"Why, cousin Cot!"

The young man still looked gravely down into the upturned face, and there was a truthful expression in his eyes that surprised her.

"Why, cousin Cot," she began again, "how did you expect to get the girl without asking for her; you hav'n't intended running away with her from the first, have you?"

"No, I don't intend now to run away with her."

"But you'll never get her without. You are a Freemason, and old Mr. Anderson is hostile towards the whole fraternity. He declares that it is a secret organization for political purposes, and that its tendency is the destruction of our government; he would as quickly let his daughter marry a traitor as a Freemason, he says."

"Ah!" said the young man, respondingly.

"And now, cousin Cot, if you don't run away with her, how are you going to marry?"

"I'm sure I don't know," he said, stroking his chin thoughtfully; "I look to you to enlighten me upon that point."

"Well, you'll have to run away. I see no other chance for you."

"With who, Phele?"

"Why, how provoking! With her you have been so madly in love with all along. Won't you do it, cousin Cot?"

"Yes, to be sure I will—run with her to the ends of the earth, if need be."

"I knew it! I knew it!" cried the girl, bringing her small white hands together. "I knew it, although you just now said you wasn't going to marry Rosalie under any such circumstances. A fig for circumstances when any body is dreadfully in love."

"Dreadfully in love," echoed Cotton.

"Well, it's all arranged. I'm to go along, too. I always thought that it would be fine fun to be in a run-away scrape."

"Certainly, you are to be there, Phele. I couldn't get married if you were not present," and Cotton Mather stooped over and took her hand.

"Yes, I am to be bridesmaid. But when are you going to see Rosalie about all this?"

"Never!" said the young man emphatically.

"Never, cousin Cot! How on earth can you get married without letting Rosalie know it? I am curious to know."

"Very easily, I'm thinking. It's little matter to me whether she knows about it or not."

"Well, if she don't know about it, who must, then?" said the girl, beginning, for the first time, to feel that she had rattled on until she had perhaps placed herself in an awkward position. "Who is to know about your wedding, cousin Cot?"

"You—you only, cousin Phele. If you will only enter into my plans, we can have a quiet home wedding in spite of old Mr. Anderson's ill will to the Freemasons. Perhaps, after all, he will let his daughter attend as a guest. You must be the bride instead of the bridesmaid, cousin Phele. That will obviate all difficulties. That is the only important change I care to suggest in your arrangements."

The rich crimson blood rushed all over the girl's face and neck, and she drew her hand away from his hastily, and held it to her eyes.

"Me! me the bride," she murmured, "and you all along so dreadfully in love!"

Cotton laughed one of his peculiar laughs, and took her hand again.

"Yes," he said, "all along dreadfully in love, but never with Rosalie Anderson. That was your own supposition, remember. Say, cousin Ophelia, shall we have a wedding in spite of old Mr. Anderson's hatred to the Freemasons?"

The blushing creature thought seriously upon the subject for awhile, and then said, archly, "It never will do to let the enemies of Freemasonry break up weddings in any such a way. If you can't get Rosalie Anderson, why I suspect I shall be obliged to marry you myself. I had never thought of that way of getting over the difficulty. To be sure a home wedding will look much more respectable than a runaway match, and moreover, grandmother says that runaways never turn out well."

The young man drew her to him and said: "Old Mr. Anderson may whistle his spite to the wind. We'll have a wedding of our own, Phelia dear, and leave the Andersons entirely out. It was a happy thought to get over the difficulty thus. I only ask that the wedding may be hastened, for you know I have long been dreadfully in love."

The wedding was hastened. Before Rosalie returned from the Falls, Ophelia was Mrs. Royalstone.—National Freemason.

True History of Jack Horner.

Who has not heard of this wonderful individual? who does not remember of being told in his childhood about Jack Horner? and who has not envied his good fortune when he—

Sat in a corner eating a Christmas pie.
Put in his thumb
And pulled out a plum,
And said, "What a good boy am I."

Have the children ever inquired who Jack Horner was? Here is the tradition: When Henry VIII suppressed the monasteries, and drove the poor old monks from their nests, the title deeds to the Abbey of Mells—including the sumptious grange built by Abbot Bellwood—were demanded by the commissioners. The Abbot of Glastonbury determined that he would send them to London, and as the documents were very valuable, and the roads infested with thieves, it was difficult to get them to the metropolis with safety. To accomplish this end, however, he devised the following plan: he ordered a pie to be made—as fine as ever smoked on a refectory table; inside he put the documents—the finest filling a pie ever had since pies were first made. He entrusted this dainty to a lad named Horner to carry up to London, to deliver safely into the hands for whom it was intended. But the journey was long and the day was cold, and the boy was hungry, and the pie was tempting, and the chance of detection was small. So the boy broke off a piece of the pie, and beheld the parchment; he pulled it forth innocently enough, wondering how it could have reached there—tied up the pastry, and arrived in town. The parcel was delivered, but the title-deeds of Mells Abbey were missing; Jack had them in his pocket. These were the juiciest plums of the pie. Great was the rage of the commissioners, heavy the vengeance they dealt out to the monks. Jack kept his secret, and when peaceable times were restored, claimed the estates and received them. Whether Mr. Horner deserves the title of "good boy," bestowed on him by the nursery lament, is more than doubtful; however, that's the story.

Evening Pastimes.

EARTH, AIR, FIRE, AND WATER.

For this game the players sit round, and one stands in the midst of them, holding a handkerchief twisted into a ball.

She counts one, two, three, and then throws her handkerchief-ball into the lap of any one she chooses, crying at the same time, "Earth," "Air," "Fire," or "Water," as she pleases. If she cries, "Earth," the little girl into whose lap the ball falls must reply instantly by naming some animal living on the earth; if the word was "Water," some fish must be named; if "Fire," something that can exist in fire; if "Air," some bird or insect. If she hesitates so long as to allow the ball-thrower to count three, she pays a forfeit. Example:

Edith stands in the midst of a merry group with her handkerchief ready.

EDITH.—One, two, three—EARTH.

ADA (into whose lap the ball falls).—A lion.

Edith takes back the ball and pauses—one, two, three—then throws it at Jessy, crying "FIRE."

Poor JESSY, very much startled, says, hurriedly, "Coals."

EDITH laughs, and replies, "Oh, Jessy, coals are not animals! Pay a forfeit."

ADA.—But, Edith, I think really Jessy is right. The game says, "anything that exists in the fire;" no animal can.

EDITH.—No, it can not; but coals get burned up. I think, too, we might say ashes, a stuff which fire does not consume, or a salamander, for "fire."

MARY.—I don't know what a salamander is.

ADA.—Only a make-believe creature, little Mary; a sort of spirit or fairy which was said to live in fire.

EDITH.—Well I will let Jessy off her forfeit, as it is so difficult. Now, prepare; I am going to throw the ball again. One, two, three—AIR.

MARY (catching it).—An eagle.

EDITH.—Very well; give me back the ball. Now, one, two, three—WATER.

ADA (hurriedly).—Fish!

EDITH.—No, that will not do; you must name some fish.

ADA.—Salmon.

Thus the game goes on. Sometimes a little player has to pay a forfeit for hesitation and slowness in answering; sometimes for naming a wrong creature as living in the element named. It is by no means easy to mention a resident in earth, air, fire, or water the moment you receive the ball.—Children,s Hour.

DECKER & CO.'S

IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

PIANO FORTES!

Warerooms: No. 2 Union Square, corner Fourteenth St. and Fourth avenue,

NEW YORK.

These Instruments are celebrated throughout the country, and are distinguished for

THEIR SINGING QUALITY,
VOLUME and PURITY OF TONE,
SYMPATHETIC, ELASTIC, EVEN TOUCH,
DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION,
and BEAUTY OF FINISH.

Decker & Company's Pianos have always received the First Premiums, whenever and wherever they have competed with the most celebrated makers in this country.

OUR IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

Is an invention beautiful in its simplicity and wonderful in its practical effects. It is the most compact Agraffe ever invented, and its influence upon the tone is to render it mellower, rounder, and more clearly brilliant, while it utterly overcomes that sharp, metalic quality which disfigures the instruments of all other makers.

WHY WE EXCEL.

While other Pianos are rarely in tune,

THE DECKER & CO.'S PIANOS invariably retain their Pitch and Tone.

While other Pianos are made of poor or unseasoned materials,

THE DECKER PIANOS combine the Best Materials, Skillful Workmanship, and Scientific Construction.

While other Pianos are deficient in the great requisites of a good touch,

THE DECKER & CO. PIANOS have a flexibility under skillful manipulation, which not only adapts them to the style of every performer, but which causes the player to feel en rapport with the Instrument, and affords his taste and fancy free expression.

IT IS A FACT—That philosophy of construction is not less important than fitness of material.

IT IS A FACT—That various minute, unobserved appliances, adaptations, and improvements have an influence in the tone, durability and manipulative character of a Piano, in no degree inferior to the more ostensible modifications.

IT IS A FACT—Therefore, that science, as well as experience; artistic discrimination, as well as methodic care; capital, as well as conscientiousness, are requisite in the production of a GOOD PIANO-FORTE. In our

is exhibited the result of an uninterrupted, persevering regard for these facts and principles; and purchasers who have so often spoken of the uniformity of excellence in our Instruments will be led to understand how this superiority and uniformity has been attained—a result which is apparent to even ordinary judges, in the volume and richness of tone, the sustained and human character of their singing quality, while connoiseurs and critics fully indorse all that we have adverted to.

The unanimous opinion of the best artists and the most reliable critics is, that

THE DECKER & COMPANY'S

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte is the only Square Piano-Forte, which, in Voluminous Sonority, and Positive Solidity of Tone,

Can stand comparison with the

BEST GRAND PIANO-FORTES MADE.

THE SYMBOLISM OF SACRED PLANTS.

As Developed in Freemasonry and the Kindred Institutions of the Ancient World.

BY ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D.

XIX.

THE HOMA PLANT.

We must now abandon, for a time, the classic fields of Greece and Rome, the philosophical mythology of the old Pelasgians, and the abstruse symbolism of the still older Egyptians, to pass over into other and hitherto, by us, untrodden ground—the mystical religions of the Indians of Asia. Since we have seen, in our preceding researches, that the doctrine of sacred plants, as symbolic of great truths, and more especially of that one great truth, the immortality of the soul, prevailed among the pagans of Europe and Africa, and was reverentially received on the banks of the Nile, the Ilissus, and the Tiber, we would naturally expect that the same doctrine and the same development of symbolism would be found among those primeval peoples who, living around the mountains of the Caucasian range, are admitted, by all ethnologists, to have constituted the cradle of the human race, and from whom, therefore, proceeded the rudiments of all science, learning, and religion that have since been found among their descendants, and which by slow and gradual, but well attested migrations, were carried into Egypt, into Greece, and into Italy.

The religion of Zoroaster, which was practiced by the ancient Iranians, and is still the faith of the modern Guebres of Persia and the Parsees of India, is the one whose sacred plant, the homa, is now to engage our attention. Whatever may be the disputes of the learned as to the precise period at which we are to date the foundation of the Zoroastric religion—on which point historians have very widely differed–there is no doubt now entertained of its very great age; for it can be conclusively proved that it existed in full vigor more than twenty-five centuries ago, and was flourishing in the maturity of its power and influence during the times of the Hebrew prophets Ezekiel, Jeremiah, and Daniel.

The important and distinctive tenets of this faith were, that there was, in the beginning, an Infinite First Principle—Zeruana Akerana—from whom were two emanations—Ormuzd and Ahriman. Ormuzd was the principle of good—the source of all that is perfect, intelligent, and beneficent in creation; Ahriman was the principle of evil—the source of misery, wrong, and death. The one was the principle of light, the other, the principle of darkness; for, as the ancient Persians said, "Light is the body of Ormuzd; darkness is the body of Ahriman." There was, of course, a constant antagonism between these principles. Ormuzd had created men perfect and immortal, but by the machinations of Ahriman they had become evil-minded and subject to death. A contest is therefore continually going on between these two principles, or divine emanations, for the government of the world, which Ormuzd created resplendent and happy, but which Ahriman sought to fill with vice, discord, misery, and death. In time, Ormuzd will gain the victory, and man will be restored to his original state of perfectibility and immortality.

Of this ancient religion, the doctrine of a resurrection formed an important part, and this doctrine was intimately connected with the symbolism of a sacred plant, which shall be the subject of our present investigations.

The homa plant, described as a smooth, twining plant, is a species of the Asclepiadiæ, all of which family of plants furnish, on being bruised, a white, milky juice. It is said to be the Asclepias acida of Linnæus, or the Cynanchum vimiriale of De Caudolle. Under the name of the soma, or "moon plant" (for in the Sanskrit language soma signifies the moon), it was, as will hereafter be seen, a sacred plant of the Brahmans, and was, in all probability, communicated by them to the Aryans, or ancient Persians.

Ormuzd, the good principle of the Zoroastric religion, who was also called Honover—that is to say, the living Word, or Logos—was sometimes configured under the form of the homa tree. The homa was, therefore, to the ancient Persian, a god representing the creative and vivifying spirit of nature. In the "Zend-avesta," which is the title of the book containing the sacred scriptures of the sect of Zoroaster, and in the commentaries on this work, such as the "Bundehesch" and the "Dabistan," we find the legends which tell us that Homa, there spoken of as a god and identified with the Asclepias plant, appeared in a divine revelation to Zoroaster as the most perfect of beings with a luminous body, and declared himself to be the one who keeps death at a distance. To Homa, the noblest gifts of life were ascribed; for from that divine personification Zoroaster is said to have asked and received six gifts, namely—immortality, firmness, health, long life, victory over his enemies, and protection from their unseen attacks. Long before the time of Zoroaster, his ancestors had worshiped this deified plant, and through its favoring influence had been enabled to found a race which were the extirpators of the wicked brood of Ahriman. Hence, the sacred book of the Pehlivi, entitled the "Bundehesch," says that "Homa gives not only health, but generative vigor also, and imparts life in the resurrection."

Thus, the Parsee praised the clouds and the rain, which helped the growth of homa, and the soil on the mountain summit from which it sprang. When Zoroaster was asked by Ahriman with what weapon he expected to destroy him (Ahriman) and his creatures, the prophet replied (so says the Vendidad, one of the Zoroastric scriptures), "the mortar, the vessel, homa, and the word which Ormuzd spake—these are my weapons." By the mortar he meant that in which the homa plant was bruised or pounded, and by the vessel, that which received its juice.

It thus appears that the homa tree was consecrated to Ormuzd, who was the giver of life. Through it he was to secure to the virtuous the blessing of a resurrection. In the "Bundehesch," it is thus described: "Near these trees is the life-giving white homa, which grows near the fountain Ardouissour. Whoever drinks of its juice will never die. The homa, which drives away death, will at the day of resurrection give life to the dead."

"Homa," says the "Zend-avesta," the sacred book of the Parsees, "is great and victorious and beautiful—the fountain of health and plenty—the king who treads evil under foot, and annihilates the Daroudj."

Plutarch speak[illegible] plant which he says was called "Omo[illegible]," and he appears to have been acquainted with its Persian character, and with the sacrificial use made of it by that people.

The "homa sacrifice," to which allusion has just been made, had, says Dollinger, "the plenary signification of a sacrament and sacrifice united, consisting of flesh meat, with bread and fruit, which was first blessed and then eaten."

This sacrifice, the most sacred of the religious ceremonies of the ancient Persians, consisted principally in drinking the expressed juice of the homa plant. This juice was obtained by pounding the fibres of the tree in a mortar, the operation being accompanied with religious ceremonies. It was then mixed with whey and wheat, and brought into a state of fermentation, in consequence of which it became imbued with narcotic and intoxicating effects. Libations of it were then poured upon the ground, goblets were filled with it, and it was drank by the sacrificers. The intoxication that resulted from its use, like that produced by opium or the hasheesh, was of an ecstatic nature, and made a powerful impression on the imagination of the drinker. The visions seen by him while in this state of unnatural ecstasy were like those of the clairvoyant somnambulists of modern mesmerism, and were considered by the Persians as revelations and confirmations of their religious faith; and hence the homa plant itself, and its sacred sap, became a god to the Zoroastric worshiper.

The effects of their homa juice, says Dollinger, were to the Parsees the orgiastic side of his religion, and a never failing portion of it whenever a deification of the powers of nature had place. The homa drink was the sacrament of their religion; nay, more, it was the medium through which the deity manifested itself, and much of the "Zend-avesta" has doubtless flowed originally from this source. But the divine power of the homa sacrifice is best expressed in that part of the Zoroastric scriptures which tells us that, in the process of time, when Ormuzd shall have conquered Ahriman and his demons, and brought men back to their true allegiance to the principle of light and good, a Saviour, called Sosioch, shall be created, who will be the judge of the world and the conqueror of death, and who will give to all the rescued to drink of the white juice of the homa plant, whereby they will become immortal. The homa plant was therefore, among the ancient worshipers of Zoroaster, the symbol of immortality.

The homa of the Persians was called by the Brahmans of India the Soma, or moon plant. In India it grew upon the Aravalli hills, to the north of the city of Delhi, and, being collected by moonlight, was carried home for future use in carts which were drawn by rams. When the great soma festival was to be celebrated, and this appears to be identical with the homa sacrifices of the Parsees, the stalks were bruised between stones, and the whole placed in a strainer of goat's hair, when the mass was expressed through the cloth by the fingers of a priest ornamented with rings of flattened gold. The juice was afterwards mixed with barley and ghee, or clarified butter, and allowed to undergo the process of fermentation. A portion was then drawn off for the gods, another portion for the priests, and the residue was given to the people.

[illegible] that the [illegible] Indra, the Jupiter of the Brahmanical religion, was peculiarly delighted with this drink, and hence he is thus addressed in one of the sacred hymns which were accustomed to be sung on the occasion of the soma festival:

> "Rejoice, Indra! open thy mouth; set wide thy throat; be pleased with our oblations. Drinker of the soma juice! wielder of the thunderbolt! bestow upon us an abundance of cows with projecting jaws.
> "Thy swift horses, Indra! have uttered a loud sound announcing rain; the level earth anxiously expects its fall. The mighty Indra has shattered the guileful Vitra, reposing in the cloud. Heaven and earth shook, alarmed at the thunderbolt of the rain compeller. Drinking the soma juice, Indra baffled the devices of the guileful demon.
> "Drink, hero, Indra! drink the soma! Indra, thou hero, exalted in the solemn rites, quaff the soma juice, and repeatedly shaking it from thy beard, repair to the drinking of the libation poured forth to thee."

De Caudolle, the distinguished botanist, has described the physical qualities of this celebrated sap, which he says "is sharp and acrid, and would be poisonous if taken in large quantities; in many cases the nerves are affected by it, as if by a narcotic; but it is benumbing in its influence, as it hinders the activity of the nerves without producing sleep."

Windischman, a learned German who wrote a very profound work on the history of the progress of philosophy (Die Philosophie im Fortgang der Weltgeshichte) has confirmed all that has been said of this sacred plant by declaring that "the use of the soma was looked upon, in early ages, as a holy action, and a sacrament by which the union with Brahma was effected;" and he cites one passage, out of many similar ones, in the India writings, which says: "Paraschapti himself drinks this milk, the essence of all nourishment and knowledge, the milk of immortality."

From all of which we learn that the homa of the Parsees, or the soma of the Brahmans, for they were identical plants—the asclepias of the moderns—was, in some mysterious and to us now unintelligible way, confounded with the god Homa, whose name it has assumed, or who was himself a personification of the plant; by which we are reminded, among other classic legends, especially of that of Daphne, where the nymph assumes the nature and form of the laurel tree, and the tree usurps the name of the nymph, the plant thus becoming sacred and consecrated to Apollo.

In the Zoroastric mythical doctrine, as the god Homa was to bestow eternal life upon his worshipers under his other appellation of Ormuzd, so the plant homa became the medium through which that eternal life was to be secured when its consecrated sap was quaffed in the sacrifice.

And thus we find ourselves, in conclusion, returning to that old and so often repeated symbolism of sacred plants, where, without one exception, through the acacia, the laurel, the palm, the myrtle, and many others, the lesson of a resurrection to eternal life is taught. Like all of these, the homa plant of the ancient Persians, or its synonym, the soma of the ancient Indians, became the acknowleged, although somewhat abstruse, symbol of immortality.

Henry Cornelius Agrippa.

A Biographical Sketch.

BY ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D.

From the tenth century upward to the sixteenth, certain men of celebrity, or at least of great notoriety, have been referred to by Masonic historians as being in some way either founders, or modifiers or makers, of systems in the Institution of Freemasonry. Cornelius Agrippa, known to the learned as a great philosopher, to the unlearned as a great magician, has not failed to be claimed as a founder of our Order, or, as some suppose, of other secret associations which were the incunabula of Freemasonry. It is not intended here to go into the historical argument on this subject, but the very fact that the claim exists, entitles his biography to a legitimate place in any Masonic journal. To give him this place, it is sufficient for us to know that no history of Freemasonry could be fully and completely written where the name of Henry Cornelius Agrippa was altogether passed over in silence. A brief sketch, therefore, of his very eventful life, has been here presented to the readers of THE TROWEL. It will be followed from time to time by similar sketches of what may be called other apostles of Freemasonry.

Henry Cornelius Agrippa, distinguished as one of the greatest of occult philosophers, was born in the city of Cologne, on the 14th September, 1486. He was descended from a noble family, and was remarkable for his varied talents and extensive genius. In early youth, he acted as the Secretary of the Emperor Maximilian, and subsequently served in the army of the same monarch in Italy, where he won the honor of knighthood for his gallant conduct in the field. He also devoted himself to the study of law and physic, and received from the university the degree of doctorate in each of these faculties. Of his literary attainments, he gives an ample description in one of his letters, in which he says: "I am tolerably well skilled in eight languages, and so completely a master of six that I not only understand and speak them, but can even make an eloquent oration or dictate and translate in them. I have also a pretty extensive knowledge in some abstruse studies, and a general acquaintance with the whole circle of sciences." There is some vanity in all this, but it must be confessed that there was much learning to excuse the infirmity.

The temper of Agrippa was variable and irascible, and his disposition bold and independent. Hence his pen was continually giving offense, and he was repeatedly engaged in difficulties with his contemporaries, and more especially with the priests, who persecuted him with an unrelenting vigor. He traveled much, and visited France, Spain, Italy, and England, sometimes in public civil employments, and sometimes in the profession of arms; for he was almost as much distinguished for his gallantry as a soldier as he was for his learning as a philosopher.

In the year 1509 he delivered lectures on Reuchlin's treatise, "De Verbo Mirifico," which involved him in a controversy with the Franciscans, and wrote a work "On the Excellency of Women," which also gave offense to the ecclesiastics, in consequence of which he was obliged to pass over into England, where he wrote a "Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul."

He afterwards returned to Cologne, where he delivered lectures on divinity. In the year 1515 we find him reading lectures on "Mercurius Trismegistus," but his ill fortune followed him, and he soon left that city, his departure being rather like a flight than an orderly retreat. In 1518 he was at the city of Metz, where he was for some time employed as a syndic and counselor, but having attempted, in his love to truth, to refute a popular notion that St. Anne had three husbands, and having dared to defend a poor old woman who had been accused of witchcraft, his old enemies, the monks, once more renewed their ill offices, and he was compelled to leave the city of Metz, bequeathing to it, as his revenge, the character of being "the step-mother of all good learning and virtue"—omnium bonarum literarum virtutumque noverca. Thence he retired to Cologne in 1520, and to Geneva in 1521, where poverty seems to have pressed hardly upon him.

In the year 1524 he was at Lyons, in France, where Francis I. bestowed a pension upon him and appointed him physician to the King's mother, an office which, however, he lost the next year, in consequence of his twice giving offense to his royal patient. These offenses consisted, first, in expressing his dislike at being employed by her in astrological calculations concerning the affairs of France, an employment which he deemed derogatory to the dignity of a queen's physician; and secondly, because, in making those calculations, he interpreted the stars unfavorably for the designs of the King of France.

Agrippa was not of a temper to brook this dismissal with equanimity, and accordingly we find him, in one of his letters written at the time, denouncing the queen-mother "for a most atrocious and perfidious sort of Jezabeel." In 1528 he repaired to Antwerp, and the year after received from Margaret of Anjou, the governess of the Low Countries, the appointment of historiographer to the Emperor. The "History of the Government of Charles the Fifth" was his only contribution to the duties of this office. Soon after Margaret died, and Agrippa again came into collision with his old ecclesiastical persecutors, whose resentment was greatly excited by his treatise "On the Vanity of the Sciences," which he published in 1530, and by another work, soon after written, "On the Occult Philosophy." His pension was discontinued, and in 1531 he was incarcerated in the prison at Berlin. From this confinement he was, however, soon liberated, and after a few more adventures he finally retired to Grenoble, in France, where he died in the year 1535—some writers say in abject poverty and as an inmate of the public hospital; but this has been denied by Gabriel Naude.

The treatise "On Occult Philosophy" is the most important of the works of Agrippa. It has, in fact, given to him the false reputation of being a hermetic adept and a magician. Thus, Paulus Jovius says that he was always accompanied by a devil, in the shape of a black dog wearing a collar containing some necromantic inscription, and that when he was about to die, he released the dog with an imprecation, after which the animal fled to the river Soane, into which it leaped, and was never more heard of. Martin del Rio says that when Agrippa traveled he used to pay his score at the inns in money which, at the time, appeared to be good, but which in a few days turned out to be pieces of horn or shell—a tale which reminds us of one of those in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. The same author retails another apocryphal anecdote about a student who, during Agrippa's temporary absence, was strangled in the magician's library by an irate demon, and into whose dead body Agrippa, on his return, caused the devil to enter and walk several times across the public square of Louvain, and finally to drop dead, whereby the death appeared to be a natural one, and suspicion was thus averted from Agrippa. The truth, however, is, that the treatise on "Occult Philosophy" was of so abstruse a nature and so very mystical in its sentiments and language, that the author found it necessary to write a key to it, which he reserved for his most intimate friends, and in which he explained its esoteric meaning. In this he seems to have followed the advice given to him, when the book was first published, by the Abbot Tritemius, namely, "to communicate common secrets to common friends, but higher secrets to secret friends only."

Masonic writers have very generally attempted to connect Agrippa with the Institution of Freemasonry, or, at least, with cognate mystical societies. Thus Gadicke, in the "Freimaurer-Lexicon," says: "A society for the cultivation of the secret sciences, which he founded at Paris, and which extended through France, Germany, England, and Italy, was the first ever established by a learned man, and was the pattern and parent of all subsequent similar societies."

Lenning, in his "Encyclopadie der Friemaurerie," says: "It is reported that Agrippa established, in Paris, a secret society for the practice of the abstruse sciences, which became the basis of the many mystical associations which have been since originated." But a writer in the Monthly Review (London, 1798, p. 304) is still more explicit on this subject. His language is as follows: "In the year 1510 Henry Cornelius Agrippa came to London, and, as appears by his correspondence (Opuscula, t. II. p. 1073, etc.), he founded a secret society for alchemical purposes, similar to one which he had previously instituted at Paris in concert with Landolfo, Brixianus, Xanthus, and other students at that university. The members of these societies did agree on private signs of recognition, and they founded, in various parts of Europe, corresponding associations for the prosecution of the occult sciences. This practice of initiation or secret incorporation, thus and then first introduced, has been handed down to our own times, and hence, apparently, the mysterious Eleusinian confederacies now known as the lodges of Freemasonry."

It can not be denied that there are in the "Occult Philosophy" of Agrippa many ideas and explanations that are of a Masonic character; yet it is equally certain that the theories advanced in that work are not such as the system of Freemasonry would be willing to adopt. But of these theories, it is but just that we should quote the language of their author, who says that all that the books undertake to teach on the subject of magic, astrology, and alchemy, are false and deceptive, if they are understood in the letter; but that, to appreciate them or to draw any good out of them, we must seek the mystic sense in which they are enveloped. This is certainly a doctrine which applies not more to the hermetic philosophy than it does to Freemasonry, and the truth of which is now universally admitted by the learned.

Apollo Commandery No. 1.

CHICAGO, Jan. 15, 1868.

The annual festival of this commandery, which came off at the Tremont House last evening, was an occasion of much more than ordinary interest. The Committee of Arrangements had exerted themselves to have the affair alike creditable to the commandery and the city. In this they were nobly seconded by our host Drake, of the Tremont. This remark was often heard during the evening: "Well, Drake has beaten himself." None can so well know the force of this compliment, as those who are accustomed to sit at his bountiful board, or witness his devotion to his guests. The members of Apollo vied with each other in their efforts to make their visiting brethren contented and happy.

Among the notables present were, R. E. Sir Kt. Geo. Frank Gouley, G. C. of Missouri; R. E. Sir Kt. V. L. Hurlbut, G. C. of Illinois; E. Sir Kt. F. J. Alger, G. C. G. of Missouri; E. Sir Kt. Chas. Munger, G. C. G. of Illinois and E. C. of Joliet Commandery; E. Sir Kt. A. G. Hibbard, E. C. Detroit Commandery; E. Sir Kt. A. J. Dunning, E. C. Elwood Commandery, Springfield; E. Sir Kt. Geo. Gardner, E. C. Chicago Commandery, No. 19; Sir Kt. Theo. H. Tilton, Palestine Commandery, N. Y.; Sir Kt. I. N. Plotts, Morton Commandery, N. Y.; Sir Kt. Z. H. Brown, Columbian Commandery, N. Y., and a host of other visiting Sir Knights, whose presence would add interest to any Masonic gathering. We missed very many familiar faces, however, which was the only occasion for regret.

The chairman of the Reception Committee was particularly happy in "recepting" our friends from abroad. The ceremony was performed in "No. 2," and witnessed only by the "recepted." The formal reception of visiting Sir Knights took place at 9 o'clock, and in the presence of the finest gathering of our wives and daughters ever within the hospitable walls of the Tremont. Rt. E. Sir Kt. Hurlbut introduced the Sir Knights. The introduction was responded to by Rt. E. Sir Kt. Gouley, E. Sir Kt. Hibbard, and others.

At 4 o'clock A. M. the party dispersed, delighted with the entertainment.

HIRAM.

A Query.

Dear Trowel:

I desire you to inform me, through your columns, who was right in the following—the W. M. or the Secretary:

In the by-laws of a certain lodge there is a section, a part of which reads thus:

> "If any brother, forgetting the moral duties so essential to the preservation and credit of our Institution, should be seen in a state of intoxication, it shall be the indispensable duty of every brother knowing the same to report it to the lodge; whereupon, the brother so offending shall be admonished by the W. M. in open lodge, for the first offence," &c.

A brother was charged, through the proper channel, with intoxication, and a committee was appointed to investigate the case. The brother plead guilty to the charge, to the committee, and in open lodge to the W. M. The brother was requested to retire until the lodge could take action on it. The questions, "Guilty or not guilty," and "What penalty will you inflict," were put, and voted upon by the lodge. The Secretary thought that, as the brother had plead guilty, it was the indispensable duty of the W. M., according to the by-laws, to admonish the guilty brother then and there, without action of the lodge; but, if the brother had plead not guilty, then it would have become necessary to go through a regular trial, and the W. M. would have acted right.

Respectfully, R.

We think the Secretary's view was correct.—EDITOR.

The Grand Lodge of York.

From a visit we made to York, and from the researches of Bro. J. G. Findel, it would appear that the Ancient York Lodge was of a similar character to the other operative lodges of Great Britain, and no more entitled to be called a grand lodge than those of Kilwinning, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Perth, and others. If the lodge at York issued warrants, or permitted other lodges to work under its authority, so did the other large operative lodges of Scotland. If it was acknowledged as the mother of Masonry in the South, so were the others recognized as such in the North, East, and West. In fact, they were either all grand lodges or simply lodges of position and influence, working by virtue of the protection afforded them by the State.—Bingham.

[It was not unusual, even so late as the first quarter of the last century, to call the original lodge in a town or country a grand lodge, and its Master a Grand Master. It was this that made Lord Derwentwater Grand Master in France, though only Master of a private lodge at Paris. Franklin signed and believed himself to be a Grand Master, from the circumstance that he was the first Master of the first lodge in Philadelphia. The laws and rules of government of the Institution were then but imperfectly defined, and, of course, but little understood.]—Freemasons' Magazine.

Anti-Msonry.

BY BRO. W. B. LANGRIDGE.

It is a favorite saying in many quarters, that the "world moves." We are prepared to indorse this; we believe it does—in a circle. The latest evidence of this is the holding an anti-Masonic convention at Aurora, Ill., Oct. 31st, under a call of Dr. Jona Blanchard, President of Wheaton College, Ill., Mr. Philo Carpenter, and others, for the purpose of prayer and consultation on the following topics:

1. The relation of the prevalent secret orders to the Christian religion.
2. The duty of professing Christians in relation to them.
3. The propriety of calling a national convention on the subject.

This convention was held, and the official declaration of the result is, that some "eighty persons, from five different States," were registered, "representing ten Christian denominations." "Letters were received from residents of ten different States," "earnest and eloquent in the interests of the convention," and all urging the calling of a national convention at an early day. "Resolutions were adopted, declaring the secret orders now prevalent in the country anti-Christian in their nature and tendencies, and gentlemen representing five evangelical Christian denominations argued out at length the propositions adopted." A resolution was adopted appointing a national anti-Masonic convention next May, and Oberlin was named as a suitable place for its meeting, having probably gained the "bad eminence" of such an indorsement through the action of its college in expelling a student for the crime of being a Mason, and its being besides the hot-bed of many of the isms that always flourish best in anti-Masonic soil.

This may be thought by some a "tempest in a tea-pot," or the efforts of a few zealots and bigots to proscribe others for opinion sake. But is it so? Or even if it is, it to be disregarded? We say not, in either case. We see here the leaders of "ten Christian denominations" laying aside their quarrels to unite against us; and they are the leaders, as the persecuting and radical in every cause always drown the voice of calm reason and truth, and lead the unthinking multitude from hosannas to curses. We see here eight States sending up their delegates and five others their letters to swell this meeting, which is not called "anti-Masonic," or any thing of the sort, but with a wisdom that does the Rev. Dr. Blanchard credit, is dubbed a "Christian convention," thus in its very name enlisting the feelings of many, and falsely suggesting that the Christian religion is threatened or in danger.

Then, if we look at the denominations from which these come, we see that they consist of a very large number who are very closely under the control of their leaders. The United Brethren have patiently and persistently abused us; argued that our Institution is wicked, anti-Christian, and devilish because it is not sectarian. The assembly of the Congregational church in Illinois, of which Dr. Blanchard is a member, has for years, until its last annual convention, adopted resolutions denouncing us, and it was the failure to do this last year that has caused this convention; and so it goes, through the list of all the ten denominations. Let this coming national convention be a success, and let those ten churches only show that they do unite against us, and there will be a prospect of a large party, which prospect itself will draw to it all the rabble of unprincipled men who hope to use popular delusions and popular excitement to advance their selfish ends and hoist themselves into power. Swell this by the unworthy, timid, and time-serving Masons, who have no convictions, but are ready to yield to any new excitement, and the vast army of rejected candidates who would in many instances rejoice to pull down a society which refused them admittance, and see what an army can be raised. As in the crusades, we have "the will of God" as a rallying cry to marshal a host actuated by "malice, hatred, and all uncharitableness."

What, then, shall we do? How shall we meet this coming storm? Not with the weapons of a similar warfare. We can not turn our lodges into political club-rooms or band ourselves into propaganda to emulate these people. We can not in weekly meetings argue this cause under the garb of zeal for religion. We can only protect ourselves as the disciples were directed to do—by being "wise as serpents and harmless as doves." By seeing that no root of bitterness spring up among ourselves, and more than all, by redoubling our vigilance in guarding our mysteries from the eyes of the unworthy. We must be more careful. We must use the black ball more freely. We must make it the rule that a man shall be positively good, useful, and influential, and not merely one of whom no evil can be said. Yet more than this: we must purge our lodges. We must cast out from among us the libertine, the drunkard, and the profane swearer, wherever we find them, and make the lodge the rival of the church in the purity of her membership, as well as that of her teachings and the strength of her influence over those who have knelt at the altar. Our strength—even our life—lies in cutting off the dead timber we are carrying—in casting overboard the men who, by their daily conduct, afford those opponents of ours their strongest argument.

We must, in a word, so elevate the standard of Masonry, so depopularize and render it select, choosing and retaining only those whose daily lives are a guaranty of honor, truth, and honesty, of uprightness before God and of good repute before the world, as will compel the respect of the thoughtful and tolerant in the churches, and of the influential and respectable of those without; of that class whose instincts are always on the side of justice and fair play, and who have too much self-respect, and too much sincerity and independence of mind, to be led to blame or praise to satisfy the whims, the zeal, or the jealousy of narrow-minded leaders. With God and these on our side, we need care little for the others. Shall we have them?

Brethren, it is time we looked at this thing, calmly but resolutely, in the face. There is yet time to act; soon it may be too late. What will you do?—Evergreen.

Grand R. A. Chapter of New York.

The Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the State of New York commenced its annual convention at Albany, on Tuesday, 4th inst., and was opened in ample form by M. Ex. Comp. Seymour H. Stone, G. H. Priest, after prayer by the Grand Chaplain.

The following grand and past grand officers were present:—John W. Simons, D. G. H. P.; Rees. G. Williams, G. King; I. B. Chaffee, G. Scribe; John S. Dickerman, G. Treas.; Christopher G. Fox, G. Sec'y; Rev. Charles H. Platt, G. Chaplain; David F. Day, G. C. of H.; John D. Williams, D. P. Soj.; Daniel Wolff, G. R. A. C.; Thomas C. Cassidy, G. M. 3d Veil; James D. Pollard, G. M. 2d Veil; G. F. Wiltsie, G. M. 1st Veil; Amsa Fuller, G. Tyler.

Ezra S. Barnum, Robert R. Boyd, John L. Lewis, John S. Perry, James M. Austin, Darius A. Ogden, Horace S. Taylor, Past Grand High Priests; Lewis G. Hoffman, Augustus Willard, P. G. Kings; and James L. French, P. G. Scribe; also, the representatives of one hundred and twenty-three chapters.

The election of grand officers took place, resulting in the retention of office by all the incumbents. Their names can be found in the list of grand officers noted as present, above.

The special committee on District of Columbia offered the following:

Resolved, That this Grand Chapter, believing that the organization of the body claiming to be the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia was irregular, decline to recognize it as a grand chapter.

A resolution was offered, to see what legislation, if any, is necessary to merge the council or cryptic degrees into the chapter work; but what the result was, we must leave until next week, our reporter's notes on that head being imperfect.

In reference to the Order of High Priesthood, it was resolved "That it is the imperative duty of a High Priest elect to receive the order of High Priesthood, and no High Priest shall be permitted to preside over his chapter after the annual convocation of the grand chapter next succeeding his election, until he shall have received the order, which shall be conferred under the direction of this grand chapter immediately after the opening, and without fee, none being present but regularly covenanted High Priests. And in the event of a companion entitled to the degree being unavoidably absent, the Grand High Priest shall issue his dispensation to have the degree conferred in such manner as his judgment shall dictate."—New York Courier.

ADDRESS

Delivered by M. E. Comp. L. L. Munn, P. G. H. P., before Freeport Chapter No. 23, R. A. M., at their Annual Convocation, the 17th day of December, A. D. 1867.

COMPANIONS—Another year has been taken from the future and added to the past since we last assembled in annual convocation; and it has pleased the Supreme Architect of the Universe to give us a year of more than usual prosperity. We have, to a great extent, been exempted from sickness, and but one of our number has been called to try the realities of eternity. Our much esteemed and worthy companion, Thomas Robinson, is now, we trust, enjoying the rewards of a well-spent life, and, we believe, has the felicity of a more perfect knowledge of divine truth.

Let us be devoutly thankful to Almighty God for the many blessings bestowed upon us, during the past year, and with that reverence and awe that is due from the creature to the Creator, let us implore His blessing, protection, and guidance in the labors and duties of the year upon which we are now entering. Companions, in a time like this, it is fitting and proper that we carefully survey the past, and make our calculations for the future.

Have we individually put our practice the most excellent tenets of our beloved Order? Have we always spread the broad mantle of charity over the errors of our brethren, and permitted the frailties of human nature to plead the extenuating circumstances that may have surrounded their foibles? Have we, in the most tender manner, reminded them of their errors in private, that we might aid their reformation, or have we been of those who glory in the shame of their brethren and labor to build THEMSELVES UP by pressing OTHERS DOWN? If the latter be true of us, we are not Masons at heart, but if we have practiced the former, then have we acted the noble part, so becoming to the true members of our ancient Order.

There are upwards of twenty-seven thousand Masons in Illinois to-day, and if this noble band of brothers will carry out the excellent teachings of Masonry in all their relations in life, and live up to the true Masonic standard, they will exert a mighty influence for the good of mankind, humanizing and elevating the race.

Masonry is a system of ethics which has grown out of the wants of man. History, both sacred and profane, as well as individual experience, teaches us, that from the earliest dawn of man's creation to the present time, men have found it necessary to form themselves into societies for their mutual protection and security. Therefore governments have been established, laws enacted, and societies organized to protect the weak, restrain the vicious, and to relieve the distressed.

The first form of government was patriarchal, in which the father ruled his family both as law-giver and priest, and his authority was absolute. As families multiplied, the strong began to oppress the weak. Therefore they found it necessary to form alliances or to confederate.

We read in the 14th chapter of Genesis that Mamre, Aner, and Eshcol were confederated with the patriarch Abram, and he was thus enabled to save his brother's son, Lot, and his goods from captivity, and as a reward he received the blessings of Melchezedek, King of Salem, who was priest of Most High God. And after he had received the blessings, the King said unto Abram, "give me the persons and take the goods to thyself," but instead of taking the goods he had saved from captivity, and which the King had profered to him, notice his noble and Masonic reply: "I have lifted up my hand unto the Lord the Most High God, the possessor of heaven and earth, that I will not take from a thread even to a shoe-latchet, and that I will not take anything that is thine, lest thou should say, I have made Abram rich."

Companions, we have formed an alliance with each other; we are under the most solemn obligations to protect and defend each other, so far as truth, honor, and justice may warrant, and no further. We nowhere in Masonry promise to assist, defend, or shield any but worthy brothers. If a brother falls into error, deals falsely, or violates any of the laws of his country, you are not to shield him from the punishment justly his due. But when a brother falls into error, your duty as Masons is plain—you are not to magnify his faults, but you are to spread the broad mantle of charity over them, and direct your efforts to reclaim him to the paths of virtue and manliness. O! let us exercise that crowning virtue which is the uppermost round in our Masonic ladder, Charity.

During the year last past, there has been more degrees conferred in our chapter than in any previous year since its organization; and I am happy to be able to say that the work has been upon good material. There have been twenty-two Mark Masters, twenty-two Past Masters, twenty-two Most Excellent Masters, and twenty-four Royal Arch degrees conferred during the year, making a grand total of ninety degrees in all.

Companions: In conclusion permit me to return you my heartfelt thanks for the many expressions I have received at your hands of your confidence and esteem, and if in the discharge of my official duties I have erred, it has been an error of the head, and not of the heart; and as we stand upon a level, let us act by the plumb, that we may part upon the square, and when our labors on earth shall have been completed, may we be so unspeakably happy as to be admitted into the peaceful realms of the blessed.

Robert Burns and Real Worth.

BY REV. BRO. WASHBURN, OF CLEVELAND, OHIO.

There is a quaint and dear old Scottish town, reached by the "twa brigs of Ayr." There the "twa" stand, the old and the new, better friends than they were once, for the railway has threatened to erect a rival to them both; though as yet no hideous iron and trestle-work monster has provoked a new quarrel. This is

"Auld Ayr wham ne'er a town surpasses
For honest men and bonnie lasses."

Pass on through beauteous Scottish scenery, and before far are the kirk o' Alloway, and a little on the "Doon pours all its floods" under that one arched "auld brig," scene of Tam O'Shanter's narrow escape. There, too, is the modern mausoleum in memory of him who made all this famous, and there the cottage in which he was born. In this is the object of most interest to Masons, a picture showing the poet of the "Bonnie Doon" in the very act of being made a Mason (though the uninitiated need never suspect that such is its meaning; you know the uninitiated make a great many amusing blunders about the meaning of symbols and signs). What now is the overpowering thought of the good Mason as he sees all things, or any other similar scene of the haunts of some distinguished brother? There are many such; Mt. Vernon, on the Potomac, is one. What is the lesson? It is not so much that Robert Burns was a Mason, or that he received honor from sitting in the oriental chair—no man can honor it. It is not that great names, or great men, dignify an Order. Not this. But this Ayrshire lad was of low extraction. No noble blood flowed in his veins. No worldly honors attended him. The wealthy and the great had for him few smiles, even so that he must now and then teach them that

"A man's a man for a' that."

And this poor lad, that the great met with frowns or supercilious, patronizing encouragement, this glittering intellect hidden under "hoddet in gray," Masonry found out. Him to whom stars and garters were unknown, the jewels of Masonry honored. Precisely such is is the glory of Masonry. For you all know that here are no distinctions and no rivalries, but one—"who can best work and best agree." In common society, wealth and feathers, and the sounding of a trumpet, procure for many a one, whose brain rattles in its cranium, smiles and praises, and honor. But let such a one attempt to pass these doors and you shall see how soon a black-ball will say its silent "no," a "no" silent but as fatal as the fall of a hundred-pounder. Real worth, no matter if the purse be empty, no matter if the man be obscure and unknown, no matter if all the doors of wealth and fashion are barred against him, if he have something in his heart and something in his head, real worth will bring him within, while any "birkie ca'd a lord" must turn his back.

"We meet upon the level." Such is not the empty boast, but the true practice of this ancient Order, at least down to our own day. May such long continue to be its glory. May "hoddin grey," and "homely fare," and "a' that," come in here, brought by any true son of nature and of truth, and may each "birkie ca'd a lord, wha struts and stares," find elsewhere congenial company. No other means but this, with such as I have named before, can keep our Order in its nobility, and keep it worthy of the honor of such assemblies as this of to-night. We care not if the diamonds brought to us are uncut; do we not know, sir, how to polish them? We care not if the corruption offered is gilded all over; have we any use for it? We may be weak—we are weak, as men generally estimate strength. We hang out no banner to flout men's vision; we publish no boastful detail of what we do, rarely—only on some time like this, or when we follow a brother's body to the tomb—are we seen before the world; our assemblies are secret, our deeds of charity and brotherly kindness equally unknown. So should it be.

Qualifications.

Another letter of peculiar character, and involving a matter of unusual importance, has been received. I am asked whether a Mason can be charged and punished by a lodge for offenses committed by him before he became a Mason. I have decided that he can not, for the reason that there is no specific regulation settling the question definitely, and therefore I have chosen to follow the general principle that retrospective or ex post facto laws are in conflict with the theory of civil government. But it is extremely doubtful if this principle should control in Masonic jurisprudence. The very first qualification to be found in the laws relating to candidates (Text-Book, p. 267) is, "That he must be a good man and true, no immoral and scandalous man, but of good report;" and to ascertain the existence of this and the other qualifications necessary under the law, petitions are required to lie over one month, and a committee is appointed whose duty shall be to "vigilantly inquire and satisfy themselves that the candidate is in possession of all the qualifications required, and thereby prepare themselves to submit a faithful as well as a correct report." The inattention and carelessness with which committees of this kind generally discharge their duty, is the source of great evil to the Fraternity. Two of a committee of three most generally do nothing more than concur in the report of the third member, not thinking it necessary to ascertain the facts themselves, and without stopping to inquire if the information of the chairman or speaking member of the committee be sufficient to authorize a report, either good or bad. We are too easily satisfied in this very essential matter, which lies at the very foundation of all Masonic usefulness. A negative report of the character of a candidate, is in very many instances acted upon as sufficient. But it is not sufficient under the requirements of the law. The fact that a candidate is not an "immoral and scandalous man," is not sufficient. He must positively be a good man and true, and under the tongue of good report. Negative characters neither make good citizens nor good Masons, for it does not always follow that he who is not bad is necessarily good. Goodness, virtue, and worth, are active qualities, and these are the essential elements which the law requires.—Grand Master of Tennessee.

Masonic Comity.

In December last, after advising with the officers of one of our subordinates which had personal knowledge and jurisdiction in the matter, I gave written consent that a certain gentleman, who was about to leave our jurisdiction to return to the place of his nativity, might present his petition to Union Lodge No. 31, under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Connecticut, which act was simply a relinquishment of our jurisdictional right. I take occasion to mention this, that other grand lodges may be reminded, that as we endeavor to avoid the commission of any act which would seem to disregard their rights, so we shall expect a strict observance of that comity which enables us to enforce a rule forbidding a lodge from making a Mason of a man who resides in another jurisdiction—a practice unfair and dangerous to the welfare of the Fraternity, because it leaves open a door through which persons of ill repute, coming from a country where they are known, may gain addmission where nothing is known of them. An instance of the kind—except, fortunately, that the petitioner is known in this jurisdiction, of which he was at the time a resident, as a worthy and excellent man—has come under my personal inspection. The subordinate of a sister Grand Lodge, whose law is as expressive as our own, received his petition, and conferred the degrees upon him during his sojourn within its jurisdiction, and that, too, in such a manner that it has worked complete injustice. The person referred to, as appears by his own statement, was rushed through in such a hurried manner that he is destitute of ability to convince us of his claim for recognition, and is therefore excluded from the enjoyment of privileges which the lodge in New York undertook to guarantee to him.—Gr. Master Cal.

Grand Master English.

Grand Master English, of Arkansas, in his last annual address to his grand lodge, thus opens fire on the editor's last report on foreign correspondence to the M. W. the Grand Lodge of Iowa. We find the extract in THE TROWEL, the proceedings of Arkansas not having yet come to hand. Arkansas is not a very cold country, to be sure, but there is, nevertheless, a good deal of ice in the comparison made of it with our beautiful Iowa. Here, the soil is almost as rich as that of Australia, where, if the veracious English author is to be credited, "if you tickle it with a hoe it will laugh with a harvest." We submit, however, that our able Bro. English, in his special pleading, has not convinced us that Masonic colleges are successful institutions. They could be made such if the Craft would generally support them. But do they do so? There are many reasons why they do not. These may be summed up in the statement that men who are Masons are also largely interested in church and business college enterprises, to which they give whatever support they may have to bestow.

If Arkansas can make a better exhibit, none will rejoice more heartily than ourself. If she elects to send her ships freighted with "coins" (ancient), "coins of the realm," into such a maelstrom, none can gainsay her right to do so. We thank Bro. English for his kindly offer to relieve us of the heavy pecuniary responsibility of educating our four boys—they run down like a pair of stairs, from the age of seventeen to that of three years, Bro. E.—and should we conclude to change our present place of residence, the inducements he offers us to remove to that State, will be gratefully considered. To be chairman of the committee on foreign correspondence under such a man, would be a a covetable position.—Evergreen.

Beauty.

Beautiful faces, they that wear
The light of a pleasant spirit, there
It matters little if dark or fair.

Beautiful hands are they that do
The work of the noble, and good, and true.
Busy for them the long day through.

Beautiful feet are they that go
Swiftly, to lighten another's woe,
Through summer's heat or winter's snow.

Beautiful children, if rich or poor,
Who walk the pathways sweet and pure
That lead to the mansions strong and sure.

Grand Master Vaux.

We commend the following eloquent passage from an address delivered by Grand Master Vaux, upon the occasion of his installation, Dec. 27, before the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, to those ecclesiastical pharisees who can see good in nothing but what is to be discerned through their distorted spectacles. Freemasons will do well to heed the admonitions contained in it:

It is not to be denied that there is an increasing desire everywhere manifested to obtain the rights and privileges which Freemasonry confers. This creates no surprise. An Order that has centuries upon centuries encircling its history, as the bark covers the trunks of primeval trees, showing, by the lines which mark each successive year's growth, their longevity and strength, must, of necessity, command the respect and admiration of mankind. Comparing it, in its majestic proportions, its hoary antiquity, its strength, beauty, and stability, with all other human institutions, it awakens the deepest interest, and invites the most thoughtful study. The ages, as they pass over it, do it homage. Time recoils from his attacks upon it, to examine his weapon and wonder how it is resisted; the spirit of destruction lodges in its battlements, and broods over the successive failures of its insidious influences; the Genii of Unrest, Schism, and Heresy, hovering round its portals, at last fly, affrighted and dazzled by the light of unbroken harmony which illuminates its sacred altars; the tongue of universal history knows not its language, and fails to record either its origin or its works; the philosophers are silent in regard to it, for they can not teach its virtues, or interpret its mysteries; poetry knows nothing of the rhyme of its ritual, and music has no sound to give voice to its universality. It can not be described, for it has no parallel. Surely, then, its attractiveness to the mind and heart, to the intelligences and emotions of men, is no cause for wonder.

But to preserve it, as it ever has been, demands the strictest obedience to its mandates. Let those, therefore, who seek admission be eminently worthy—eminently worthy! The badge of a Freemason should only be given to those who, after strict trial, and the most scrutinizing examination, posess every prerequisite. It is a mistaken principle, one which will not be justified on investigation, to make the access to the Craft as easy as that which opens the doors of admission to other existing institutions among men. We have a high standard; it must be maintained. Had it not been that our fathers felt the responsibility which rested on them to protect our Fraternity from the intrusion of those who were seeking, but were not worthy, Freemasonry, like other associations which were, but are not, would have fallen like empires and dynasties and kingdoms and languages, and been lost and forgotten, buried in those ruins over which the past has thrown its impenetrable veil.

Australia.

We have to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the first four numbers of the Australian Freemason, a weekly journal just established in Sydney, and which is edited with great ability. We publish elsewhere the opening address of our talented contemporary, and heartily welcome him to the arena of Masonic journalism.

It is nearly a quarter of a century since the first lodge was established in Australia, and there are now thousands of members enrolled, and upwards of a hundred lodges scattered over the length and breadth of the land. The three constitutions of England, Scotland, and Ireland have each a Provincial Grand Lodge at New South Wales and Victoria, and all working very amicably. In a recent number we noticed the meeting for the laying of the foundation-stone of the Freemasons' Almshouses, which has been subscribed for by members of the three constitutions, and in which ceremony the three District and Provincial Grand Masters took an equal active part. There is also another charitable institution, named the Australian Freemasons' Orphan and Destitute Children Society, under the English constitution.

Anticipating the arrival of H. R. H. the Duke of Edinburgh, the three District and Provincial Grand Lodges severally met and appointed officers from each to form a united committee to arrange for his reception. A joint address has been prepared, and will be presented at the levee.

The question of separation from the Grand Lodges of England, Ireland, and Scotland, and the formation of a Grand Lodge of Australia, is still being discussed.—Record of W. India, Bombay.

Lodge "Himalayan Brotherhood," Simla.

At a meeting of this lodge held at Simla, on Wednesday, the 16th October, the Worshipful Master, Bro. J. E. Cooke, raised Bro. F. de Monte to the third degree. The visitors present were V. W. Bro. Thomas Jones, Past District Grand Registrar, W. Bro. Dr. T. M. Bleckley, Master of lodge Morning Star, Lucknow, and Bro. J. C. Mandy, of lodge True Friendship, Calcutta. Bro. J. E. O'Connor made an application for relief on behalf of the widow of the late Bro. C. J. Evans, formerly Master of lodge Marine, Calcutta. He stated that the fact of her being in real distress had been recognized by the Committee of the Madras Fund of Benevolence, who had just allowed her a donation of Rs. 1,000. The Worshipful Master stated that it was of pecuniary importance that the liabilities which the lodge had incurred some years before on the security of the house belonging to it should be wiped off, and that it was not prudent, therefore, to divert any portion of its funds to other purposes. Consequently, he could not recommend a grant to Mrs. Evans; but such brethren as desired to help her might do so by a separate subscription. The Junior Warden, Bro. Hugh Cooke, believed there was money in the charity fund of the lodge. If so, he would propose to grant to Mrs. Evans from that fund. Bro. W. H. Hoff seconded this proposal, adding that he and Bro. Jones had known Bro. Evans as a Mason in Calcutta. The Worshipful Master stated that there was money in the charity fund, but that, for the reason already given by him, it was not advisable to touch that fund for the present. The Senior Warden, Bro. Lyons, remarked that the money could not be more appropriately applied than to a case of distress. In fact, he thought it should on no account be used for any other purpose. The Worshipful Master concurred with the Senior Warden with regard to such funds generally; but, having received a threat that the lodge-rooms would be sold in default of a speedy settlement of its debts, he thought it should be a question of future consideration whether any of the moneys of the lodge could be more appropriately applied in giving charity to others rather than paying the lawful demands against it, and thereby saving the building in which it met. He added that a portion of the money referred to had been lost by some confusion which had occurred on the death of the late Treasurer, Bro. Graham, who had died insolvent. Bro. W. H. Hoff took the opportunity to inquire whether the subscription which had been raised last year for a testimonial to the Rev. Dr. Smyth had been similarly lost. The Worshipful Master replied in the negative. Another case of distress was then brought forward, and it was proposed by Bro. Hoff that it should be dealt with in the same way as the case of Mrs. Evans. The Worshipful Master said that it could not be dealt with in the same way, as the case was one in which there were no Masonic claims.

In the banquet room, the weather being very cold, two fires were lighted. V. W. Bro. Thos. Jones, after replying in an eloquent speech to the toast of the visitors, alluded to the opportunities he had had of seeing Masonry worked in lodges in various parts of the world, and to the admirable manner in which, it appeared to him, the third degree had been conferred that evening in the lodge Himalayan Brotherhood. He humorously remarked that the temperature of the room at the time he was speaking was more in consonance with the warm and hearty feelings with which the brethren of Simla had received him, than had been the frigidity of the atmosphere on his entering the banquet-room, "when no blazing fire had infused it with a genial caloric." He concluded by proposing the health of the Worshipful Master, Bro. J. E. Cooke.

Bro. Dr. Bleckley, also having occasion to address the brethren, made a highly interesting speech, of which we are sorry we can give only a few particulars. The corps to which he belonged, H. M.'s 46th regiment, had had an old military lodge attached to it; but nothing now remained of that lodge except one valuable relic, namely, the Bible on which the American patriot Washington had been obligated. He (Bro. Bleckley) had belonged to lodges in various regions; among others, to a lodge in Malta and to lodge Zante in Zante, Corfu. And, under peculiar circumstances, he had helped to work a lodge held in a hut in the Crimea, before the walls of Sebastopol. He was now filling the office of Master of lodge Morning Star, in Lucknow, which was numerically strong. Having been obliged to come away from that city, to join a new appointment in Simla, he had left the lodge under the charge of Bro. Massey, well known as "Redan Massey."

Bro. Jones enlivened the evening by singing Mr. Pips's version of "Excelsior," the "Whistling Thief," and other songs, accompanying himself on the piano.—Indian Freemason's Friend, Calcutta, India.

Names for Lodges.

In our July number for 1867, we published a list of suggestive names for lodges in this jurisdiction, confining ourselves to such as were not in use in Missouri at that time. Since that date many of those names have been taken, and we have been requested to publish a REVISED LIST; and in doing so we shall add many that have never been used in any jurisdiction, and none of the following are at present appropriated by any lodge. We would again earnestly recommend that each lodge have a Masonic name, and not to select those of living men. It will also be noticed that we have given the name before the word lodge wherever it is customary, or will sound well, and in other instances have followed the old English custom of prefixing the word lodge before the name where it would sound better—this being a matter of taste, brethren can arrange that to suit themselves:

Emulation Lodge, Tuscan, Doric, Globe, Robert Burns, Constitutional, Mount Lebanon, Foundation, Scientific, Lily, Sun, Full Moon, Square and Compass, Charity, Temperance, Sincerity, Universal, Cosmopolitan, Stability, Fidelity, Lion, Affability, Friendly, Mount Olive, Philanthropic, Good Will, Equality, Gavel, Trowel, Harbor of Refuge, King Hiram, Accacia, Mosaic, Blazing Star, Jerusalem, Confidence, Antiquity, Golden Rule, Fraternal, Cache, Landmark, Ashlar, Kilwinning, Ancient York, Ark and Anchor, Philomathea, Amity, Western, Blue, Franklin, Corner-Stone, Libanus, Diogenes, Meridian Sun, Setting Sun, Relief, Harmonic, Indefatigable, True and Faithful, Semper Fidelis, Toleration, Hospitable, Perfect Union, Universal Charity, Free and Accepted, Altar, Arcana, Lambskin, Bee Hive, Tyler's Sword, True Brotherhood, Cement, Fervency and Zeal, Circumspection, Composite, Craftsmen's, Sword and Heart, Trestle Board, Incense, Esoteric, One Family, Geometrical, Net Work, Pomegranate, Proficiency, Mount Bezetha,* Right Angle, Lodge of Industry, Probity, Unity, Honor, Fellowship, Unanimity, Regularity, Fortitude, Silent Temple, Faith, Cardinal Virtues, Three Tenets, Generosity, Justice, Prudence, Confidence, United Strength, Virtue and Silence, Candor, Sympathy, Rectitude, True Workmen, Good Faith, Brotherly Love, United Friends, Indivisible Friends, Perfect Silence, Chosen Friends, Strict Examination, Sacred Numbers, Old Regulations, Labor, Three Supports, Three Grand Masters, Peace.

Nearly every name we have given will suggest itself to the informed Mason as being Masonically appropriate, and being full of rich meaning.—St. Louis Freemason.

A. & A. S. Rite, Northern Jurisdiction--Remarks Explanatory.

Our discussion upon the merits of the A. and A. S. Rite through the columns of the Freemason has awakened a spirit of inquiry, not heretofore experienced over the whole country. We have received numerous letters from members, both North and South; and those from the North claim that their rituals do not contain the features to which we Masonically object, and that they do not specify degrees belonging to the American Masonic system, and do not wage a warfare against them. As we do not belong to that jurisdiction, and have not read their rituals, of course we do not presume to deny these declarations of members therefrom, but are perfectly willing to accept their declarations as true; and we congratulate them upon the fact that they have no man strong enough or bold enough to manipulate their rituals for personal or ulterior designs. The reason why we have heretofore made no distinction between the two jurisdictiens, is because we accepted Bro. Pike's declaration as true, that it was the same everywhere.

Every man and system shall receive justice at the hands of the Freemason, for we have no personal ends to gain, and no prejudices to gratify—we are therefore free and independent to criticize all that we believe wrong, and to approve all that we deem worthy of it. If the northern jurisdiction rests upon the constitution of Charleston, then, of course, they must, as far as validity is concerned, suffer with the Southern jurisdiction.

Bro. J. H. Drummond, of Maine, the chief officer of the North, and Bro. Pike, of the South, declare that at a meeting they had in Boston, nothing affecting other Masonic systems was discussed—that it was a meeting principally for personal acquaintanceship, and our correspondent stating otherwise, was mistaken. We did not attach so much importance to that meeting as to consider it as affecting the general principle at issue, for we believe our good Bro. Drummond to mean what he says when he declares that his heart is with Ancient Craft Masonry.

Another Libel on the Masonic Name.

From a special dispatch to the Republican, of this city, dated New Orleans, January 29th, we cut out the following:

> "Masonic Hall is crowded to-night, on the unusual occasion of a public Masonic baptism. Albert Pike, Sovereign Grand Commander of the Supreme Council of the Scotch Rite, is present from Memphis."

Well might the telegrapher call it an "unusual occasion." If he had been a Mason, he would have called it an "innovation." Bro. Pike seems determined to prove to the world that he has no regard for the principles of Freemasonry, or its good name—his whole ambition seems to be to build a Masonry of his own. How any reflecting man could have been found to allow his innocent child to be used as an instrument wherewith to insult high Heaven, is incredible to us. How any man in the United States, except Bro. Pike, could stand before the solemn presence of the Infinite, and burlesque the sacred rite of baptism by virtue of a Masonic office, would be equally incomprehensible. When will the world understand that pure and legitimate Freemasonry can not be engaged in such outrages upon the sanctity of religion, decency, and propriety? We answer, not until the whole Masonic press shall unanimously condemn it, and every Freemason shall condemn and repudiate all such performances.

We feel assured in saying that the 13,000 Freemasons of Missouri repudiate this baptism in the name of Freemasonry, and we look upon it as an insult and libel upon the name of our ancient and honorable Order, and we thank God that it was not performed by any man or association recognized by us to act in our name.

New Grand Lodge in Idaho.

Washington Hall, Boise City,
Jan. 2, A. L. 5868.

Charles W. Moore, Editor of Freemasons' Magazine:

Dear Sir and Bro.—On the 16th of December, A. E. 5867, the Grand Lodge for the Territory of Idaho was organized. Idaho No. 35, Boise No. 37, Placer No. 38, Owyhee U. D., under Grand Lodge of Oregon; and Pioneer No. 12, under Grand Lodge of Washington Territory, were represented. The following officers were elected: George H. Coe, Idaho No. 1, Grand Master; G. W. Paul, Boise No. 2, D. G. M.; A. Haas, Boise No. 2, S. G. W.; George Young, Placer No. 3, J. G. W.; S. B. Conelly, Pioneer No. 4, G. Treas.; P. E. Edmondson, Idaho No. 1, G. Sec.; Jonas W. Brown, Idaho No. 1, G. Mar.; J. B. Curry, Idaho No. 1, G. S. D.; John Murrell, Pioneer No. 4, G. J. D.; M. McCormick, G. S.; J. C. Maulding, G. S.; L. P. Mikkleson, Owyhee No. 5, G. Sw. B.; A. G. Brown, Boise No. 2, G. St. B.; Rev. W. R. Bishop, Boise No. 2, G. Chaplain; H. A. Mattox, Idaho No. 1, G. Bible Bearer; J. M. Carmady, Pioneer No. 4, G. Pur.; L. F. Carter, Boise No. 2, G. Orator; J. D. Galbraith, Idaho No. 1, G. Tyler.

By a resolution, charters remain as they were until new ones are furnished.

On the 27th, the new Masonic hall of Boise Lodge, A., F. and A. M., was dedicated with the solemn ceremonies of the Order. Bro. L. F. Carter, acting D. G. M., under the dispensation from the Grand Master of Oregon, dated early in December. Immediately, after the installation of officers for the ensuing year took place. Bro. G. W Paul W. M., Bro. A. Haas S. W., Bro. G. E. Logan Treas., Bro. Herbert W. O. Margary Sec., Bro. A. G. Redway S. D., Bro. J. H. Brown J. D., Breth. B. F. Lamkin and E. A. Slocum Stewards, and Bro. Howard Sledsoe Tyler.

This hall is the property of the Masonic Hall Joint Stock Association; is sixty by twenty-four feet inside; fire-proof brick, with iron shutters above and below, and cost $11,000, which, for this small place, is much. The Boise lodge is a large owner of the stock, and as scrip only bears the legal rate of interest, ten per cent., and the present rent, besides the lodge, is $190 per month, and will soon be $225, it will not take long for the lodge to purchase the whole, which is the intention; it will not take over four years.

Two years since, this lodge was poor, and struggling hard to pay its way; now it has sixty members, good material, and more offering; the outer doors well guarded, even at times with a jealous care; and we are proud of the work, which has been complimented again and again by visitors, Past Grand Masters, and bright and shining lights. The work will stand the test of the F. C. tools.

I am, dear sir, fraternally yours,
Herbert W. O. Margary.

Important Proclamation.

Office of Grand Master Knights Templar of United States of America.

Milwaukee, Wis., Jan. 1, 1868.

Sir J. B. Will, Em. Commander Wash. Commandery, No. 1, Sir E. L. Stevens, Em. Commander Columbia Commandery, No. 2, Washington, D. C.:

Eminent Sirs—I am in receipt of a mass of correspondence and have had several personal interviews with officers and members of commanderies over which you preside, touching the embarrassments under which your commanderies are laboring in consequence of the supposed conflict of authority of the governing powers of Royal Arch Masonry in the District of Columbia. I have hitherto forborne to express any opinion on the questions thus raised, in the earnest hope and confident belief that all obstacles to perfect harmony among the Royal Craft and valiant Templars of that jurisdiction might be removed without the interposition of official authority on my part. That hope having proved futile, and that belief having been dissipated, it becomes my duty to determine the questions presented, so far as they affect the commanderies, until the action of the general encampment shall be had thereon. The embarrassment arises out of the organization of the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia in May last, the proceedings thereof since its organization, and the subsequent action of the Grand Chapter of Maryland and of the District of Columbia and of the General Grand High Priest in respect thereto. A solution of the difficulty involves the determination of the question whether the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the District of Columbia was duly organized in May, A. D. 1867. If it was, then all remaining questions are easily disposed of, for there can be but one grand chapter or any other body exercising primary jurisdiction and authority over subordinate chapters in the same territorial jurisdiction—such grand chapter of course being under the jurisdiction and owing allegiance to the General Grand Chapter of the United States. If the Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia is a legally organized grand chapter, it has exclusive primary jurisdiction over Royal Arch Masonry and over Royal Arch Masons throughout the territorial limits of the District of Columbia, and may exercise such powers in relation thereto as properly belong to a regular grand chapter of Royal Arch Masons, under the jurisdiction of the General Grand Chapter.

After a full and careful investigation of all the facts attending the organization of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the District of Columbia, I am forced to the conclusion that said grand chapter, on the 23d day of May, 1867, was, and since that date has continued to be, and now is, a regularly and legally constituted and organized grand chapter; that as such it possesses all the powers and may perform all the duties within the territorial limits of the District of Columbia, which of right pertain to a State grand chapter under the jurisdiction of the General Grand Chapter of the United States of America. It is not deemed essential to detail the reasons which have led me, after due deliberation, to this conclusion. These reasons will be reported to the Grand Encampment of the United States, to which body I am responsible, and with which rests the ultimate determination of this very grave question, so far as the orders of knighthood are concerned.

The commanderies of the District of Columbia over which you respectively preside, and the officers and members of each will, therefore, until otherwise directed, recognize the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the District of Columbia as a regularly constituted grand chapter, having, under the General Grand Chapter, exclusive jurisdiction over Royal Arch Masonry and chapters thereof within the District of Columbia, and give full faith and credit to all its acts legally performed within the scope of its authority.

You will immediately assemble your respective commanderies and cause this letter to be read therein, that all the members thereof may be advised of its contents. It is also enjoined upon all the officers and members of your respective commanderies that, in the performance of all the duties imposed upon them as Templars, they should ever be mindful that they are members of an order founded upon the Christian religion and the practice of the Christian virtues, in the confident belief that all personal animosities will be cast aside as unworthy of their profession, and that they will vie with each other in the exercise of a spirit of conciliation and forbearance, and in such manifestations of fraternal courtesy and acts of brotherly kindness as will be best calculated to restore at the earliest practicable moment entire and perfect harmony and concord among all the members of the orders of knighthood throughout the District of Columbia, thus adding to the already deservedly high reputation of Templars of that District.

Given under hand and private seal at the city of Milwaukee, this first day of January, A. D. 1868, A. O 750.

H. L. Palmer,
Grand Master.

Oberlin.

December 27, the Second Congregational Church of Oberlin adopted the following resolutions:

In regard to the admission of candidates who are members of a Masonic Institution, this church

1. Holds itself bound to carry out the laws of Christ, viz.: That present evidence of discipleship, and of being a follower of Christ, is the Scriptural condition of admission to church membership.
2. That one of the first elements of such discipleship is a teachable spirit, ever tenderly anxious to know all the will of Christ; and hence, more than ready to welcome the light of truth on all moral questions and relations, and especially those that bear upon one's own Christian life and duty. Another equally vital point in this evidence, must be a sincere and solemn purpose to do all known duty, and to keep aloof from all known sin and wrong—even to the extent of avoiding all appearance of evil, aud of having no sympathy or "fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness."
3. With these views of the Christian religion, and of Freemasonry—of the Christian life, and of the Masonic life—we shall feel ourselves bound to inquire carefully how the candidate's connection with Masonry affects the evidence as to his Christian character.
4. Since some Freemasons may be very imperfectly aware of the actual and possible evils of the Institution, and hence may be far better (morally) than the Institution is, it seems incumbent upon us to put each individual case upon its own merits, rather than to judge of it simply by the character of the Institution; that so, while we bear a righteous testimony against the system, we may avoid doing injustice to its individual members.
5. If, after due time has been taken to enlighten the candidate, and develop his views and spirit, he seems at heart to indorse the Institution, and with an intelligent apprehension of the nature of Masonry, persistently adheres to it, we hold that he can not in the nature of the case give the requisite evidence of present piety, and can not be admitted to to church fellowship.

Let our friends possess their souls in patience. All the religion, morality, and patriotism are not concentrated in Oberlin, but a great deal more than its share of fanaticism is.

Massachusetts has a population of 1,281,700. There are 63,000 more females than males. There are 208,698 dwellings.

THE MASONIC TROWEL.

HARMAN G. REYNOLDS, Editor.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., FEB. 15, 1868.

☞ No communication or advertisement is likely to receive attention, if received after the first of each month, in the issue immediately following.

Shore Up.

It is a sign of weakness to manifest alarm; it is a worse sign to disregard the monitions around us. Certain religionists, led on by Pres. Blanchard, of Wheaton, have commenced another crusade against Masonry, stimulated by the president's defeat last spring at Urbana. We call attention to a well-written and fairly digested article in this number, from the pen of Bro. Langridge, Grand Secretary of the Grand Chapter of Iowa, taken from the Evergreen. Other journals have sneered at these manifestations; some have joked, and some have put on an air of defiance, and our pugnacious brother at St. Louis intends to fight them. We saw enough of that in our boyhood days. We remember distinctly the entire anti-Masonic fight. Benevolence, eminent piety, exalted patriotism, high personal character, real probity, and liberal dealing, were regarded as only so many evidences of consummate hypocrisy. Honest, hard-working mechanics were turned out of employment; suspicion dogged the footsteps of every Mason; adhering Masons were swept from places of public trust; the foulest, blackest, and most repulsive charges were brought against Masons, collectively and individually; the boys were taught to hoot at them as they passed their dwellings; they were debarred from juries, and criticised in the witness box; insulted from the bench; arrayed before legislative committees, and by sheer force and abuse were driven from the polls. Wives left their husbands, children denounced their fathers, fathers disinherited their sons, and the silence of a Mason in the midst of such awful frenzy, was denounced as obedience to the great dragon of Masonry. Ministers were hurled from the pulpit, members of churches were expelled, and the cool and remorseless anathemas of the Catholic clergy were eclipsed by the savage and fierce denunciations of clergymen, the boiling and seething lava of ecclesiastical fulminations, the diabolical and infuriated persecutions of church members, and the implacable intolerance which destroyed households and churches, divided many, and ruined thousands upon thousands, until Satan, with hellish glee, stood in church doors, court-rooms, and legislative halls, and promised office, honors, and distinction to every weak-backed, crooked-kneed, and timorous craven, if they would secede and worship him!

Amid this carnival of insanity and fury, many zealous Masons attempted to breast the storm, and to allay the tempest. They might as well have attempted to stay the eruptions of Vesuvius, or the simoon of the desert. Anger, malice, and all uncharitableness, reigned. Others, in search of office, quiet in church or family, or anxious for notoriety, seceded or agreed to be quiescent. But the more prudent and stable remained firm and unmoved, quiet and silent, observant Christians, good citizens, and exemplary men, returning good for evil, and making no display, but patiently waiting their superior "trust." It came. No bubble ever burst more suddenly. The faithful and exemplary Masons were as suddenly called to the management of public affairs, and to positions requiring skill and judgment, as they were driven from public life by the miserable howls and rage of an insolent and infuriated populace. Since that time, most of the seceding Masons have striven to cover up their shame, or have sought for re-instatement. None of the rampant or officious seceders have any standing anywhere, so far as we know.

As it ever has been, so would it be now. A very large portion of the virulent anti-Masons in the Morgan raid were parties who had been refused admission, or who had been denied advancement. They were revengeful. Such persons—a portion of them—would be so now.

Unhappily, conviviality was the rule, and Masons were no exception. An ungenerous, extravagant, and malignant use was made of the foibles arising from convivial gatherings. Extravagances in costume, halls, clothing, and furniture, prevailed then, as now. These were harped upon, paraded before the public view, and Morganism was exhibited, like a monkey show in Masonic regalia, upon the public stage, before a gaping crowd of men and women.

What is now to be done? Nations have sunk into oblivion, the proudest works of antiquity are in ruins, systems have crumbled into decay; but Masonry survives, and will never die. Lodges may cease to exist, Masons may prove recreant, her altars may be destroyed, and her votaries, as in the past, may again fall victims to popular fury or individual malice; but the principles of Masonry are just, holy, immutable, and imperishable.

No outside power can seriously damage the Masonic structure, so long as unity and justice prevail within.

Let the doors be carefully tyled; let the unworthy be denied admission, or, if within our folds, let them reform or go out. Let the Masonic tree be carefully pruned, watered, and guarded.

Let all our brethren remember, henceforth, that no one is to be solicited or even encouraged to seek initiation; that all who wish must ask. Let silence be the rule before all profanes. Let charity, good citizenship, and moral lives, commend us to the world. And last of all, but best of all, let every Mason remember in whom he puts his trust, and keep his ears open.

The Trowel for 1868.

The year 1867 was a disastrous one for The Trowel. The increase in January was large, but the increase during the balance of the year was small, and the losses large. We discontinued sending The Trowel, as the subscriptions expired at different times, to nearly 1,300 subscribers in Missouri, so as to leave that field clear to the St. Louis Freemason, and such subscribers as we have in Missouri have come to us unsolicited. We also discontinued to many who had not paid for the paper, and our losses by reason of unpaid subscriptions and depredations upon the mail, were heavy.

The year 1867 closed upon us gloomily, and we had some misgivings as to the future. But our circulation has increased so much that we commenced the year 1868 by issuing 12,330 copies, which was entirely exhausted by February 1. This is the largest circulation The Trowel has ever had, and is probably the largest issue of any American Masonic periodical except the National Freemason. We sincerely thank our brethren for this generous support, and we will endeavor to make The Trowel in the future what it has been in the past, one of the best and most prominent, and the cheapest Masonic paper in America, and if our subscribers will renew as their subscriptions expire, and our friends will continue to add new names to our list, we will close this year with 15,000 subscribers.

Scotch Rite.

The editor of the Freemason, at St. Louis, declares that the Scotch Rite in the South is atheistical and semi-political. This he avers that he would affirm on a "pile of books." The editor says he was a warm friend of the late venerated O'Sullivan. We think he was a friend, and that he sincerely venerates his memory. We know that the illustrious O'Sullivan highly respected him.

This same father in Masonry said to a distinguished Mason in this city, that he regarded the degrees in Scottish Masonry as beautiful, consistent, and truly philosophical, and worthy of the study of intellectual men and religious inquirers, and that he would propagate the rite in due time in Missouri.

What is the matter now? Is there danger that the sceptre will depart from Judah? Or is there a bigger lion than himself in the way?

Chatham Lodge No. 523.

We had barely time to notice the loss of the lodge-room at Chatham in the January Trowel. Before the brethren applied for a dispensation, they built a lodge-room, and owned it themselves; none of them were more than substantial in property, and they freely gave of their time and money to secure a home. It was a nice room, with necessary conveniences in a rural town, and fairly furnished. They were just ready to insure, when the fire-king desolated their home, and their toil, devotion, money, and pride were swept away in a few moments. They will appeal to the Craft. Brethren, help them to rebuild, and gladden their hearts with a new inner-chamber.

The Evergreen

Is a new monthly of 16 pages, a trifle smaller than The Trowel, with a cover having a handsome title page, and two pages of notices and advertisements. It is creditable in its workmanship, and tasty in appearance. It is edited by E. A. Guilbert, A. M., M. D., Past Grand Master of Iowa, with a corps of associates and correspondings. It will have one superior quality: the editor talks for himself. And whatever opinions others may hold in regard to his prudence, every one who knows anything about him, knows that ability is not the one thing lacking. The first number springs into being wfth life, vitality, and power. We welcome it cordially to our exchange list.

Published by Guilbert, Barnes & Co., monthly, at Dubuque, Iowa, at $2.00 per annum.

G. B. Fessenden.

In the December Trowel we alluded to the rejection of Mr. G. B. Fessenden by a lodge in Cincinnati. A brother has pointed out to us the law of the Grand Lodge of Ohio, forbidding the publication of rejections, and also assures us that no refusal has been made to Mr. Fessenden's applying elsewhere for the degrees. We regret making the publication, and should not have made it had we known the law.

Notice to Subscribers.

We have now perfected our mailing apparatus, so that with each subscriber's paper we can report the time his subscription is paid up to. Subscribers will please notice the figures attached to their names on the yellow slip on the bottom of the first page. Figure 1 stands for January, 2 for February, 3 for March, and so on down to 12, which stands for December. The figures 67 stands for 1867, 68 for 1868, 69 for 1869. A subscriber who has paid up his subscription to December 31, 1868, will find right after his address the figures 12–68. Complimentary copies are marked with a Z.

Apollo Commandery.

The Editor of the Freemason (St. Louis) is gushing, outspoken, rapturous, even transcendental, over his reception by Apollo Commandery on the 14th of January. He says it was a "heavy engagement," but that he lived through it. We was knighted in Apollo, we was. We know those fellows; they are always ready, watchful, attentive, and have the money; they eclipse themselves every time, and everybody else. If any doubt it, let them try it on.

Calvin C. Burt Again.

We have a letter from this gentleman, who says that the Grand Lodge of New Jersey has rescinded the sentence of expulsion against him, published in a former number of this paper by Grand Master Whitehead. We have received no official information of the fact; when received, we will publish it. As to Burt and Seymour and Levy, and their several Memphis Rites, we repudiate the whole, and intend to make solid war on the whole combined henceforth.

Why so Cross?

The editor of the St. Louis Freemason constantly speaks of us as if we were an hereditary enemy. He can pursue that course if he chooses; we have had some bouts with him; have tried to be civil and courteous, and shall still try to act like a Mason. The editor may live long enough to learn to be a gentleman; perhaps to act like one. We hope he may, at any rate, even if it takes a hundred years.

Explanation.

In our January issue we said, under the head of jurisprudence, that a man could be initiated only in the place where he is entitled to vote. In the main, this is correct, but it needs some qualification. A person desiring initiation must apply to the lodge nearest to his residence, and residence is to be determined by the place where he is entitled to vote.

The January Trowel.

By some mistake we did not print as many papers for January as we intended, but we had enough for all our subscribers, old and new, to February 1. The supply then gave out, and we shall be unable to supply the January number beyond that time. We will commence their subscriptions with the February number.

Enlargement.

The Freemason, published at St. Louis by P. M. Pinckard, and edited by Geo. Frank Gouley, Grand Secretary, has been enlarged from a sixteen to twenty-four page monthly; price $2.00 yearly. We congratulate our friends on this evidence of prosperity, and wish them abundant success.

DEPARTED.—E. A. Chapin, Esq., the able and popular Superintendent of the Toledo, Wabash and Western Railway, died at the Leland Hotel in this city, January 22d. After suitable preparation and the funeral services, the remains were sent east, accompanied by his family.

THAT FALSEHOOD.—The editor of the St. Louis Freemason changes his charge of falsehood against us to one of stupidity. Any port in a storm.

A Surprise Party--Presentation.

PETERSBURG, Ill., Feb. 10, 1868.

Brother Reynolds:

Clinton Lodge No. 19, A. F. & A. M., has just been made the recipient of favors deserving of notice.

On the evening of the 8th inst., while the Craft were at work preparing material for our mystic temple, the lodge was alarmed by the approach of strangers seeking an interview with the brethren. The Worshipful Master having called us from labor, the strangers were admitted, who, in the names of the wives of the members of the lodge, presented us with a Master's chair, a beautiful copy of the Holy Scriptures, and a letter of presentation from the donors, full of the most tender and touching sentiments. To give a perfect description of either the chair or the book, is impossible; they are both of the finest. But the Bible is especially splendid. It contains panels for photographs, many beautiful illustrations, is bound in morocco, has gold clasps, and is handsomely superscribed with appropriate Masonic emblems and the name of the lodge; in fact, it was the finest that could be found in the Chicago bookstores.

The effect produced by the presentation was heightened by the manner in which it was made. The idea of making the presents originated with the ladies some weeks ago; the plan was agreed upon, and those in the country were consulted by letter; each contributed the necessary amount, and the book and chair were purchased through a brother Mason in Chicago. All this was done with such system and secrecy that, until the gifts were presented in the lodge-room, not a member of the lodge had the least idea or intimation of what was taking place, excepting two, who, residing at a distance in the country, had to know why their wives wanted to go to Petersburg on the worst night of the year. The surprise was complete. There was thus confusion in Clinton Lodge for once, at least, and among its members none were found who doubted woman's ability to keep a secret.

We were then informed that the ladies were at the Town Hall, where they would be glad to see us. We repaired to the hall in procession, where we were received by the wives and daughters of the brethren, and where we found, to our surprise, tables spread with refreshments in ample supply, prepared and arranged in such style and taste as only an epicure could describe. After the lodge, through a brother, had acknowledged the receipt of the presents and thanked those giving them, the feast began, and a scene followed never to be forgotten by those present, which was ended only by the coming of the Sabbath. All felt that it was good to be there. It was a gay and royal hour. Clinton Lodge was happy; husbands were proud of their wives, and bachelors forgot for a while their ill-starred fortune. As for the ladies, God bless them! they were equal to the occasion, and, as is woman's nature, were happy in making others happy. Verily, as the good book hath it, "in her tongue is the law of kindness."

A BROTHER.

Good Law.

1. It is not expedient for Masons to hold joint occupancy of lodge-rooms with Sons of Temperance, Good Templars, Odd-Fellows, or any similar society.
2. A lodge has the right to try a suspended Mason on a new charge for unmasonic conduct, and expel him, if the offense be of a character to justify such punishment.
3. After a petition for initiation has been received and read, it can not be withdrawn under any circumstances; but a ballot must be had in all oases.
4. No petition for initiation or membership can be received or acted on, except at a stated meeting of the lodge.
5. To form and open a lodge, and to make Masons after the "ancient form and manner of the Craft, and not otherwise," is all the power granted by a dispensation.
6. A lodge may be "called off" from time to time, in the same day or evening; but it is irregular to "call off" from one day to another.
7. No one can be Master of a lodge unless he has served as Warden. If he has received the degrees of Past Master in a chapter, it is not necessary for him to receive it again before being installed as Master.
8. All candidates for admission must be examined in open lodge.
9. It is not proper to confer the degrees on more than one candidate at a time.
10. One negative ballot is sufficient to reject an applicant for membership.
11. There is no authority whatever that can compel a lodge against its will to admit an applicant for membership.
12. No business can be transacted at a special meeting, except the particular business for which the lodge was convened.
13. No lodge or Master of a lodge has any right to declare the case of a candidate for initiation to be one of emergency. That power is vested in the Grand Master alone.—Grand Master West Virginia.

Visitations.

On the 28th May, in company with the R. W. Grand Secretary, Bro. John D. Caldwell, I visited the Grand Lodge of Indiana, then in session in the city of Indianapolis. Its members received us with a hearty welcome, entertained us with great hospitality, and manifested their courtesy by conferring on us the distinction of honorary membership. The session was one of peculiar interest. It was the fiftieth annual grand communication. Suitable arrangements had been made for the celebration of the anniversary. Two out of the three surviving delegates, who had assisted in the formation and organization of the grand lodge, were present, and added to the interest of the occasion by recalling many reminiscences connected with the early history of Freemasonry in Indiana. Bro. Richard W. Thompson delivered an eloquent and elaborate address, in which, with great learning and research, he traced the history of the Fraternity, and exhibited the contrast between its principles and ceremonies and those of other secret societies, both ancient and modern.

On the 12th June I visited the Grand Lodge of Wisconsin, which was then in session in the city of Milwaukee. It is hardly necessary to say that I was received by the brethren of that State with fraternal kindness, and treated with all the distinction due to your representative and chief officer.—Grand Master of Ohio.

THE MASONIC TROWEL.—The Masonic Fraternity in the State of Illinois need no introduction to this periodical, nor to its worthy editor, Bro. H. G. Reynolds. It is par excellence the home organ of the Craft, and indispensable to every member of the Mystic Order who would keep fully posted on Masonic topics. Dr. Mackey is now writing a series of very interesting articles for THE TROWEL, on the "Symbolism of Sacred Plants." We notice in the issue of January 15th, now before us, that the editor refers pleasantly to his recent visit to Freeport, and compliments us highly on the new Presbyterian building.—Freeport Journal.

Gen. T. J. Henderson dedicated the new Masonic hall at Princeton, on the 9th of November. The hall is said to be one of the finest outside of Chicago—elegant in its appointments, and beautifully decorated, and reflects great credit on the Fraternity at Princeton.

R. W. Bro. E. F. Babcock, the enterprising nurseryman and horticulturist of Summerfield, St. Clair county, is tarrying awhile at Memphis, Tenn., where he is extending his business. He has been hob-nobbing with Pike. We advise him to look-out, or Frank will "discontinue" him.

Bethalto Lodge, 406—L. W. Lyon W. M., R. J. Stirratt S. W., James Woods J. W., E. D. Kersey Treas., J. V. Richards Sec., Dr. J. C. Martin Chaplain, S. Patterton S. D., H. Baer J. D., were installed in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church by W. Bro. C. W. Dimock, of Edwardsville, assisted by Bro. Piggott. Good music on the organ and by the choir, and a sumptuous feast followed, in which brethren with their wives, mothers, sisters, and daughters participated. It was a lively, joyous, and happy occasion.

Topeka, Kan.—The several Masonic lodges at Topeka had a festive and social season on St. John's Day, with complete union, and not an incident to mar the joy of the occasion.

Abraham Lincoln was not a Mason. We have stated this by letter more than one hundred times.

The Masonic Monthly, published at Boston by Bro. T. G. Wadman, at $2.50 per annum, after a short suspension comes to us with a new publisher, and much improved in appearance and style.

M. W. Bro. Thos. Hayward, Past Grand Master of Masons in Florida, died January 27, in his 71st year. He was an able man.

Kansas has nearly 1,000 miles of railroad.

The Messrs. Lorillards, tobacconists, paid $123,000 government tax in September last.

The Christian Times and Witness, published at Chicago, and the Michigan Christian Herald, published at Kalamazoo, Mich., are merged into one Baptist paper, called the Standard, at Chicago.

Through the politeness of Ill. Bro. Charles E. Meyer, 33°, we are furnished with a beautiful invitation card to attend a lodge of sorrow, to be held, on the 3d inst., at Philadelphia, by Philadelphia Grand Lodge of Perfection, in memory of Ill. Breth. Edwin F. Moore, John L. Goddard, and Wm. B. Schnider, all 32°.

Milwaukee Insurance Company.—Past Grand Master M. L. Youngs is President, J. H. Tesch is Vice President, J. R. Hunter Secretary, Geo. Dyer Treasurer, and Hon. H. L. Palmer, Grand Master Templars U. S. A., is Attorney.

World at Home.—Someone has favored us with the January number of the above work, being No. 1, Vol. 1, published by Evans & Co., 814 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, at $3.00 per annum. Same size page as Harper's, with 96 pages to the number. The picture of Dickens is superb.

We thank the brother who sent us the beautiful directory of the Masonic bodies in Princeton.

The St. Louis, Jacksonville & Chicago Railroad diverges from the Chicago & Alton Railroad at Monticello, and unites with it again at Bloomington and runs through the counties of Madison, Jersey, Greene, Scott, Morgan, Menard, Mason, Tazewell, and McLean, with a population of 193,213.

The proceedings of the Grand Council of Missouri shows five councils in Missouri and three in Kansas, with 350 members. T. E. Garrett, St. Louis, is Grand Master; J. A. H. Lampton, St. Louis, Deputy; L. R. Ringo, Weston, G. Th. Ill.; John G. Foss, Hannibal, Con.; Wm. N. Loker, G. Treas.; Geo. Frank Gouley, Grand Recorder.

The venerable Elias Hibbard, P. D. G. Master, and father of P. G. Master J. H. Hibbard, deceased, was initiated in Franklin Lodge, then No. 22 under the jurisdiction of Missouri, but now 25 in this jurisdiction, at Upper Alton, March 25, passed April 14, and raised to the sublime degree of a Master Mason April 15, 1843.

That was a good time when R. W. Bro. Paul B. Ring constituted Monitor Lodge No. 522, Elgin, and installed Bro. S. A. French as W. M., N. J. Bloomfield S. W., G. S. Follansbee J. W., and F. H. Mosely Sec. It is a live lodge, and will be a banner one.

By contributing five dollars to the "pilgrimage to the Holy Land," a brother can get "a sprig of acacia from the mountains near Jerusalem, fastened indestructibly upon Bristolboard, labeled with place and date, and elegantly framed in a gilt frame."

Waukegan Lodge No. 78 is a consolidation of Union Lodge No. 78 and Waukegan No. 324. At the election in December, P. D. G. M. J. C. Baker was elected W. M., Fred. Cleveland S. W., Wm. A. Johnson J. W., and Wm. A. Gray Secretary. It is a good lodge, and has 117 members.

The Grand Chapter of Minnesota elected Luther Dearborn G. H. P., and Wm. S. Coombs Grand Secretary. Is Comp. Dearborn the former Master at Geneva?

The Grand Chapter of Missouri numbers 32 chapters and 1,367 members. Martin Collins, of St. Louis, is G. H. P.; R. E. Anderson, Dep.; J. E. Drake, Carrolton, G. K.; L. F. Weimer, St. Joseph, G. S.; Geo. Frank Gouley, St. Louis, Grand Secretary.

The Northern Monthly for February is before us. "The Metropolitan Pulpit," "History of the English Language," "Major-General Philip Kearney," are among the leading articles, and are well treated. Published at 37 Park Row, New York, and 248 Broad street, Newark, N. J., by M. R. Dennis & Co., at $3.00 yer year.

The Rocky Mountain Star, a spirited paper published at Cheyenne, Wyoming Territory, says that the population of Cheyenne can not be less than 10,000.

R. W. Bro. D. G. Burr is lecturing the lodge at Sullivan, where he has initiated seven and raised three. He reports the Craft in a prosperous condition, with a plenty of good material.

Gov. Bross, Sharon Tyndale, Gen. Smith, O. H. Miner, and Dr. Bateman, State officers, are Masons. The two last are Templars.

Grand Commandery New York.—The forty-fourth annual convocation was held at Saratoga Springs, Oct. 1st. Thirty-one commanderies represented. John A. Sefferts, of New York, is Grand Commander, and Robert Macoy Grand Recorder. This influential body numbers 3,770 members.

Ashlar Lodge No. 308, Chicago, held its anniversary and re-organization banquet, Feb. 11th. The ticket of invitation did not specify the place. This lodge has had serious embarrassments, but now has 59 members, and among them Past G. Master J. Adams Allen, and several of the best business men in the city. W. Bro. W. B. Young is Master.

At the triennial meeting of Harrisburg (Pa.) Sovereign Consistory, Dec. 27, 1867, the following officers were installed for the ensuing year: H. Stanley Goodwin, 33°, G. Com.; Alfred Creigh, L. L. D., 33°, First Lieut. Com.; John Vallerchamp, 33°, Second Lieut. Com.; S. P. Auchmuty, 32°, Min. of State; Theo. F. Scheffer, 32°, G. Chan.; W. H. Egle, M. D., 32°, G. Keeper of Seals; John Edwards, 32°, G. Treas. Regular meetings held on the second Tuesday of each month.

Every presidential election year can be divided by 4, and is therefore a leap year. Is that an argument in favor of womanhood sufferage?

Southern Relief.—We have received $25 from Lavely Lodge No. 203, Williamsville, for the relief of our Southren brethren.

Grand Commandery Iowa.—The proceedings for September, 1866, and October, 1867, are at hand. R. E. William Leffingham, of Muscatine, was elected G. Com. in 1866, and R. E. James R. Hartsock, P. G. Master, and P. G. H. P., was elected G. Com. in 1867. Sir W. B. Langridge has served as G. Rec. from the organization of the body. The report on foreign correspondence is from the pen of Dr. Guilbert. The next meeting will be at Des Moines, October 20, 1868.

A Good Practice.—The W. M. of St. Joseph Lodge, at St. Joseph, Mo., has instituted a practice which it would be well for most of our lodges to imitate. The Wardens take charge of the lodge in turn, and divide the work with the Master, so that the effect is, that in case of his absence, that the lodge goes on with its work as if he was present, and the practice insures experienced brethren, able to step into any position in case of emergency.

The lodge has about 125 members, and plenty of good material in the forests and quarries, and the members are living in harmony.

Worthily Bestowed.

Lincoln, the county seat of our neighbor on the north, Logan county, is either the fourth or fifth city in size on the Chicago and Alton Railroad. Alton, Bloomington, and Joliet are larger, and it contests the fourth position with Carlinville.

It has two prosperous lodges, Lincoln, No. 210, presided over by Col. R. B. Latham, and Logan, No. 480, of which W. Bro. Joseph F. Benner is Master. Upon the occasion of his second installation, by Bro. Latham, Jan. 14th, Bro. S. A. Foley, on behalf of the lodge, presented him a handsome silver watch, on which was the following inscription:

To Joseph F. Benner, W. M., by Logan Lodge No. 480, A. F. & A. M., January 14, 1868.

The speeches of presentation and acceptance were excellent.

We have received the following circular:

Companions—At the annual convocation of the Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons, the following resolutions were received and adopted, to-wit:

To the Grand Chapter of the State of Wisconsin:

The select committee to whom was referred so much of the Grand High Priest's address as relates to the so-called "Egyptian Masonic Rite of Memphis," and the "Ancient Primitive Rite of Memphis of 33 degrees," respectfully report the following resolutions and recommend their adoption:

Resolved, That this Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons of the State of Wisconsin acknowledges and recognizes no degrees of Masonry or order of knighthood to be regular or legitimate, except those conferred by or under the authority of the following constituted authorities in the United States of America, and those of corresponding rank in foreign countries, to-wit: The Grand Encampment of the United States; the Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite; the General Grand Chapter of the United States; Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters, and the grand lodges of the several States and territories. And any Royal Arch Mason, who may have received, or who shall hereafter receive, any irregular degrees under the assumed name of Masonry or knighthood, particularly those known as the "Egyptian Masonic Rite of Memphis," or the "Ancient Primitive Rite of Memphis of 33 degrees," is hereby required to withdraw therefrom and to signify the same in open chapter wherein he is, or may be affiliated. And all Royal Arch Masons are hereby prohibited from holding Masonic intercourse with any companion who shall refuse to comply with this edict.

Resolved, That no chapter within this jurisdiction shall receive or take any action on the petition of any Master Mason who holds to such clandestine degrees, or who refuses to renounce the same in writing.

Respectfully submitted.

W. Bro. H. D. Keays, Master of the new lodge at Elkhart, died Monday, Feb. 3d. A large number of brethren from Bloomington and Lincoln attended the funeral of this excellent brother. His loss is a calamity.

Another Impostor.

Mason, Effingham Co., Ill., Jan. 10, 1868.

H. G. Reynolds:

Dear Sir and Bro.—At the regular communication of this lodge on the 12th day of June last, one D. C. Terry, claiming to be a member of Cortland Lodge No. 470, Cortlandville, N. Y., was admitted as a visitor to this lodge. On communicating with said lodge, no such person had ever belonged to said lodge, but had been imposing upon the Craft in New York. He is about five feet four inches in height; light complexion; large roman nose; very large, full blue eyes; wears, generally, moustache and goatee; claims to be a school-teacher, pianist, physician, &c., &c. The lodge ordered his exposure at the regular communication on July 10, 1867; it not being done, the W. M. has again ordered him exposed.

Fraternally yours,
Oliver Jones,
Sec. Mason Lodge No. 217, A., F. & A. M.

The Memphis Rite.

New York, Nov. 30, 1867.

The undersigned, members of the Ancient and Accepted Rite of Freemasonry, and attached to the Supreme Council of the Northern Jurisdiction, by active or honorary membership, deeming their allegiance to that body as superior to any other system of Ineffable Masonry, have dissolved their connection with the Rite of Memphis, and hereby declare unauthorized the further use of their names in connection therewith.

Clinton F. Paige, 33°.
Orin Welch, 33°.
John L. Lewis, 33°.

Jurisprudence.

To the law and the testimony.—Isa. 8, 20.

☞ We shall endeavor to answer questions of a legal character under the laws and usages of this and adjoining States under the head of States; other matter of a judicial character will be given under the head of "General." Our comments on law are not binding as such; those who desire decisions must get them from the Grand Master; we give opinions only. Questions will be omitted, unless they are necessary to elucidate the point at issue. Decisions and opinions will be regularly numbered through the volume, and will not be repeated, but reference will be made to them.

ILLINOIS.

No. 18.—A candidate for initiation is rejected in No. 4; he removes into the jurisdiction of No. 19, and desires to petition the latter lodge; he must have the unanimous consent of No. 4 before his petition can be lawfully entertained by No. 19.

No. 19.—A brother suspended for non-payment of dues must pay up all dues chargeable at the time of his suspension, before he can be re-instated, unless his dues be remitted.

No. 20.—The fee for initiation must accompany the petition; if it does not, the W. M. should not entertain it or refer it. His installation obligation forbids it.

No. 21—Officers of lodges U. D. cease to be such officers when their dispensation is returned.

No. 22.—If No. 10 gives permission to No. 20 to confer degrees, No. 20 must receive a petition for the F. C. and M. M. degrees and ballot; but, if No. 10 requests No. 20 to confer degrees for No. 10, then No. 10 must do the balloting.

GENERAL.

No. 8.—When the Grand Master visits a lodge to inspect its work, records, discipline, or as a courtesy, he is entitled to preside as Master, with the W. M. at his left hand.

No. 9.—When the Grand Master visits a lodge for the purpose of constituting it installing officers, laying corner-stones, dedicating halls, presiding at a funeral, or at any general meeting of the Craft, he may open a temporary or emergent grand lodge. He can clothe any deputy, or past or present Master, with his powers.

No. 10.—No Mason is entitled, by law, to a demit except to join another lodge, or to assist in forming a new one.

No. 11.—A lodge U. D. works in the name of the Grand Master; any member of a chartered lodge may hold position in a lodge U. D. without demit, and without prejudice to his privileges or any official position in his chartered lodge. Some grand lodges have enactments to the contrary.

No. 12.—It has been repeatedly decided, that service of summons or notice through the postoffice is not legal Masonic service.

Miscellaneous Reading.

"Did you Swear, Papa?"

Flora was at the window watching for papa. She was growing impatient, for it was almost time for the stars to come out, and she wanted to give him a good-night kiss. Presently Flora's quick ears caught the sound of a familiar footstep, and with a cry of joy she bounded away to meet her father. Before she reached the gate, a gentleman who was passing stopped to speak with him.

Suddenly the sunny face became clouded, and slowly the child turned toward the house; she sat in her own little chair, and covered her face with her hands.

The mother seeing her, said, "Is Flora sick to-night?" "No, mamma;" and then the little head was bowed again. The mother took her in her arms, and said, "Will not Flora tell me what troubles her?" "I know I must keep nothing from my mother," Flora answered. "I was watching for papa, and when he came I ran out to meet him, but some one called him, and while I waited for the man to go away, I heard some one swear. Do you think it was my papa?"

The mother knew not what to answer. She knew that her husband freqrently took the name of God in vain, but to her sorrowing little one she could not say this.

Flora slipped from her mother's arms into her little chair, and again buried her face in her hands, when her father came in. He had missed the bright face and bounding step of his little one, and when he entered the house, and she did not come to meet him, thought she must be ill. Taking her in his arms, he said tenderly, "Is my little Flora sick to-night?" "No, papa." "What has troubled my darling, then?" After a moment's hesitation, Flora said, "When I was waiting for you just now, I heard some one swear, and I think it was the man on this side of the fence. Was it you papa? Did you swear?"

It was hard to meet the gaze of those clear eyes. What would not the father at that moment have given could he have answered, "No, Flora, your father did not swear." From the silence and the averted gaze, Flora's quick intuitions gathered the truth, and she would not be comforted.

Never before in the presence of his child had an oath escaped this father's lips, and he was grieved that his little daughter's faith in him should be so shaken. If before his child he stood condemned, how can he appear before the Judge of all the earth?

Louis Burger and His Barber.

As Louis Burger, the well-known author and philologist, was walking in the Avenue des Champs Elysee the other day, he heard a familiar voice exclaiming, "Buy some nuts of a poor man, sir; twenty for a penny!" He looked up and recognized his old barber.

"What! are you selling nuts?" said he.

"Ah, sir, I have been unfortunate."

"But this is no business for a man like you."

"Oh, sir, if you could only tell me of something better to do," returned the barber, with a sigh.

Burger was touched. He reflected a moment; then tearing a leaf from his memorandum-book, he wrote for a few moments, and handed it to the man, saying, "Take this to a printing-office, and have a hundred copies struck off; here is the money to pay for it. Get licence from the prefecture of the police, and sell them at two cents a copy, and you will have bread on the spot. The strangers who visit Paris can not refuse this tribute to the name of God, printed in so many different ways."

The barber did as he was bid, and was always seen at the entrance to the Exposition selling the following hand-bill:

THE NAME OF GOD IN FORTY-EIGHT LANGUAGES.

Hebrew, Elohim or Eloah.
Chaldaic, Elah.
Assyrian, Ellah.
Syriac and Turkish, Alah.
Malay, Alla.
Arabic, Allah.
Language of the Magi, Orsi.
Old Egyptian, Teut.
Armorian, Teuti.
Modern Egyptian, Tenn.
Greek, Theos.

A few days after, Burger met the barber.

"Well," said he, "has the holy name of God brought you good luck?"

"Yes, indeed, sir. I sell on an average a hundred copies a day, at two cents each, or two dollars; but the strangers are generous; some give me ten cents, and others twenty. I have even received half a dollar for a copy; so that, all told, I am making five dollars a day."

"Five dollars a day?"

"Yes, sir; thanks to your kindness."

"If I were not a literary man," thought Burger, as he walked away, "I would turn peddler, or publisher; there is nothing so profitable as selling the learning or wit of others."

The Mystery of Punctuation.

An old compositor tells this anecdote in a New-England paper: "We remember, a number of years ago, when we were in a book office near Boston, the copy was received for a scientific work. The copy was manuscript, with every letter well formed, every capital letter in its proper place, every word distinct, and punctuated. It was plain as reprint, and called by the compositors the best manuscript copy they had seen. This copy was given out to the compositors a few pages at a time, who set it up and punctuated it as they had been in the habit of doing, each as he thought the sense required. The proof reader read the proofs, marked a few changes in the punctuation, as he did in the most of proofs, and the matter was corrected. Another proof was taken and corrected, and when thirty or forty pages were ready they were sent to the author for his inspection. In a few days the proofs came back, with the punctuation marked freely. It was corrected, of course, and the compositors then got orders to 'follow copy in punctuation.' They did so, and another lot was forwarded to the author, punctuated exactly according to the copy. In due time these proofs came back, and with the punctuation marked more than before, if that were possible. This irritated the proof reader somewhat, and he sent the scientific author a not very polite note, saying: 'if I can't punctuate this work to suit you, and you can't punctuate it to suit yourself, what are you going to do?' In reply, the author said he wasn't aware he had been correcting the office punctuation, but if the proof-reader would see to the punctuation he would be greatly obliged, as it was something he knew nothing about. After that there was no more trouble about punctuation on that work."

Jacob's Well.—That chapter of St. John read by Jacob's well, brings home an overwhelming conviction of the accuracy of the narrator. The woman coming down to the venerated well for water; her bitter prejudice as the Jew asked her to give him a drink even under the shadow of that temple which his people had destroyed —"our fathers worshiped in this mountain;" the green corn suggesting to his mind in prophetic reverie the coming harvest of the Gentile world; the disciples returning down the glen, and in mute astonishment not daring to interrupt his conversation with the woman—every incident of the story comes home with wondrous vividness as we meditate. Among the wrangling disputes which have perplexed the antiquarian and the geographer, and have thrown doubt on so many sacred localities, it is indeed a satisfaction to know that here we are on a spot, of the identity of which there has never arisen any serious question, and the spot hallowed by the very presence of our Lord in the flesh. Jews and Samaritans, Christians and Mohammedans, unite in attesting it.

Eusebius and Jerome mention it, and the latter refers to the Christian church built over it, whose ruins and granite columns now encumber its mouth, while no other spot could accord with the incidents of the inspired narrative.

The building of wells in the East are greater works than the erection of castles and fortresses, and whether they be those of Abraham, at Beersheba, or of Jacob, at Shechem, hand down the name of their founder from generation to generation, as the benefactor of posterity. It is the supply of water and the well that decides the site of the Eastern city, and while the walls, and even the whole position of the place, as for example, at Nazareth, may be changed, the fountain or the well can never be moved.

An Intruder.

An incident which diverted the congregation's attention from devotional exercises for some time, lately occurred in a Highland church. During the singing of the first psalm a lamb made its way to the front pew, where it excited considerable astonishment by rising on its quarters, placing its fore feet on the desk, and cooly surveying the congregation. A lady sitting near determined to expel the intruder, and seizing the lamb in her arms proceeded to the door, the congregation meanwhile watching the proceedings with breathless interest. Going down stairs, however, the hitherto amiable animal began to resist the forcible termination to its devotions, and succeeded in bringing both the old lady and itself to the bottom of the stairs in a manner more rapid than graceful. The lamb, finding itself free, once more made its way into the gallery by another door. The beadle of the church now put in an appearance and attempted a capture, but the lamb was too sharp for the church functionary. An exciting but unsuccessful chase ensued. The scene was brought to a close by the minister saying to the beadle—" The beastie maybe will be quate; sae jist let it be." The services were then proceeded with, and during their course the lamb justified the good opinion of the pastor by remaining quiet.

Will You take the Responsibility?

A young man in Virginia had become sadly intemperate. He was a man of great capacity, fascination and power; but he had a passion for brandy which nothing could control. Often in his walks a friend remonstrated with him, but in vain; as often in turn would he urge this friend to take the social glass in vain. On one occasion the latter agreed to yield to him, and as they walked up to the bar together, the bar-keeper said:

"Gentlemen, what will you have?"

"Wine, sir," was the reply.

The glasses were filled, and the two friends stood ready to pledge each other in renewed and eternal friendship, when he paused, and said to his intemperate friend:

"Now, if I drink this glass, and become a drunkard, will you take the responsibility?"

The drunkard looked at him with severity, and said:

"Set down that glass."

It was set down, and the two walked away without saying a word.

What is not Charity.—It is not charity to give a penny to a mendicant of whom nothing is known, while we haggle with a poor man out of employment for a miserable dime. It is not charity to beat down a seamstress to starvation prices; to let her sit chilled in wet clothes sewing all day; to deduct from her pitiful remuneration if the storm delay her prompt arrival. It is not charity to take a poor relation into the family, make her a slave to all your whims, and taunt her continually with her dependent situation. It is not charity to turn a man who is out of work into the street with his family because he can not pay his rent. It is not charity to extract the uttermost farthing from the widow and orphan. It is not charity to give with a supercilious air and patronage, as if God had made you, the rich man, of different blood from the shivering recipient, whose only claim is that he is poor. It is not charity to be an extortioner—no! though you bestow alms by thousands.

The Truth and More Too.

One of the hardest things for human nature to outgrow is the habit of crying up one's own saleable commodities and the crying down others. The following does not acquaint us with "Bob's" final answer, but we can imagine the "expressive silence" which followed the blunt announcement of the assessor:

"Bob, that's a fine horse you have there; how much is he worth?"

"Three hundred and fifty dollars."

"Not so much as that."

"Yes, every cent of it; another fifty on top of it."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes, I'll swear to it."

"All right."

"What are you inquiring for?"

"Merely for assessing purposes. I am assessor of this ward, and only wanted to know what you rated your nag at."

Niagara Eclipsed.—An astonished tourist writes to the Frontier Index from the curious district surrounding the Yellowstone Lake of Montana:

"Near the outskirts of this monstrous locality there is a lake on the top of the mountain that is yet frozen over, the ice and snow covering its surface some twenty feet deep. Two main forks of the Yellowstone, one leading opposite Wind and Green Rivers, and the other opposite Henry's Fork of Snake River, in the same vicinity that the Madison and Gallatin rise, empty into the big lake, which has for its outlet the Yellowstone River, and just below the lake the whole river falls over the face of a mountain thousands of feet, the spray rising several hundred. A pebble was timed by a watch in dropping from an overhanging crag of one perpendicular fall, and is said to have required eleven and a half seconds to strike the surface of the river below."

That beats Niagara Falls "all hollow." The river at these greatest falls is represented to be half as large as the Missouri at Omaha, and as clear as crystal. The great lake, like all others in the mountains, is thick with salmon trout of from five to forty pounds weight, and where the milky boiling mineral waters from the geysers intermingle with the pure, clear water from the running streams, these elegant fish can be "forked" up by the boat load.

Grammar in Rhyme.—We advise every young grammarian just entering on Murray, Brown, Smith, or any of the thousand grammars in use, to commit to memory the following lines, and then they never need mistake a part in speech. Who the author is we do not know, but he deserves immortality. With but one exception—"Thirty days hath September," etc.—it is the most poetical effusion we ever met with:

1. Three little words you often see,
 Are Articles—a, an, and the.
2. A Noun's the name of anything,
 As school, or garden, hoop, or swing.
3. Adjectives tell the kind of Noun,
 As great, small, pretty, white, or brown.
4. Instead of Nouns the Pronouns stand—
 Her head, his face, your arm, my hand.
5. Verbs tell of something to be done—
 To read, count, sing, laugh, jump, or run.
6. How things are done the Adverbs tell,
 As slowly, quickly, ill, or well.
7. Conjunctions join the words together—
 As men and women, wind, or weather.
8. The Prepositions stand before
 A Noun, as in or through a door.
9. The Interjection shows surprise,
 As oh! how pretty—ah! how wise.
 The whole are called nine parts of speech,
 Which reading, writing, speaking teach.

The triumph of a woman lies not in the admiration of her lover, but in the respect of her husband, and that is gained by a constant cultivation of those qualities which she knows he most values.

Sharp Practice.—Nantucket is famous for pretty girls, excellent fishing, and good stories. One of the latter is told of an inhabitant of the island who lost hens from his roost. To detect the thief he placed a sharp scythe in a position to be clutched by the criminal as soon as he opened the hen roost door. The next morning there was blood upon the blade, but no hens missing. The gentleman did not hunt for wounded hands, and in a short time went to California, returning after an absence of several years. There used to live on Nantucket one of the largest story-tellers for a young man in the Commonwealth. He was quite popular, however, had a good deal of "brass," and on election day could get more voters than any other native on the island. He was "stirring up" voters one day, and came upon the returned Californian. "Hello B.," said the latter, "give me a ride to the polls?" "No," said B., with an oath. "A man as puts scythes in a hen-roost shall never ride with me!" B. was never prosecuted for the confession.

Three Important Things.—Three things to love—Courage, gentleness, and affection.

Three things to admire—Intellectual power, dignity, and gracefulness.

Three things to hate—Cruelty, arrogance, and ingratitude.

Three things to delight in—Beauty, frankness, and freedom.

Three things to wish for—Health, friends, and a cheerful spirit.

Three things to pray for—Faith, peace, and purity of heart.

Three things to like—Cordiality, good humor, and mirthfulness.

Three things to avoid—Idleness, loquacity, and flippant jesting.

Three things to cultivate—Good books, good friends, and good humor.

Three things to contend for—Honor, country, and friends.

Three things to govern—Temper, tongue, and conduct.

Three things to think about—Life, death, and eternity.

Dr. Franklin's Toast.—At a dinner of the Foreign Ministers, the British Ambassador gave:

"England—The Sun, whose bright beams enlighten and fructify the remotest corners of the earth."

The French Ambassador followed with:

"France—The Moon, whose mild, steady, and cheering rays are the delight of all nations, controlling them in the darkness, and making their dreariness beautiful."

Dr. Franklin then rose, and, with his usual dignity and simplicity, said:

"George Washington—The Joshua, who commanded the Sun and Moon to stand still, and they obeyed him."

Those waters are sweetest that are taken fresh from the spring. As that fruit is by far the most pleasant that you pluck from the tree itself with your own hand; that wine the most delicious that you take from the very cask in which it was first stored; so the Divine letters are enriched with I know not what native fragrance, breathe I know not what charm peculiarly original, if read in that language in which they wrote, who partly derived it from the lips of the Eternal, and partly delivered them to us by the breath of the same inspiration.—Essay on the Claims of the Hebrew Language.

It costs us more to be miserable than would make us perfectly happy; how cheap and easy is the service of virtue, and how dear we pay for our vices.

A storm following storm, and wave succeeding wave, give additional hardness to the shell that encloses the pearl; so do the storms and waves of life add force to the character of man.

THEIR SINGING QUALITY,
VOLUME and PURITY OF TONE,
SYMPATHETIC, ELASTIC, EVEN TOUCH,
DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION,
and BEAUTY OF FINISH.

Decker & Company's Pianos have always received the First Premiums, whenever and wherever they have competed with the most celebrated makers in this country.

OUR IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

Is an invention beautiful in its simplicity and wonderful in its practical effects. It is the most compact Agraffe ever invented, and its influence upon the tone is to render it mellower, rounder, and more clearly brilliant, while it utterly overcomes that sharp, metalic quality which disfigures the instruments of all other makers.

WHY WE EXCEL.

While other Pianos are rarely in tune,

THE DECKER & Co.'s PIANOS invariably retain their Pitch and Tone.

While other Pianos are made of poor or unseasoned materials,

THE DECKER PIANOS combine the Best Materials, Skillful Workmanship, and Scientific Construction.

While other Pianos are deficient in the great requisites of a good touch,

THE DECKER & Co. PIANOS have a flexibility under skillful manipulation, which not only adapts them to the style of every performer, but which causes the player to feel en rapport with the Instrument, and affords his taste and fancy free expression.

IT IS A FACT—That philosophy of construction is not less important than fitness of material.

IT IS A FACT—That various minute, unobserved appliances, adaptations, and improvements have an influence in the tone, durability and manipulative character of a Piano, in no degree inferior to the more ostensible modifications.

IT IS A FACT—Therefore, that science, as well as experience; artistic discrimination, as well as methodic care; capital, as well as conscientiousness, are requisite in the production of a GOOD PIANO-FORTE. In our

is exhibited the result of an uninterrupted, persevering regard for these facts and principles; and purchasers who have so often spoken of the uniformity of excellence in our Instruments will be led to understand how this superiority and uniformity has been attained—a result which is apparent to even ordinary judges, in the volume and richness of tone, the sustained and human character of their singing quality, while connoiseurs and critics fully indorse all that we have adverted to.

The unanimous opinion of the best artists and the most reliable critics is, that

THE DECKER & COMPANY'S

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte is the only Square Piano-Forte, which, in Voluminous Sonority, and Positive Solidity of Tone,

Can stand comparison with the

BEST GRAND PIANO-FORTES MADE.

Selected Poetry.

The Royal Arch Chapter.

From the Craftsman.

The following verses were written for the Nenah Guardian, by Rev. M. Magill, Peru, Ill., and formerly of Cangort Park, near Shinrone:

The mystical ladder we still keep ascending,
To gain its top rung all our energies bending;
Hence the call of the H. P. we promptly obey,
And away to the chapter while yet it is day.

How solemn and grand the engagements to-night!
Three Excellent Masters still searching for light;
The chapter well guarded, companions all true,
They send up their prayers and pledges renew.

The H. P. rehearses the words of the sage,
As they stand recorded on God's sacred page,
Commanding each brother with haste to withdraw
From those who walk not by precept and law.

Our Excellent Masters, who thus far have gained
A goodly report, and whose skill is far-famed,
Now enter, united on life's rugged way,
Still cheered by the hope of a far brighter day.

Experience and wisdom is gained as they go,
If haughty or proud—advised to stoop low;
Should hindrance or danger e'er stir up their ire,
They are led to that "Bush" which once burned fire.

While yet from its midst a voice may be heard
Teaching trust and reliance where evil was feared;
While solemn and reverent, light shining around,
The place is acknowledged as most holy ground.

The God of our fathers is still our sure friend,
His presence and power true Craftsmen attend,
Though sorrow and danger their pathway surround,
A final deliverance shall surely be found.

But if, like the heathen, our God we forsake,
And to folly and crime ourselves should betake,
The house of the Lord with pollution be stained,
Our honor and safety can not be retained.

The King of the Chaldeans will then be let loose,
A weapon of wrath which Jehovah can use;
Our ruin will be certain, if he strike the blow,
And captive to Babylon we surely shall go.

What havoc and ruin when God gives the word?
Fire and destruction, pillage, and sword;
The walls of Jerusalem laid low with the ground,
And the house of the Lord in ashes be found.

But Cyrus is raised up of Persia's famed line,
He makes proclamation, "O! ye captives, combine;
Go up to Jerusalem with cheerful accord,
There labor, and build up the House of the Lord."

Our Excellent Masters are found in this band;
Well armed with secrets, they join hand in hand;
They pass through the veils, are accepted and true;
Their signet approved, and the council they view.

Here then we behold, in the "Most Holy place."
Companions and council now met face to face;
Their case well examined, their object made known,
While their zeal for Jehovah is readily shown.

They are willing to work, without fee or reward,
In erecting once more the House of the Lord;
Their proffer accepted, their labor assigned,
Their task they encounter with freedom of mind.

To work now they go, and with zeal they explore
Those depths where rich treasures long lay in store;
Deposits of old, which by Craftsmen were made
When the noise of invasion had made them afraid.

Those treasures, long lost, were now brought to light;
Their glory and beauty appear to our sight;
The Rod and the Manna, the Altar and Word,
The Pot of pure Incense, and the Ark of the Lord.

The Candlestick, too, with the Table and Bread,
Cherubims of glory, their wings widely spread;
Their glory o'ershadowing that grand Mercy-Seat,
The sum of our treasures we now find complete.

What treasures were hid in those depths so profound!
What priceless deposits so long underground!
But the lost is now found, substitution ignored,
And the mystical word by the Arch is restored.

The candidates now for their toil meet reward;
The H. P. instructs them in the law of the Lord;
Royal Arch Masons they now are declared;
And for raising the Arch they are fully prepared.

The order is given, companions attend,
Our chapter well tyled, bring your work to an end;
With hands lifted high, and hearts firmly bound,
Ever search, keep, and treasure that which was found.

Another Exposition of Masonry.

From the Western Musical Review.

Our old-time acquaintance, Captain Sam. Whiting, a Mason who sailed many a league into Arctic Seas in search of his missing brethren, Sir John Franklin and Dr. Kane, it appears, from what we below publish, has exposed some of the evil practices and vile secrets of Masonry. His poem shows that our "anti-Christian Order" (according to Dr. Blanchard and the Aurora convention) had received into its fold a human being who was not a member of the Congregational, the United Brethren, or the Oberlin church, and did not belong to either of the other "ten Christian denominations" in attendance at Aurora; and that it has a universal language, known to and employed by an unbeliever. The incident also pertinently illustrates a tenet of Masonry, and we therefore commend it to the peculiarly pious church-champion publishers of "Barnard's Light on Masonry," as a good foot-note to the text of its accursed ritual: "To relieve the distressed is a duty incumbent on all men; but particularly on Masons, who are linked together by an indissoluble chain of sincere affection. To soothe the unhappy, to sympathize with their misfortunes, to compassionate their miseries, and to restore peace to their troubled minds, is the grand aim we have in view. On this basis we form our friendships and establish our connections."

I have now in my mind a beautiful illustration of the strength of Masonic love, which came under my observation during my sailor career.

In 1855, while attached to one of the New York clipper Indiamen, and lying in the sickly seaport of Batavia, in the island of Java, I was stricken down by one of the terrible malarial fevers of that torrid clime.

One afternoon, while lying at my hotel, sick nearly unto death, and longing for a friendly voice or glance, my door was suddenly opened, and I saw Framjee Hormusjee Setna, one of the wealthiest Parsee merchants of Batavia, approach me under the due guard and sign of a Master Mason. He sat down by my side, kindly took my fevered hand in his, and assured me that I was not a stranger in the land, but a brother and a friend. His Arab servant followed him, bearing on his head a tray filled with the rarest fruits and delicacies of that prolific clime, and he was left with me to attend to my wants, his master giving him strict injunctions to be faithful to his charge.

Under such care and influence I soon was convalescent, and on my recovery I wrote the following lines:

Sick and weary I was lying,
  Years ago, on Java's shore,
Strangers round me thought me dying,
  For disease had racked me sore.

Thus I lay one radiant morning,
  When my door was opened wide,
And a face with smiles adorning,
  Soon was present at my side.

As I gazed, I saw his gesture,
  Giving our beloved sign;
Richly clad in Orient vesture,
  His bright presence seemed divine.

I responded to the token,
  As he warmly grasped my hand,
And these words by him were spoken:
  "Thou'rt no stranger in this land;

"By this 'mystic tie,' my brother
  We're united hand and heart;
Nor would I the impulse smother
  Thus to act a brother's part.

"Aden, this my Arab servant,
  Shall attend you night and day;
You will find him zealous, fervent,
  Watchful, skillful, kind alway."

Thus he spake—my fever burning
  Soon gave way to friendly care;
Soon my ship was homeward turning,
  Borne along by breezes fair.

Years have passed, yet oft I ponder
  On that scene on Java's shore,
And my fancies thither wander,
  Though between us billows roar.

God be praised! the tie fraternal,
  Is a heaven-born, wondrous plan,
And the bond will be eternal—
  Love to God is love to man.

The Moneyless Man.

[The following was composed by our young friend, the talented poet, Henry T. Stanton, Esq., of Maysville, Ky., the son of Hon. Bro. R. H. Stanton. It was recently recited by one of the finest readers on the English stage, in the city of London, and won the applause of thousands of England's most classic and refined.]

Is there no secret place on the face of the earth
Where charity dwelleth, where virtue hath birth?
Where bosoms in mercy and kindness will heave,
And the poor and the wretched shall "ask and receive?"
Is there no place on earth where a knock from the poor
Will bring a kind angel to open the door?
Ah! search the wide world wherever you can,
There is no open door for a moneyless man.

Go look in yon hall, where the chandelier's light
Drives off with its splendor the darkness of night!
Where the rich hanging velvet, in shadowy fold,
Sweeps gracefully down with its trimming of gold,
And the mirrors of silver take up and renew,
In long lighted vistas, the wandering view—
Go there in your patches, and find, if you can,
A welcoming smile for a moneyless man.

Go look in yon church of the cloud-reaching spire,
Which gives back to the sun his same look of red fire:
Where the arches and columns are gorgeous within,
And the walls seem as pure as a soul without sin;
Go down the long aisle—see the rich and the great,
In the pomp and the pride of their worldly estate—
Walk down in your patches, and find if you can,
Who opens a pew to a moneyless man!

Go look to yon judge in his dark-flowing gown,
With the scales wherein law weigheth equity down,
Where he frowns on the weak, and smiles on the strong,
And punishes right, while he justifies wrong;
Where jurors their lips on the Bible have laid,
To render a verdict they've already made—
Go there, in the court-room, and find, if you can,
Any law for the cause of a moneyless man!

Go look in the banks, where Mammon has told
His hundreds and thousands of silver and gold;
Where, safe from the hands of the starving and poor,
Lies pile upon pile of the glittering ore;
Walk up to the counter—ah, there you may stay,
Till your limbs grow old and your hair turns grey,
And you'll find at the banks no one of the clan
With money to lend to a moneyless man!

Then go to your hovel; no raven has fed
The wife who has suffered too long for her bread:
Kneel down by her pallet, and kiss the death frost
From the lips of the angel your poverty lost:
Then turn in your agony upward to God,
And bless, while it smites you, the chastening rod;
And you'll find at the end of your life's little span,
There's a welcome above for a moneyless man!

[We would add the following stanzas as but embodying the simple truth.]

Not only "above," but also on earth,
Is there one spot, at least, "where virtue hath birth—
Where bosoms in mercy and kindness will heave,
And the poor and the wretched shall 'ask and receive.'"
It is charity's home, 'neath the Mystical Arch,
Where peace, love, and unity constantly march.
Go there—give the grand hailing sign—if you can:
A welcome you'll find—though a moneyless man.

No outward adornments; no ancestral name;
No money or bonds; no titular fame,
An entrance can gain to that sacred retreat,

Where, on the true points of fellowship, brethren meet.
On one common level—tried by the same plumb,
Are all who within those precincts e'er come:
Due and truly prepared must all be; nor can
The door remain closed 'gainst a moneyless man.

The Mission of Masonry.

Its True, Fundamental, and Essential Idea.

[Extract from annual address G. Mas. of New Jersey.]

The Institution of Freemasonry is not only a mystery and a paradox to the uninitiated, but the conceptions which are entertained of it by the initiated themselves are frequently unfounded and erroneous. So many and various are the errors into which many of the brethren have fallen, upon this subject, that I deem it not improper to trespass upon your patience, for a short time, with some reflections upon what I consider the true idea of the Masonic Institution, and the aims and objects of our Fraternity.

I remark, in the first place, that the Masonic lodge is not the church, or a substitute for it.

The Mason who subordinates the church to the lodge, errs, and errs grievously. Each has its proper mission and appropriate sphere. But the mission of the church is higher and more sacred than that of our Fraternity. Masonry is of human origin; it claims no divine commission. It does not profess to be able to reconcile God and man; it is powerless to change the human heart; it can not save a soul from death. These are the prerogatives of Omnipotence:

"From David's lips this word did roll,
'Tis true and living yet,
No MAN can save his brother's soul,
Or pay his brother's debt."

The mission of Masonry is rather with the present than with the hereafter, rather with things temporal than things eternal. Its labors and influences are directed to ameliorate the conditions of human life. It seeks to open the fountains of benevolence, to make the selfish man less selfish, the avaricious man less grasping, to soften the hard heart, and to bring the erring back into the path of duty. It stretches out its hands to succor the needy and the orphan, to dry the widow's tears, to cause the sun to shine where shadow had rested, to make life a joy, not a burden, and to smooth the pillow of suffering and death. It concedes to the church the more honored, influential, and sacred position, but strives, in its own peculiar way, and by its own peculiar influences, as a handmaid of the church, to assist her in every good and perfect work.

Secondly, it is not the sole, primary, and fundamental object of the Masonic Institution to enforce personal morality.

I hold that Masonry is a necessity to the human race, and that it answers a longing of humanity which no other society, lay or ecclesiastical, meets and satisfies. But If its sole object is to inculcate personal morality, then it is not a necessity, for there are other organizations which can do that work as well, and better. The church can enforce purity of life and conduct, not only by its influence, but by the added sanction of Divine command. No tables of law were ever committed to the Masonic Fraternity, as such, amid the thunders of Sinai. Far be it from me to assert that Masonry does not demand from its votaries a moral and exemplary life and conversation. The pithy and comprehensive statement that Freemasonry is "a beautiful system of morality, veiled in allegory, and illustrated by symbols," shall not receive contradiction from me. There is hardly an object in inanimate nature which does not teach, to the thoughtful Mason, some great and important lesson of morality. He realizes the idea of the poet, and finds "sermons in stones." But we are now seeking for the essential and primary idea of our society, and my assertion is, that the enforcement of personal morality is not the corner-stone of the Masonic temple.

Thirdly, the Masonic Fraternity is not, primarily, a charitable society.

The same argument may be applied to this proposition as to the last, that if the sole object of our Fraternity be charity, there is no necessity for its existence, and its annihilation would create no void in the world. Everywhere the streams of active benevolence are flowing. In this day, no man with charitable impulses need look long for an opportunity for their exercise. On all sides are asylums for the widow and orphan, homes for the destitute, hospitals for the sick, schools for the poor. Never, since the development of modern civilization commenced, have the feet of charity been so ready to run on their errand of mercy, and the hand of wealth so lavish in the distribution of its means. Sorrow has but to make itself known, and the angels fly to its relief. And it must be admitted, with shame and mortification, that the charitable man, seeking for some plan of systematic benevolence, some avenue through which his charity would be conferred only on those worthy to receive it, would not select the Masonic Fraternity to be the almoner of his bounty.

What, then, is the true, fundamental, and essential idea of our Institution?

I hold that the central idea of Masonry, the foundation stone upon which the superstructure rests, is the recognition and practical application of the great principle of the universal brotherhood of man. Whether he drew his first breath amid polar snows, or under the burning suns of the tropics; whether he owe political allegiance to an empire, a kingdom, or a republic; whether he be clad in the purple of Dives, or the rags of Lazarus; whether his skin be bleached with the hue of the Caucasian, or be clouded with the "shadowed livery of the burnished sun;" whether he worship his God in a Methodist meeting-house, an Episcopal church, a Catholic cathedral, a Jewish synagogue, or a Mohammedan mosque; the great lesson which Masonry teaches to its votaries is, that "a man's a man for a' that." Creeds and forms of faith are good in their places. I have but little faith in the professor of religion without a creed. Love of country is a glorious and beautiful thing in its place, and one of the noblest passions that can animate the human breast. "If I forget thee, O, Jerusalem! let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee in the time of my trouble, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth." Political preferences and affiliations are good things in their places. He is unworthy of his birthright as a citizen of this republic, who has not fixed views upon the great questions of public policy which agitate the State and country. But the great heart of humanity, weary of the unceasing and harrassing strife of this busy and selfish world, where longs for some common platform, where rumors of contentions on these and kindred subjects can never reach it more. And this eager longing of the human heart, the Masonic Institution alone can satisfy. Here, we are all citizens of one country, which is the great globe itself; members of one family, which is the entire human race; children of one father, which is God. And this, as I conceive, is the true idea of the Institution of Masonry.

"The natural bond
Of brotherhood is severed as the flax
That falls asunder at the touch of fire,"

I have said that Masonry was not the church, or a substitute for it; that its primary object was not the enforcement of personal morality, and that it was not a charitable society. Now I say that it follows, as subordinate and incidental to the main design of the Masonic Institution, that the perfect Mason (rara avis in terris) should be a religious man, in the primary acceptation of that term; he should be a moral man, and he should be a charitable man.

He should be a religious man, because the true idea of our society recognizes the existence of God, and insists, as a preliminary condition to initiation, upon an acknowledgment of the candidate's belief in Deity. The great light of Masonry is the Holy Bible. Besides, the cultivation of true religion will better enable us to fulfill the obligations we have assumed, and discharge the duties we owe to the Craft. "Pure religion, and undefiled before God and the Father, is this—to visit the fatherless and the widows in their affliction, and to keep yourselves unspotted from the world."

He should be a moral man, because the obligations imposed upon him by the relation in which Masonry places him towards his fellow man can not be properly fulfilled, except by the cultivation and practice of the moralities of life. The great Pythagoras has said, that "all the maxims of morality might be referred to the duties which men owe to themselves, and the duties which they owe to each other." When we talk of the immoralities of men, we are apt to restrict the full meaning of the term, and confine its significance only to the more glaring vices. But morality is defined to be "the doctrine or system of moral duties, or the duties of men in their social characters." So that the moral man, in his social relations, should not only be free from prominent deviations from the path of rectitude, but he should also exemplify the virtues of friendship, courtesy, forgiveness, hospitality, patience, forbearance, gentleness, gratitude, brotherly love, relief, and truth. And it is the exercise of this latter class of positive virtues, that the relation of brotherhood, in which we stand to each other, more particularly requires.

And he should be a charitable man.

The practice of charity is incumbent upon all men, but the principle of brotherhood, which, as I have said, is the foundation stone of our Institution, more especially enjoins it upon us. As we bring the human race into closer relation, the obligation of benevolence increases, and the opportunities for the practice of this virtue become more numerous. Men frequently find obstacles in the way of a free exercise of their charitable impulses towards worthy objects. Personal pride, a natural feeling of independence, an unwillingness to incur obligations which can not be repaid, sometimes obstruct the avenues of charity. Some men, who would cheerfully accept and who would invite the assistance of a brother, would starve before they would receive the charity of a stranger. So, when we bring men upon a common platform, when the needy realizes that his neighbor is his brother, and that all men are sharers in a common human fate, these obstacles vanish. Charity is a duty enjoined upon Masons by the genius of the Institution, and by the explicit injunction of Masonry's great light. Nowhere is its importance more prominently set forth than in the description which that book gives of the events of the last day, when the denizens of the earth shall be divided into two companies, and the blessed of the Father will be invited to inherit the Kingdom. And what is the reason which is given for this exceeding great reward? Because ye kept every jot and tittle of my law? Because ye built my churches? Because ye were orthodox in your theological views? Because ye "paid tithes of mint, anise, and cummin?" Not so. But because "I was an hunger, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me."

Viewed in the light in which I have discussed it, what a thing of beauty is the Institution of Freemasonry. It is not an ingenious theory, a useless speculation, or a fanciful invention to amuse its votaries and to enlist the researches of the antiquarian. It is eminently practical in its designs and operations, and carefully adapted to the wants, weaknesses, and aspirations, of human nature. It applies the principle of the family relation, in all its beauty and attractiveness, to the entire human race. Recognizing God as the Father, it teaches that all men are brethren, and inculcates the exercise, towards all, of those virtues which adorn and knit together the domestic circle—

> "For so the whole round earth is every way > Bound by gold chains about the feet of God."

And now, my brethren, I glean for every one of you, from these remarks, a lesson for the year. Deal gently with thy brother. If temptation overcome him, deal gently with thy brother. If the frailty of human nature cause him to deviate from the path of rectitude, deal gently with thy brother. If, amid the busy scenes of the outer world, the excitement and turmoil of life's battle, or under the burden of pressing cares, or in the relaxation of social intercourse, he shall, for the moment, forget his obligations and duties to the Craft, deal gently with thy brother. There is much that is good in the world. Be generous in your judgment of all; be hopeful in your hopes of all.

These are the last words which I shall be privileged to utter to you from this Grand East. The gavel which you entrusted to me four years ago, I am about to surrender to that one of my brethren whom you, by your suffrages, shall designate. A retrospect of these four years awakens in my breast mingled feelings of pleasure and regret; pleasure, from a recollection of the many acts of kindness and brotherly love of which I have been the recipient; regret, that I have come so far short of the high standard of excellence which this station requires. But if I may feel satisfied that my administration of the affairs of this grand lodge has met your approbation, the earnest desire of my heart will be gratified.

> "Life counts not hours by joys and pangs,
> But just by duties done."
> "And when I lie in the green kirk yard,
> With the mould upon my breast,
> Say not that 'he did well or ill,'
> Only 'he did his best.'"

Correspondence.

Masonic College.

Editor Masonic Trowel:

The circular addressed by Knoxville Lodge No. 66 to the several lodges of the State, and published in the Masonic journals, relating to the establishment of a school, contains several points which give evidence of careful consideration on the part of the committee from whom it emanated, and which will commend themselves to the thoughtful reader.

Four ideas seem to underlie the whole: First, that the Fraternity ought to provide permanent and always available means whereby the orphans of indigent Masons may derive positive advantage from the funds paid into the lodge by their fathers. Second, that education furnishes such advantage, at once inexpensive, far-reaching, and enduring. Third, that, in providing for such education, no additional tax should be imposed upon the Craft—a portion of the ordinary revenues being diverted to that purpose. Fourth, that the school should be amply endowed, or certain means of endowment provided, before any money should be expended.

In regard to the first, there can not, by any possibility, be any difference of opinion. A fundamental idea in the Master Mason's degree is the provision, not only for one's own family, but also for a brother, and those near and dear to him. That the payment of dues into the lodge fund is intended and understood to create a positive right to benefits, resulting from their expenditure, not only present, but future, is clear from the rules relating to non-affiliated Masons. That this contemplated benefit is, under existing circumstances, uncertain and unequal, is within the cognizance of every lodge; it is further evidenced by the fact that some lodges, both grand and subordinate, set apart a portion of their funds for charitable purposes, while others do not. This further indicates a prevailing impression, that positive aid ought at all times to be available.

In reference to the second, it may be said that, in the ordinary bestowment of charity, as soon as the sum of money appropriated is expended, its benefits cease, or at most are of limited duration, and there remains the same necessity for renewed appropriations. But money expended in the establishment of a school such as is contemplated, is a permanent investment—never needing renewal, never exhausted, never growing less in value, but, by a natural law, constantly attracting to itself, and permanently holding, additional means of good—not unlike the magnet which attracts and appropriates unattached particles, gaining increased strength thereby, and communicating its own powers to its new acquisitions. As every appropriation of money for such a purpose is permanent for good, the same fund furnishes means of aid to many individuals at the same time, and to successive classes of individuals, as one generation succeeds another, throughout all time. Again, a class graduating from such a school, after a few years sojourn, not only leaves the fund which educated them undiminished, but virtually augmented; for each mind in that class, strengthened by education, disciplined in the way and manner of carrying conviction, becomes a living power amidst its surroundings, every member, enabled thereby to exert greater influence, earning Master's wages, and quickened by an ever present sense of gratitude, would in after years add to the fund—some ten, some an hundred fold. It is therefore less expensive than any other method.

Third, the method suggested of raising the required funds, obviates an objection which naturally arises on the presentation of such a project. No additional burden is to be imposed upon the members of the Fraternity. Subscriptions in addition to ordinary dues are not contemplated, additions to regular fees are not proposed; on the contrary, it is only sought to apply a moderate portion of the usual and regular revenues of each lodge to a useful purpose. Perhaps the history of every lodge in the State, of any considerable age, furnishes instances of the application of funds to purposes of questionable expediency, simply because there was no great and worthy object to which they could be applied. Such funds, if brought together, would go far towards establishing a collegiate institution.

Fourth, the rock upon which so many educational enterprises have been wrecked, seems to have been perceived by the authors of the circular in question; for they contemplate raising an endowment fund by the same means proposed for securing money for the erection of the buildings; thereby securing stability and efficiency to the institution. In doing this, effectual provision is made against future appeals, either to individual Masons or to lodges, for funds to meet emergencies, and also against difficulties of any kind arising from want of money to sustain the institution.

The committee were evidently governed by the strictest rules of prudence in preparing their estimates. They have estimated the cost of buildings at a much higher figure than necessary, and the revenue to be derived from the lodges at less than would probably accrue. They estimate buildings, &c., at $60,000; whereas, $30,000 would be ample for a beginning. It would undoubtedly be the part of wisdom to commence with moderate expenditures, inasmuch as additional funds would be readily and voluntarily supplied after the institution had established itself in the affections of the Fraternity. The returns for the year 1867 shed additional light on this subject, and supply data by which every one can convince himself of the practicability of the plan.

Estimates slightly different from those of the committee, predicated upon the returns of 1867, give the following results: There are 313 lodges in the State having a membership ranging from 40 to 300. If these lodges should appropriate from their revenues for the current year an average of $100, the $30,000 would be raised. Next year let the remaining 247 weaker lodges join with these, and appropriate $100 each—that is 560 lodges, at $100 each, making $56,000. The next year, there would be 600 lodges; let them appropriate $75 each, making $45,000. Put this in tabular form, thus:

1867–8	313 lodges, at $100 each..................	$31,300.00
1868–9	560 lodges, at $100 each..................	56,000.00
1869–70	600 lodges, at $75 each..................	45,000.00
	Total in three years..............................	$132,300.00

Thus, in the short space of three years, the Master Masons of Illinois, without imposing any perceptible burden upon themselves, could establish a college, and endow it with a fund yielding an annual revenue of at least $10,000. Add to this the sums which other Masonic bodies would appropriate, and the success of the enterprise seems assured beyond a doubt.

One word, Mr. Editor, in regard to location, and your patience shall not be further trespassed upon. It should be a fundamental principle that everything required about the institution should be paid for, at a fair valuation. Hence, the question of donations by different communities to secure its location would not enter into consideration. Untrammelled by this source of embarrassment and bitterness, the parties entrusted with that duty, looking only to the greatest good for the greatest number, would locate it where the interests of the Fraternity would be most effectually promoted.

The project seems at once feasible, judicious, and worthy.

February 17, 1868.

From Philadelphia.

Dear Trowel:

It gives me pleasure to bear my testimony to the excellence of your paper, which can not fail to be of substantial benefit to the brethren among whom it circulates.

In several matters, your grand lodge regulations vary from ours, just as your work does; but the same grand principles prevail, and we strive to reach the same goal, though by slightly different means.

Masonry, with me, has, from from my first connection with it, been a subject of study and close attention. The more I learn of it, the stronger becomes my attachment for all that truly pertains to it. I am persuaded that we do elevate the characters of our brethren, to whose sympathies we can have access; and though there are idlers in the vineyard, the greater number labor earnestly for the common good.

Last year it was my honor to occupy the Master's station in Girard Mark Lodge, here, which numbers over eleven hundred contributing and life members. To say that mere harmony prevails among such a large body of men, would hardly do the lodge justice. The candidates upon whom the honorary degree of Mark Master was conferred in 1867, counted two hundred and fifty. The officers were all personal friends, between whom the utmost cordiality and brotherly kindness existed; and the brethren showed that they were in full accord therewith.

Religion, and especially Christianity, untrammeled by untoward outside influences, keeps in subjection the natural frowardness of man. And yet, we rarely find a church organization of a thousand or more active members, working vigorously, harmoniously, and with mutual forbearance between the rulers. Is there nothing in Freemasonry?

It may not be amiss in me to remind you that our own Masonic paper, The Keystone, is flourishing, and becoming more and more acceptable to the brethren.

With my very warmest wishes for your long-continued prosperity and usefulness, I am, with great respect,

Fraternally and truly yours,

J. H.

BRETHREN—Your last TROWEL admonishes me that my subscription needs renewing. You say, "We hope you are pleased with THE TROWEL," etc. Of course we are, that is to say, our humble self, our better half, and daughter. We think it one of the best family papers extant, and Masonically it has no equal. I expect to read it so long as the G. A. O. T. U. permits me to "spread the cement of brotherly love," and I hereby inclose two years' subscription, Fraternally, G. P. R.

Visit to Chicago.

Having been notified to attend the meeting of the Grand Chapter Committee on Work, at Chicago, I started on 24th February, and after a pleasant ride over the Chicago & St. Louis R. R., landed at half-past eight P. M. at the "Tremont," where we met P. G. H. P. Hubbard, and soon Comps. Egan, Munn, Miner, Pearson, and Lininger, together with Comp. and Gen. Hurlbut. Labor having been dispensed with for that day, we retired.

Next morning we visited the scene of the late fire on Lake street, which, even at that early hour, presented a lively aspect—a great many laborers being employed in clearing away the rubbish.

Hard work all day Tuesday. Wednesday, at work all day until interrupted by a visitation from M. E. Comp. Bennett, H. P. Washington Chapter No. 43.

In the evening "all of us" visited Oriental Lodge Hall, where we found William B. Warren 209 in session, Bro. Shattuck, Senior Warden, presiding; tarrying but a few moments, under guidance of Comp. Egan we made our way to Blaney Hall, where we found Blaney 271 at labor. Here we met Breth. Carpenter (W. M. 271) and Cregier, the genial S. G. W. Leaving there, we started for the Tremont, where Comp. Pearson and myself halted, while the rest of the party proceeded to Kilwinning Hall, where Corinthian Chapter No. 69 was at labor. We understand that Comp. Hubbard conferred the Mark degree on that occasion. As he has conferred that degree several times, to our certain knowledge, it is fair to presume that it was done well.

Thursday evening, attended a sociable given by Hesperia Lodge No. 411, at Crosby's Music Hall, having received an invitation from Comp. Bennett, "Head manager and Grand Panjandrum thereof." Here we met Breth. Cregier, Bennett, Swan, Gibson, and several others, whom we do not now remember.

Saturday morning we started home, arrived here same evening, somewhat tired with hard work and hard riding. DEPUTY.

Illinois Criminal Code.

The courts, lawyers, law officers, and magistrates of Illinois, have long felt the want of a suitable work which should combine, in one book, all the criminal laws of Illinois.

This want is now supplied. E. L. Gross, Esq., of this city, has prepared a Digest of the Criminal Laws of Illinois, from its organization as a State, in 1818, down to the present time.

The criminal code, and all our criminal laws, are arranged under appropriate divisions, with the decisions of the Supreme Court in foot-notes on each page, and the whole is so admirably prepared that, by the aid of a copious table of contents, any portion of the criminal law, applicable to any criminal offense, can be found almost at a glance, and this, too, in municipal corporations, as well as in relation to offenses against our statutes or at common law. A complete list of forms in criminal cases is given for justices and clerks—forty-nine for justices and sixty-eight for clerks.

The work is indorsed and recommended by the Judges of the Supreme Court, Judges Rice, Green, Haynie, and Broadwell, and by Messrs. John T. Stuart, B. S. Edwards, John A. McClernand, John M. Palmer, Milton Hay, J. C. Conkling, W. M. Springer, J. H. Matheny, and C. C. Brown, all able lawyers in this city, and is a monument to the legal ability, patience, and genius of the author. Chief Justice Breese says:

> "I approve highly your plan, and am of opinion it will be of great service to the profession and to all who are required to enforce the code."

Every man is supposed to know the law, and none are permitted to plead ignorance of it. The work embraces 325 pages, is well bound in law binding, and furnished by the author, E. L. Gross, at $5.00. Every one concerned in criminal law should have it, and every citizen will consult his own true interest by having it in his family library.

United States Musical Review.

This is a large quarto monthly publication of 32 pages, with a four-page cover besides. The literary and editorial articles embrace twelve pages, are of a high order of merit, and worthy of an insertion in any magazine. Ten pages are devoted to music, and ten pages to a general description, and advertisement of music sheets, works, and books, and musical instruments. The same is true of the covers. It is a high-toned journal, and worthy of a place in every household. Published by J. L. Peters, 200 Broadway, New York, at $2.00 per annum.

Handsome inducements are offered to clubs, teachers, clergymen, postmasters, and others, which can be ascertained upon application to the publisher.

The Kentucky Freemason

Is a new Masonic monthly, same form and size of TROWEL, published at Frankfort, Ky., by R. W. Bro. A. G. Hodges, Grand Treasurer, and edited by the publisher and Rev. H. A. M. Henderson and a talented array of contributors. If the initial number betokens the future character and power of the Kentucky Freemason, it will have no superior, and our brother laborers may look well to their laurels. We give several extracts in this number. It equals the best in paper, mechanical genius, and proper distribution of matter, and is published for the reasonable price of $1.50 per annum.

Knox County Directory.

Bro. J. L. Dewey, box 832, Galesburg, Ill., has sent us a specimen sheet of the Knox County Directory, filled with valuable information, and used as a superior mode of advertising. The specimen before us surpasses in style and paper any directory we have yet seen. He proposes to publish county directories in first-class order, and we commend him to the favorable consideration of all interested in so convenient and ready a mode of reference.

STIMPSON'S SCIENTIFIC PENS.—We have tried the triple-fine, extra-fine, fine, medium, engrossing, and triple-coarse pens, invented and patented by Geo. Stimpson, and manufactured and sold by A. S. Barnes & Co., general agents, 111 and 113 William street, New York. They will hold more ink than any pen in use, and we, being a judge, like them very much, and hope they, with the holder, will command an extensive sale.

THE CHICAGO HOME CIRCLE.—It is suggestive of every thing that is kind, gentle, and loving. The articles are well written, take a wide range, and the topics tend to elevate and refine the home. It is a choice fireside companion, and ought to be welcome in every family. Published monthly by S. M. Kennedy, 194 Clark street, Chicago, at $1.00 per annum, in advance.

Illness of G. Sec. Chas. A. Fuller.

It is with much regret that we learn, by private letter, of the protracted illness of the Grand Secretary of Tennessee. His labors have been long and arduous, and we deeply sympathize with him on his bed of suffering.

Thanks to Senator Yates, and Hons. J. A. Logan, L. W. Ross, S. M. Cullom, H. P. H. Bromwell, and A. G. Burr, for public documents.

Wrongful Acts Committed Before Initiation.

It is now the settled law of this jurisdiction that a man who has been made a Mason is liable to discipline for infamous acts and and misconduct committed or performed previously to his initiation. We regret to say that in some jurisdictions a different rule prevails. In New York the basis of the law is that a man can be cut off from Masonic membership if he is unworthy of being hailed and received as a brother Mason, as soon as his unworthiness has been discovered. The Grand Muster of Tennessee, at the last communication of that lodge, presented to the grand lodge of that State the following case:

"A man who stood in fair repute in his community, sustaining an official relation with his church, applies to a lodge for initiation. A committee is appointed, who carefully investigate his character, and report it to be unexceptionable. He is elected, and regularly receives the degrees in Masonry. He is, apparently, a devoted and worthy Mason; but suddenly it is disclosed that about a year previous to his initiation he committed the offense of grand larceny, and that he paid a negro the sum of twenty dollars to aid him in the commission of the crime. He carefully concealed from the public his connection with the offense, and with the full conviction that he had succeeded in doing so, he files his petition and receives the three first degrees in Masonry.

"It may be said by some, that he was put upon trial before his initiation by having his character submitted to the scrutiny of a committee, and that it would be great injustice, after having thus acquitted him of all offense and declared him worthy, to subject him to the disgrace of expulsion from the lodge. But the facts of his case do not appeal to our sympathies, nor entitle him to our charities. He lived under a guilty conscience, and, by his false pretenses and the concealment of his crime, he has perpetrated a fraud upon the lodge and acquired fellowship with Masons. There are other cases of a similar character, and still others may arise; and, as a remedy for this particular evil, I respectfully suggest the adoption and promulgation of the following edict:

"'A Mason who is proven to have committed, before his initiation, any crime declared to be infamous by the laws of the State, and to have concealed the same in such manner that it could not be known at the time of his initiation, shall be expelled from all the rights and privileges of Masonry.'

"This does not apply to bad habits previously indulged in, nor simple immoral conduct, nor does it meet the evil in reference to other offenses of a higher degree; but it is perhaps as far as it is prudent for the grand lodge to go in retrospective action, and if it is not a panacea, it is at least a specific, and will save us from association with thieves, highwaymen, and assassins, and that class of persons whose crimes know no palliation, and whose names are a disgrace to humanity."—N. Y. Dispatch.

It can not be denied that Masonry has progressed very rapidly for the last twenty years. It has tended toward a condition of popularity that was never intended by its founders, and which is utterly inconsistent with its nature. Masonry was never designed to be a popular institution. No secret society can seek popularity without being corrupted and eventually destroyed. It is the exclusiveness of the association that has preserved it; and to render it popular is to expose it to a vicissitude more calamitous than any it has passed through since it became a distinct and efficient organization. In this respect, and in some others, Masonry is like the church; it prospers most when let alone, or when abused and persecuted.—Freemasons' Magazine.

Impressive Masonic Ceremony.

A very interesting and impressive ceremony took place on Sunday afternoon, March 1st, at Trinity church, city of New York—the adoption of a daughter of the Masonic Fraternity. The origin of this important event is as follows: About a year since a very respectable man and wife came to this country from England. Shortly after their arrival the husband was taken sick, and, being unknown, fell into great distress, so much so that, when he died, his remains were buried in the Potter's Field. Shortly after, the wife gave birth to a daughter, and then the fact was ascertained that the unfortunate man had been a Freemason, a secret that he had kept entirely to himself and wife. The body was at once disinterred, and subsequently buried in Greenwood Cemetery with proper Masonic honors. Soon after, the mother died, leaving the infant, but nine days old, to the charity of the world. Two lodges in the city of New York, Americus and Crescent, together with the "Masonic Board of Relief," took charge of the child, and placed it in the hands of a nurse. The Sisters of Alpha Chapter No. 1, of the Eastern Star, having been very recently informed of the above facts, some of them determined to visit the child, and found that the nurse had not properly attended to the duty for which she had been paid; and they resolved to remove the child, and to look after its future welfare. Nimble fingers and skillful hands soon furnished a complete wardrobe, and yesterday the little orphan girl, now nine months old, was presented in attire fitted for the child of the wealthiest in the land. The seats nearest the altar were set apart for the Fraternity, their only distinction from others being the emblems which they wore. Alpha Chapter No. 1, S. of E. S., was well represented, as were also Crescent, Americus, and Putnam Lodges, F. & A. M. W. Bro. Merriam, of Crescent Lodge, had charge of the arrangements, and the following ladies officiated on the occasion: Mrs. Geo. W. Dilks, wife of W. Bro. Dilks, P. M. of Eureka; Mrs. Reed, wife of Bro. Dr. Reed, of Washington; Mrs. Thos. L. Asten, wife of Bro. Asten, of Eureka; and Mrs. William Johnson, wife of Bro. Johnson, of Americus; the two first named ladies being the President and Vice President of the chapter before mentioned. The ceremony took place shortly after the reading of the second lesson, the Rev. Dr. Ogilvie officiating, and the name given to the child was "Jane Merriam Americus," thus enabling her to bear to the grave a memento of the means by which she had been saved from destitution and perhaps death. Dr. Ogilvie subsequently preached a sermon from Mark x., 13: "They brought young children to Jesus," &c., during which he impressed on the sponsors the duty which they had undertaken, the result of which, he said, according to the manner in which they carried out the obligations, would either be sublime and eternal, or prove a sad and fearful mockery.

Masonic Matters in Cuba.

Some short time since, we informed our readers of the fact that the police, by order of the government authorities in Cuba, had made a descent upon a Masonic lodge in Havana, and arrested its members, as also that another lodge at the same place, on hearing of the crusade, ceased its meetings. The following extract from a letter received from a brother, formerly an active member of a lodge in this city, but now a resident of Puerto Principe, Cuba, will be found interesting, and throw some light on the subject:

"In this island they have undertaken to build up Masonry, despite the opposition of the government, and I will tell you what occurred at Sagua la Grande, where a lodge was started with the Governor of the place as Master. The authorities found it out, arrested the Master, and sent him off the island to Old Spain, but would not allow his family to accompany him. The members of the Craft, however, got secretly together, and raised $700 for him on the spot, and have agreed to make him a monthly allowance of $100, pledging themselves also to take care of his family. During his sentence in Havana, there were seven lodges in existence, and they were also surprised, and several arrests made. In this city a lodge was started in August last. I attended a preliminary meeting in a room about six feet square, on a second floor; after that they procured another room for their regular meetings, about twelve feet square, with all the doors and windows shut up. You can imagine what the heat was in such a confined place, when you consider that the thermometer was 95 outside. The members had to go in one at a time, and at some distance from each other, and adopt the same rule leaving the lodge. The increase of members was so large that they have since procured a large house, the doors and windows of which they have walled up, and fitted it up splendidly at an expense of three hundred doubloons. I attended the first meeting, but they were only able to hold one more, when the police entered, and arrested the keeper, the Master, and three or four more, who were subsequently allowed to go on parole. As I now write, the police are taking everything out of the lodge-room, and strict orders have been sent to them from headquarters to leave no stone unturned to discover where Masons meet, so as to crush Masonry in this island. Under such circumstances, it will be difficult to establish Masonry in Cuba.—N. Y. Courier.

Michigan.

We have received, at a late day, the elegant address of the Grand Master of Michigan, and shall take great pleasure in noticing it largely hereafter. For the present, we give the following extract:

On the evening of the same day I visited Monroe Lodge No. 27, installed its officers privately, and delivered a public address in the city hall, after which I united with the brethren of this lodge and Eureka Lodge No. 107 in a most sumptuous banquet, prepared for the occasion. Masonry is most prosperous in the city of Monroe. These two lodges embrace among its members many of the most distinguished and influential citizens, while impressions favorable to our Order are rapidly increasing. Our W. Bro. A. J. Sawyer, W. M., who has proved a most efficient working member of the grand lodge, was re-elected W. M. of Monroe Lodge, and our Bro. Hurd, of Eureka Lodge.

The Grand Lodge of Saxony refuses to hold Masonic intercourse with the Grand Lodge of Belgium until the latter shall forbid the discussion of religious and political questions in its lodges. This is right, and of more importance than it at first appears to be. There has been for some years past a tendency in the continental lodges to infidelity; or, more correctly speaking, the infidels connected with them have been directing their influence and talents to give to them the character of infidel clubs, by excluding from their altars the Bible, and from their rituals every reference to a spiritual religion or the existence of God. These efforts have been so far successfully resisted by the Grand Orient of France, and it is to be hoped and presumed that they will meet with the same fate in all the other grand lodges, though we are inclined to believe that the infidel party is in the ascendency all over the continent. At all events, it is strong, powerful, and talented, particularly in France and the German States. It must be kept out of Masonry, for it will kill it wherever it obtains a foothold. The two can not live together.—Freemason's Magazine.

LL.D.—An honorable affix when properly and worthily bestowed—a folly and a disgrace when self-appropriated by mountebanks for purposes of imposition, or accepted at the hands of such by better men, for the gratification of an inordinate vanity.—Freemason's Magazine.

Panama is one of the great commercial ports of the world. Twenty-two steamers arrive at it and leave it every month for different parts of the world.

Masonry Universal.

We have written many articles on this subject, and have read more. The following extract from an address recently delivered before one of the Provincial grand lodges of England, by an East Indian, the R. W. Bro. Manockjee Curtsetjee, Provincial Grand Master of Western India, is another proof—if proof is needed—of the adaptability of Freemasonry to wants and practice of all men, of whatever religion they may be, so long as they believe in the existence of one ever living and true God. In one part of the brother's address, he said :

" If they required a practical living illustration of Masonry, they could find it in their present gathering. There was himself, a man from the far East, professing a different creed from them, though worshiping the one true, living God, cordially and fraternally welcomed in their midst; but, notwithstanding they differed in creed, in their mode of worship they did not forget that they were all the children of the same parent—in their hallowed Order they were all brothers. Masonry knew no distinction of color, caste, creed; but thère was one distinction which it did recognize, and that was the distinction of morality. They had heard that day from two of the brethren present an admirable address and an admirable sermon, and it had delighted him intensely to hear the precepts of Masonry so beautifully illustrated; but he might, perhaps, be allowed to go a little further in illustration of the beauty, of the benevolence, of the usefulness, of the utility of their Fraternity. What an amount of misfortune, bloodshed, and ruin had been brought about in the world in the name of religion?

"It might be a question whether more lives had been sacrificed under the banners of the Cross or under the banners of the Crescent; but there was no question that in the name of religion there had been more butchery than under either. That was a great mystery, and the Great Architect of the Universe alone knew why it had been. Now, he would ask—he would demand—any one to give a solitary instance in which that hideous charge could be brought to the door of Masonry. Religion, as it would really appear, was strife; but Masonry was peace. It always carried with it the olive branch. But Masonry, like religion, should not only be read and heard of in lodges—it should be studied and practiced. People outside said that Masonry was a mystery, and so it was a mystery. But Lord Byron had beautifully said, in reference to the Inspired Volume, that therein lay the mystery of mysteries. In the works of Providence, in animated nature, and in everything else, the bold working of His hand was to be seen; but yet they were a mystery to them all. God's omnipotence, His power, His mercy, were to them all a mystery. The tesselated pavement showed in a beautiful manner the checkered life of mankind—its ups and downs, its miseries and misfortunes, its joyfulness and its gladness, all come alternately, one after the other—light and darkness, virtue and vice, as he might venture to say. If there were no vices, how could they estimate the value of virtues? and if there were no virtue, vice must spread over all the world. There again, then, was a mystery. But still, they knew that nothing came amiss from the Great Architect of the Universe, and everything that He did had an object which, while it seemed to do evil in one direction, did good in another. He would give them an illustration. About two months ago he happened to be at Fulham Palace, the residence of the Bishop of London, enjoying a walk on the lawn. A shower of rain came on. His lordship said, " What a misfortune!" " Yes," he replied, " it is a misfortune; but what is a misfortune to us is a fortune to the shoeblack and the cabman." (Laughter.) The mysterious working of the hand of Providence were in no way more clearly demonstrated than in the revolution of empires and the vicissitudes of kings. There was mystery in that, because they could not see what was coming on before them. The knowledge of the Great Architect of the Universe was as the great ocean, which stood out before them as they stood on the shore, and their own knowledge, compared with His mystery, His power, and His greatness, were as but a single drop in that great ocean. Really and truly, there was in that a mystery which it was beyond their comprehension to trace out. Now, Masonry taught three useful things. It taught, as they all know, charity and brotherly love; but there was another thing it taught, and that was fortitude. It taught them to take everything as it came, relying on the Great Architect of the Universe, and on the firm belief that nothing could come amiss from His superior wisdom. He would give them an illustration of the principle of charity. It was said that Mohammed interdicted the drinking of wine as a heinous offense—that he not only prohibited the drinking of wine, but declared that if a drop of liquor dropped upon the ground, and a blade of grass was eaten by a goat, it was not permissible to eat the flesh of goat. The larger portion of the population of Bombay were Musselmen, and yet they were the great liquor consumers. (Laughter.) That was another mystery to him. (Renewed laughter.) A learned annotator of the Musselman creed—he was not a Musselman, let them bear in mind—had said that, although the drinking of wine was prohibited, they could drink as much as they liked, as God was so merciful that, if they repented of their transgressions of His law, He would forgive them. The Koran said they must not desecrate the Sacred Volume, but burn it; and His mercy is so great, His benevolence so unbounded, that, perchance, he might forgive them. The Musselman might neglect to perform all the religious duties imposed upon him, and God was so merciful that He might, perhaps, forgive him; but notwithstanding all this forbearance, there was one thing He would never, never forgive—that was an injury to mankind by words, acts, or thoughts. In fact, it said, in one single, sublime sentence, " Do unto others as you would they should do unto you." That was Masonry. Masonry was a helpmate to religion. If a man was a good Christian, Masonry made him a better one; if he was a better Christian, it would make him the best of Christians. But Masonry would never make a good man a bad one. Masonry was a thing not only to be talked about, but to be practiced, and charity consisted not alone in having regard to the wants of mankind generally, and an obligated brother in particular, but charity was also the forgiveness of your enemies for the worst offenses. It was not charity to give money that your name might be published in the papers. Their aim in relieving distress should be not to let the left hand know what the right hand did. If the man who had done them the worst amount of injury—had, say, attempted their life, and done everything possible to injure their prospects, should at any time get into their clutches, and a shake would dispatch him, let them say to him, " Forget the past—don't think about it; you are my brother and I can assist you." That was charity, and that was the charity which Masonry encouraged." He thanked them, in conclusion, for giving him the opportunity of expressing his humble ideas as to Masonry, and for showing that it was an Institution beneficial to mankind, and a helpmate to religion, whether that religion was Christianity, Parseeism, or any other.—N. Y. Dispatch.

There is one other subject to which I wish to call your attention before closing this address. It is in relation to the vestments worn by our High Priests. I find that, in a large number of our chapters, the High Priests wear a mitre, sometimes surmounted by a cross, and made in imitation of that worn by Roman Catholic prelates, bearing no resemblance whatever to the mitre of a Jewish High Priest, after which they should be modeled. All will admit that there should be, as far as practicable, a harmonious correspondence between the vestments of our principal officers and that of the persons they represent. If our High Priests are expected to wear robes of various colors, and a breastplate resembling that worn by the Jewish High Priest, then our mitres should also resemble that worn by the same officer of the ancient Jewish polity. I entertain as profound a veneration for the cross, and all it is intended to signify and symbolize, as any man; but the mitre of a Roman Catholic prelate, surmounted by a cross, is entirely out of place on the head of a Jewish High Priest, or any officer representing him in any chapter or council of Ancient Freemasonry—as much so as the breastplate would be on a Christian bishop, or a sacrificial altar within his sanctuary—as much so as a cross would be, suspended around the neck of a Jewish rabbi, or a Moslem crescent gleaming from the tower of his synagogue.—J. H. Branham, G. H. P. of Kentucky.

Anti-Masonry Again.

From the St. Louis Christian Advocate.

It really seems as though some of our overzealous religionists would die if they could find nothing to fuss about. On the Catholic question they have cried " wolf," until nobody pays attention to them, and what are they to do? They never had religion enough of their own to mind their own business and let others alone. They are agitators, and must agitate. Where can they find a subject? Ah! they have it. The old, threadbare, whining, hypocritical cant about the evils and iniquities of Masonry is remembered, and being remembered, it is caught up to be again repeated. Rev. Mr. Finney, of Oberlin—yes, of Oberlin—begins, and already there has been quite a commotion. That, perhaps, was the end aimed at—the thing needed—the great desideratum—commotion! That's it. Well, they have it started, and on it must go. The attempt is to exclude Masonry from all the Congregational churches. If that can be done, then, of course, the fight will be against Masonry in any church, and then against Masonry in the country. That's the plan on which these restless agitators work.

But now, in all sober seriousness, why do they try to raise such a clamor against Masonry? Do they know what it is? Are they not beating the air, by fighting a creature of their own imagination; and in doing this, would they not stultify themselves, if nature had not kindly saved them that trouble?

The writer of this is not a Mason—he never has been a Mason—he does not expect or desire ever to be a Mason—but that is no reason why, like the pugnacious beast in the prophecy of Daniel, he should be ever pushing every way at everything that comes before him; nor has he any sympathy with that sort of spirit, nor any respect for it.

He has seen Masons watching, with unceasing care, night after night, week after week, and month after month, around the beds of their sick brethren, and he honored them for it.

He has seen them, with large hearts and liberal hands, administering regularly and systematically to the wants of the widows and orphans of their deceased brethren, and he honored them for that.

He has seen them again and again, readily, and with apparent cheerfulness, supplying their destitute brethren and their families with fuel, food, and raiment; and at the same time he has ever found them as ready and willing to help forward any and all other benevolent and charitable enterprises as was any other class of men.

Who ever heard of a true Mason suffering for the necessaries of life, or for kind attentions, when any of his brethren were near, and at all able to help him? And, taken as a class, are not Masons as honest as any other class? Are they not as industrious and frugal? Are they not as peaceable and orderly, as law-abiding, and as order-loving? And are there not among Masons some of the purest patriots; some of the most eminent statesmen; some of the ablest jurists; some of the most distinguished philanthropists, and some of the most exemplary and pious Christians of all the land? Would such men as they give countenance to anything wrong, and if Masonry is wrong, do they not know it?

It really seems to us that these anti-Masonic agitators ought to have some sense of propriety, some little modesty, and submit, in part, at least, to some of those rules allowed to regulate the conduct of gentlemen.

It is very probable, nay, it is certain, there are some bad men among the Masons—it may be, some very bad men—but to what organization can we turn without finding some bad men? Not to the agitating churches of New England and the Northwest, sure.

Now, of the internal character of Masonry we know nothing. Of its signs, grips, groans, growls, or grunts, if it have any, we are totally ignorant, nor do we care to know anything about them; but from what we have seen of its ex- ternal manifestations, we solemnly make the following record, namely: If we—that is, the writer of these lines, and editor of this paper—were to go out on a mission advocating peace on earth and good will to man, and soliciting material aid for the poor and the starving, and had free access either to the Masonic lodges of the country, or to New England and Northwestern churches, we would by all odds choose the lodges, and expect among them to succeed much the better!

This is written deliberately, and with a deep mortification and sense of shame for the churches, which ought to be first and foremost, and most ready and willing, and most liberal in all such matters.

Masonry does not profess to be Christianity; does not profess a soul-saving power. It deals with this life, and mainly, if not exclusively, with the things of this life. It draws, we suppose, its principal motives to action from the present life, while Christianity has higher and holier aims.

It draws motives to action from the present life, but mainly from the life to come. That there is no actual collision between the two—Masonry and Christianity—we have long been satisfied by the testimony of men who were as intelligent, and exemplary, and pious as any others, and much more so than the majority of their opposers. But these men not only acknowledge the superior claims of Christianity, but also subordinate their Masonry to those claims. True, we have known some ardent young men, sincere perhaps, but rather shallow, whose enthusiasm led them, for a time, to subordinate their religion and its duties to the claims of their Masonry. For such we have pity, but no high degree of respect. If "the lodge meet" on the same evening of the prayer meeting, a true Christian will not hesitate which to attend.

Now, in conclusion, allow us to say, Christian ministers and Christian churches and people may find a better work than that of exciting themselves, and trying to excite others against Masonry. And if Masonry attend to what we have been told is its proper work, it will not interfere with the churches. Let each attend to its own legitimate work, and let the other alone.

We well remember one great anti-Masonic agitation through which the country passed; remember how the pulpit, the forum, and the press were all excited, but we remember also it did no good. On the contrary, it did much harm; and such will be the case again. Let it alone. You will do harm to the churches.

Royal and Select Masters.

At the late annual convocation of the Grand Chapter of New York, a proposition was offered to resume control of the Cryptic degrees, which proposition was referred to the grand council, with the request that they lay the subject before the General Grand Chapter.

We can not of course foresee what disposition may ultimately be made of the subject, but we confess to an inability to perceive on what ground the proposed exercise of authority can reasonably be placed. For many years the degrees were nominally under control of the various Royal Arch chapters, and were rarely if ever heard of, as is the case with the appendant orders of Masonic knighthood, the commanderies of which, in the State of New York, at least, have full power and authority to confer the aforesaid appendant orders, but rarely if ever enter upon the privilege. Nothing having come of the Royal and Select degrees in chapters, councils of those degrees were established with the tacit, if not open, consent of the chapters. In many of the States grand councils have been permanently established, under whose auspices the degrees have been systematized and a regular system of government established. In all the councils, under this arrangement, candidates at their reception and officers at their installation have covenanted to maintain and support the constitutions of their respective grand councils. Now, if the grand chapters attempt to resume authority over the degrees of Royal and Select Masters, there will be a conflict of authority, because it is hardly in the nature of things that the grand councils should be willing to give up their organizations and allow the degrees to drift back into the uncertain custody of the chapters, and still less likely that they will allow them to be taken away by force, without at least doing battle for the maintenance of their privileges. Meanwhile, there would be two sources of supply, and as under the abnormal excitement the stream would run faster than usual from each, it follows that for a time at least there would be such an influx of Cryptic Masons as the world and the balance of humanity have not seen. If now we take into consideration the fact that the degrees are no part of the original Royal Arch system, but have been taken bodily from the Ancient and Accepted Rite and tacked on to our system as side degrees, we shall see that the original proprietors might, if so minded, institute a claim far more valid than either or both the others. That up to this time no such claim has been made is, in our judgment, conclusive proof that it is not the intention of the Supreme Councils to interfere. But the claims of the other bodies are thus reduced to a level, with the advantage, if any, rather on the side of the Councils, from the fact of their more perfect knowledge of the degrees, and greater facilities for conferring them. So far, then, as our Grand Chapter is concerned, it would appear that it would be wise to let the subject alone. There is the more reason for this course in the fact that at least one State Grand Council has already taken measures to dissolve its existence, an undertaking in which they are likely to succeed, and as success is apt to bring imitators, one which in all probability will be followed until the several Grand Councils become extinct, or at least inactive. We have no wish to disguise our hope that such a consummation may eventually be reached, because we are in favor of keeping the American system as compact as possible, and encouraging a tendency to contraction rather than expansion. Under this idea, we have been and still are in favor of dropping the degree of Past Master from the chapter, and placing it in the sole custody of actual Masters of symbolic lodges, to be conferred by them on such only as have been duly elected to preside over regular lodges of Master Masons. Public sentiment appears to be extending in this direction, and we have only to wait a time with patience to reach the end in view.—Nat. Freemason.

With Comp. O'Sullivan, Masonry, in all its branches, was a life-long study. By frequent conferences with other enlightened Masonic lecturers, aided by his own learning and strong sense, he did more to purify and systematize our rituals, work, and lectures than all other Missouri Masons together. He was most stern in his observance of law, and exacting in enforcing obedience to its mandates. He became, from his knowledge and force of character, by general consent, the expounder of Masonic law and usage in this jurisdiction, and his influence was most potent throughout the whole Brotherhood of the United States.

We of Missouri are proud of his name and fame, and will ever cherish his memory in the deep heart of our love for the Institution, of which we knew him to be a grand supporting pillar. That pillar has fallen, and we mourn around the broken column which death has sanctified. A great light is extinguished, but the reflection of its beams will still guide and cheer. Let us hold fast to what he gave us; impress deep in our memories and transmit unimpaired the lessons he taught; and, while we mourn his death, let us resolve to emulate his life. His voice in our councils and social assemblies we shall hear no more forever, but its echo will remain while a Mason lives who has heard the words of wisdom fall from his tongue. "He has fought the good fight, and kept the faith," and has gone, we believe, to his everlasting reward. Through the dark valley of the shadow of death he has passed, and is now invested with the omnific word of the Supreme Grand Master. He is a resident of that celestial city whose gates are of pearl and whose pavements are gold, and a worshiper in that spiritual temple raised by cherubic hands, without the sound of axe or hammer, where the eternal sons of light are singing hallelujahs to the omnipotent Jehovah.—Martin Collins, G. H. P. of Missouri.

If the year which has just closed may be regarded as indicating the future of R. A. Masonry in Minnesota, we should greatly rejoice at the prospect of our future success. Let us, then, return our heartfelt thanks to the Supreme Grand High Priest of the Universe, for the blessings of peace and companionship vouchsafed to us the past year. Not a discordant sound has been heard throughout our jurisdiction, harmony and good will has prevailed in all our chapters (so far as I am advised), our numbers have been increased, and proper care observed in the admission of applicants, and their qualifications carefully scrutinized. These prudent precautions must produce a healthy growth in this branch of Masonry. In order to secure and perpetuate these blessings, and future prosperity, our council chambers must be dedicated to the royal art, pure and free from the contaminating influences of vice and gross immorality. If necessary, let discipline be timely applied and administered with strict justice and with firmness. Profanity and intemperance are as proper subjects of discipline as any other degrading or dishonest practices. He who professes reverence for God, and profanely calls upon the name of Jehovah, or he who addles his brain with strong drinks, and indulges in their accompanying degradations, is a disgrace to the honorable name of R. A. Mason; better check these practices if they exist, than permit the whole membership to become disgraced, or at least the feeble and weak from becoming contaminated and seduced by the influences of unworthy members. Let us love and respect the ancient landmarks of "morality, order, and propriety;" for the triumphs of the past we are mainly indebted to virtuous action; the success of the future depends no less on the same virtuous practices.—B. F. Smith, G. H. P. of Minnesota.

Profanity.

It is passing strange that any man of good ordinary common ability, and who has had a fair opportunity to learn what is polite, should so far demean himself as to use profane language; and still more so when it is uttered by a member of the Masonic Craft. We have some who seem to act as if a simple, plain statement of the truth would not be believed, unless they confirm it by uttering all the names of the Deity, in conjunction with all the curses known or imagined in the world. Observe closely, and these utterances will be given upon all occasions, applied to all subjects, with the same vehement emphasis.

But suppose that a true, sober, matter-of-fact man sits as a hearer—one whom the community pronounces a moral philosopher. What are his reflections? He says if what this man utters is truth, why use such useless oaths? Of what utility are such horrible utterances, which grate so harshly upon every ear of refinement? Good strong circumstantial evidences, to my mind, says the moralist, that what he says is false. Evidently the man is doubtful whether it is true, and is endeavoring to make it appear as true by his oaths. But survey the moral status of the man who uses profanity, and you will find that his intellect is afflicted with a chronic weakness. So teaches moral philosophy. The utterances of oaths furnish no evidence of truth or common sense; it requires no qualification of the mind, no expansion of the intellect, no development of the mental powers, to swear.

Then, after an individual has stepped across the threshold of the Masonic temple, and voluntarily pledged himself to observe the moral law, to never mention the name of God only with due homage and reverence, that he should so far demean himself, as a man and a Mason, as to profane every name by which he is known, is a shame and a disgrace.

When a member of the Masonic Fraternity—we will not say a Mason, for all who are members are not in spirit Masons—recklessly takes every sacred name of God in vain, it does not prove that he is characteristically great or independent, nor that he professes any high degree of moral culture. When we look above, around, and beneath, and extend our thoughts to the utmost bounds of this beautiful and smiling world, filled with the sacred presence of the Grand Architect of the Universe, it should fill our thoughts and minds with the spirit of the same Divinity.

Some Needless Fears.

Oftentimes men bring on the very things they deprecate, by their manifest uneasiness, timidity, or vain-glorying.

There is in Philadelphia a paper known as the National Baptist, which is the organ of an inconsiderable portion of the Baptist denomination, generally known as Free Baptists; in general doctrine they are the same as other Baptists, but they have separated from the main body upon the question of secret societies, slavery, mission operations, &c.; that is, they require that their views shall be incorporated into confessions of faith, constitutions, and rules of action. These schismatics are in accord with the Oberlin faction.

We see that the editor of the National Freemason has been having some arguments and notices of this fanatical paper, the only effect of which is to give that sheet a notoriety it could not otherwise have. Another fact also tends to mislead in regard to the National Baptist. Philadelphia is the seat of the Baptist Publication Society, which to the denomination is greatly like the immense Book Concern of the Methodists in New York. It is generally supposed that the National Baptist is in some way connected with the Publication Society. It has no connection with it, but is, if we are correctly informed, hostile to the Publication Society—at any rate, not in unison with it.

The Standard, the leading Baptist paper in the West, recently avowed, distinctly, that connection with Masonry should not be regarded as cause for disfellowship or discipline, but took the ground that it was a needless society, and that all the good wrought by it could as well be effected by church action. We read the article carefully, and concluded it to be a fair one, from an outside stand-point and from an editor looking solely to church interests. It was charitable in tone, and knowing that Masons were men who, being inside, could better judge what was right and true, and what was duty, we thought that the article could do no harm. But discussion followed, and the wisest thing the editor has done was to close his columns to any further discussion in the matter. We are a constant reader of the Examiner, a leading Baptist paper published in New York, and the Record, published in St. Louis, as we are of the Observer, a Presbyterian paper, and we find nothing in them in regard to secret societies.

The great leading religious denominations, west and south of Pennsylvania, are the Methodists, Baptists, and Presbyterians. These—that is, the principal bodies of them—embrace three-fourths of the church membership, and can not, by any state of circumstances that can in any probability arise, be made anti-Masonic. Among the United Brethren, Wesleyans, Free Baptists, Free-Will Baptists, Anti-Mission Baptists, and Lutherans, there is everywhere a strong anti-Masonic sentiment; the Christain Society, sometimes denominated Campbellites, are very numerous in some sections, and embrace a large amount of respectability and wealth; some of their ablest and worthiest men are Masons, and the anti-Masonic sentiment among them is confined to a few localities. The Episcopal persuasion is strong in all our cities, and has its full share of learning, worth, talent, wealth, and influence. It is free from all taint of anti-Masonry. The Congregationalists are respectable in numbers in Michigan, Wisconsin, Northern Illinois, and Northern Iowa; but, even there, they are not equal in numbers to either the Methodists, Baptists, or Presbyterians. Many of their ablest and most exemplary ministers and members are notable Masons, and as every church is an independent body, Masons are in very little danger, and the only pernicious effect anti-Masonry can have upon the denomination will be to cripple its general and educational operations, while other sects will reap a corresponding advantage. Congregationalists have too many sharp, shrewd men among them, to be caught by chaff, and they will let Oberlin and President Blanchard hatch mischief and reap confusion, and, in the end, sink into merited infamy and obscurity.*

The Congregational paper in Chicago, the Advance, alludes to Masonry with sneers, and by quoting anecdotes. For its edification, we will give the moral of an anecdote in regard to Father Mason and President Blanchard: "Freemasonry has stood the roaring of lions for centuries, and it will not be brayed down by donkeys now."

We have no right to speak for any one but ourself, but we respectfully suggest to our contemporaries to give these matters no undue prominence, but, after giving such items of news as may be necessary to keep our readers posted, and answering such arguments or objections as may be advanced by respectable bodies of men, to let matters take their own course, and avoid stirring up any unnecessary uneasiness or needless fears. Shrewd, sagacious, charitable, and conscientious men are not going to be caught in the cruel, mischievous, and fanatical gull-traps of Oberlin, Blanchard, Colver & Co. "Their hearts are fully set in them to do evil."

Grand Chapter D. C.

Formerly there was a grand chapter in the District of Columbia, and another in Maryland. They united, under the jurisdiction of the General Grand Chapter of the U. S. A.

Grand chapters exist in Pennsylvania, Virginia, Kentucky, Vermont, Iowa, Rhode Island, Florida, and North Carolina, which do not recognize the authority of the G. G. Chapter. Whether their positions—that is, some of them—are right or masonically legal, we do not propose to discuss. It is enough to say, that none of them have been ignored, dealt with, or in any sense disfellowshiped. It is now good law, that when any separate governmental jurisdiction, such as a State, Territory, or District, has three chartered and lawfully constituted lodges, that those lodges have a right to meet in convention, adopt a constitution, and form a grand lodge.

We hold the same to be true in regard to chapters. Whenever there may be three chartered and lawfully constituted chapters in West Virginia, holding warrants from the Grand Chapter of Virginia, we think no one will question their indefeasible right to form a new grand chapter.

We think the same is true in regard to the District of Columbia. Maryland and the District are separate governments. The District has a grand lodge and the existence of a grand lodge pre-supposes a proper jurisdiction for a grand chapter. The chapters were united in a grand body, called the Grand Chapter of Maryland and the District of Columbia. Three chapters in the District thought it expedient to form a grand chapter. They were the judges of their own necessities. They held no direct allegiance to the General Grand Chapter, and if Maryland consented, who was to be injured, and who should object? Are the chapters in the District masonically or financially important to the national body? In no sense that can be named. If they remained as they were, they belonged to and were important to a grand chapter—and the only grand chapter—holding jurisdiction over the territory occupied by two grand lodges. To separate did not weaken the General Grand Chapter or infringe on its jurisdiction.

It is said that this separation changed the status of the Grand Chapter of Maryland. That is sheer pettifogging. All the old grand chapter had to do was to amend in order to meet its altered condition.

Further. Whether Maryland consented or not, the chapters in the District, being within the bounds of a grand lodge, and under another political government, had a right to create a grand chapter of their own, agreeably to usual Masonic precedents; and we have no idea that the General Grand Chapter, or any considerable number of grand chapters, are going to ignore the very principle upon which nine-tenths of our grand lodges have been formed.

We reject the idea of the necessity of any consent, in this case, from anywhere.

Where chapters hold their charters from the General Grand Chapter, their path is plain. They must have her consent in a constitutional way, before they can be formed into grand chapters.

Chicago and Alton R. R.

The fifth annual report of the President and Directors for the year ending December 31, 1867, is upon our table. The road is 380 miles in length, from St. Louis to Chicago, and traverses the important counties of Will, Grundy, Livingston, McLean, Logan, Sangamon, Macoupin, and Madison, with termini in Cook and St. Clair, and all embracing a population of 509,174, by the census of 1855; it passes through the wealthy and growing cities of Springfield, Alton, Bloomington, and Joliet, besides several important towns; has an unsurpassed agricultural territory, and the counties above named can sustain from their own soil as dense a population as any other like territory in the world.

The earnings of the road were $3,892,861.48; expenses, $1,743,733.42, showing a clear balance of $2,149,128.06, being more than 55 per cent. of the whole amount. The gross earnings exceed those of the previous year 5½ per cent.

The Engineer's report shows that $338,835.40 has been expended for improvements, and $610,225.35 for maintenance of way. Much of the iron laid down is the continuous rail, and all the improvements are thorough and substantial.

Col. T. B. Blackstone is President and Superintendent; W. B. Larrabee, Secretary and Treasurer; S. H. Knight, J. C. McMullin, and O. Vaughn, Asst. Superintendents; K. F. Booth, Chief Engineer; John A. Jackman, Supt. of Machinery; R. Reniff, Supt. of Car Deparment; Augustus Newman, Gen. Ticket Agent; A. V. Hartwell, Purchasing Agent; A. W. Church, Attorney; Directors, T. B. Blackstone, John B. Drake, P. R. Chandler, John Crerar, Chicago, J. J. Mitchell, Alton, A. Havemeyer, John A. Stewart, New York, W. F. Weld, Boston, L. Blackstone, Norwich, Conn.

The Proud In Heart.

A correspondent asks us to explain the 5th verse, 16th chapter of Proverbs, viz.:

> Every one that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord; though hand join in hand, he shall not be unpunished.

Although early taught in the Scriptures by a sainted mother, and strictly educated by our sire to make the Bible the "man of our counsel," and the "guide of our life," yet, unversed in languages, and untutored in theology, we can not permit our readers to regard us competent to expound the Scriptures, or to explain the meaning of connected, much less isolated, passages of Holy Writ.

We have no objection, however, to referring to similar passages, and giving a short version, or explanation of our own.

Seven things are an abomination to the Lord: a proud look, a lying tongue, hands that shed innocent blood, a heart that deviseth wicked imaginations, feet swift in running to do mischief, a false witness that speaketh lies, and him that soweth discord among brethren. See Prov. 6, v. 16, 17, 18, 19.

> The Lord hates pride and arrogance, the evil way, and the forward mouth. See Prov. 8, v. 13.
> Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished. See Prov. 11, 21.

It is said that the term "shall not be unpunished," might with propriety be rendered "shall not be held innocent."

We think the fair meaning of the passage first quoted is, that a proud heart is liable to evil imaginations, is intent on its own advantage, is clothed with self-righteousness, and saturated with self-conceit; marks a path for itself, and, in traveling it, tramples upon conscience, humanity, and virtue, if they stand in its path; that such a heart may itself, or may join hand with those who do, look proud, lie, shed innocent blood, devise wicked imaginations, run to mischief, bear false witness, or sow discord. The joining hands, we think, includes such as join in evil, such as screen the criminal or evildoer, such as countenance immorality or crime, and all such as divide, evade, or seek to overthrow good laws and wholesome authority.

We hope our correspondent is satisfied; if not, we refer him to the editors of the Masonic Review and National Freemason.

Welcome Home.

Col. Wm. L. Gross, after learning the business of a telegraph operator, became agent and operator for the railroad at Dwight, where he assisted in the formation of the prosperous Livingston Lodge of that place; from that he entered upon the practice of law with his brother, E. L. Gross, Esq., but upon the second call for volunteers he entered the army in 1862 as Lieutenant, and was soon transferred from post to post as Superintendent of Telegraphs, was promoted by regular gradation to the rank of Colonel, and was chief in command of telegraph operations at New Orleans for some time after the war. After his discharge, he assisted in the formation of the Pacific Telegraph line, and organized the work at Omaha, from which he was transferred to the position of Superintendent in the city of New York.

Yearning for the society of his relatives, his old friends, and his maternal lodge, as well as distinction and material benefit in his chosen profession, he has again returned to the law, in company with his brother, under the firm of Gross Brothers, in this city.

His first initiation into public life was with us, in the postoffice at Knoxville, and we now welcome him in mature manhood, with his family, to the joys of a settled home, and to distinction, character, and future honors in the dignified and noble profession of the law.

R. W. Bro. T. J. Wade,

Grand Lecturer, lectured the lodge at Odell from Dec. 5th to the 10th; installed officers and constituted Cordova Lodge Dec. 15th; lectured the brethren six days, and raised two candidates, and installed the officers of Philo Lodge, and from thence went to Springfield. Feb. 3, at Andalusia, Rock Island county, he lectured four days, two of which were in company with Bro. Blanding, D. D. G. M. He says that the lodge-room at the last named place is neat and well furnished, and that the brethren are of the right stamp and well posted. He met the Templars in conclave at Rock Island, and conferred the Templar order.

Bro. Wade is a zealous workman, and has long and zealously served the Craft. May the G. A. crown his labors with comfort and peace.

> THE MASONIC TROWEL.—Col. A. S. Hubbard, subscription agent for the Pacific coast, has placed on our table the October number of this Masonic periodical. It is published at Springfield, Ill., by Hon. Harmon G. Reynolds, 33°, and M. W. Grand Secretary of the M. W. Grand Lodge of F. and A. Masons of Illinois. It is a monthly publication of quarto form, 16 pages, and is the organ of the Fraternity in the Northwestern States. Dr. Mackey, author of several works on Masonic jurisprudence, which are recognized by the Craft as high authority, is a regular contributor to this journal. Price $1.25 per year. Subscriptions received at this office for Col. Hubbard.—Elevator, California.

Many thanks to Bro. Hubbard, the whilom Secretary of lodge and chapter at Chicago, now of San Francisco, for the above notice. We presume we are indebted to him for the following notice, cut from a San Francisco paper, as we certainly are for a new subscriber or two every few weeks:

> THE MASONIC TROWEL, Springfield, Ill. Monthly. Price $1.25 per annum. A. S. Hubbard, Esq., Agent.
> This journal, as its name implies, is devoted to the interests of Freemasonry, and is conducted with marked ability, and is doing much to dispel the contempt of scholars for Masonic literature, justly the result of the sickening trash some time since issued from the pen of the illiterate Robert Morris. The works of Dr. Oliver, a clergyman of the church of England, are the great written standards of Masonry, and are daily exciting the attention of students and thinkers. THE TROWEL is evidently inspired from the learned and scholarly tomes of the learned priest who disdained not to dedicate his great abilities to the instruction and guidance of one of the greatest movements now influencing the lives of millions throughout the world.

Masonic College.

We give to our readers, in this number, an article in regard to a Masonic college. It is from the pen of a worthy, candid brother whom we have long known and esteemed, above want or the probable prospect of it himself, and who is influenced solely by a love of Masonry, and a desire to benefit his fellow man and raise higher the standard of human excellence. We are unprepared to give our views; indeed, we have some preconceived opinions to reconsider. But the author of the communication is a practical, reflecting citizen, and his article is welcome, and we invite a perusal and careful consideration of the same.

JURISDICTION OF BODIES U. D.—Masonic bodies U. D., in the absence of any local law, are confined to such jurisdiction as they would have if chartered, but they have no jurisdiction as against regularly chartered and constituted Masonic bodies.

Mail Robberies.

The infamous robberies of money and mail matter, which were so prevalent with our matter six months ago, have somewhat abated, owing to our complaints to the departments, our publications, and the stringent measures we have resorted to to protect ourselves. But the cry still comes from Secretaries, insurance agents, and business men, that abstractions from the mail are of daily occurrence. A couple of our correspondents braved the ordinary mode of transmission, as follows:

> To all, and singular, the P. O. thieves (if any there be) and vagabonds generally, between Chicago and Springfield. This letter contains $2.50 to pay for THE MASONIC TROWEL. Hereby fail not to deliver the same to Bro. Reynolds, or incur the displeasure of the G. A. O. T. U., and all respectable residents of this sublunary sphere. Take due notice and govern yourselves accordingly.

> This letter contains a draft for $13.00. It is the third one I've sent. The other two you have "gobbled." If you think this one will do you any more good than the first two, take it; if not, please let it go through to the owner.

The Mackey Department.

Owing to the derangement in the mails consequent upon the breaking up of winter, the article intended for this number, entitled "The Bo Tree," came too late for insertion. We think it exceeds in interest any of the previous articles upon sacred plants, and our readers may look for an unusual and desirable intellectual treat.

Helena, Montana.

The Mystic Tie is strong in the mountains. The city of Helena has three lodges and one chapter—Helena Lodge No. 3, N. P. Langford W. M., John Moffitt Sec.; King Solomon Lodge No. 9, Sol. Star W. M., H. Herzog Sec.; Morning Star Lodge No. 5, John Potter W. M., J. G. Robinson Sec.; Helena Chapter U. D., William Porter H. P., H. Herzog Sec. The pecuniary condition of the Fraternity is gratifying; free from debt, convenient meeting-places, and well furnished. We thank Bro. Robinson for a large list of subscribers from Helena.

Business! Business!!

Request after request is made to us to look after matters at State House, Pension Office, and in various ways; we would cheerfully look after matters for our friends as we formerly did, if we had the time; but we positively have not the time, nor shall we have any time for any business of any kind, outside of our official and editorial duties, until we cease to be Secretary of the Grand Lodge. So, dear friends, hold off, please, for a time.

Old Proceedings.

I will pay $1 per copy, and postage, for proceedings Grand Lodge of Illinois for 1853; 75 cts. and postage for copies of either session in 1850, and for the sessions of 1855 and 1857; and 50 cts. and postage for copies of the sessions of 1851, 1852, 1854, and 1856. This offer to stand good until further notice.

H. G. REYNOLDS,
Grand Secretary.

R. W. BRO. D. G. BURR has recently set the brethren of Edward Dobbins Lodge No. 164, at Lawrenceville, in good working order.

Tidings.

Items.

Ladies should have their names and address in their portmonnaies, so that if the article is lost and falls into honest hands, it may be returned.

A fellow has been arrested in London for acting as a trainer for youthful thieves. He gave regular lessons in roguery.

Some fellow says that Adam was 123, and Eve 118 feet high; at that rate of retrogression, what will be the height of people six thousand years hence?

There are 100,000 female teachers in the United States.

The managing editor of the London Times receives $25,000 salary.

Omaha has 16,000 inhabitants; 1,500 dwellings were erected last year.

The State of California is 700 miles long, with an average width of 200 miles.

The freight conveyed eastward by eight railroads in Illinois, in 1867, was 3,358,000 tons, valued at $235,000,000.

A young fop, about starting down to New Orleans, proposed to purchase a life-preserver. "Oh, you'll not want it," suggested the Clerk, "bags of wind don't sink."

We had a pleasant interview a few days ago with Comp. Wm. E. Hill, of Nebraska City, who is now Grand Captain of the Host of the new grand chapter recently organized in Nebraska. He reports all classes of Masonry as flourishing in that State.

We are indebted to W. Bro. R. H. Waterman for a beautiful complimentary invitation card to attend the centennial anniversary celebration of Master's Lodge No. 5, March 5th, at Albany, N. Y. Also, an invitation to the banquet the same evening, accompanied by several elegant cards. We hope they had a good time, long to be remembered.

By a late fire in Wilmington, N. C., Comp. T. B. Carr, Grand Secretary Grand Chapter, and editor Masonic Sun, lost his entire library, besides other valuable property. Let our Grand Secretaries remember him. We hope the Sun will still shine.

Better please one good man, than a crowd of bad ones.

We thank the Keystone for its handsome notices of the proceedings of the Grand Lodge, Grand Chapter, and Grand Council of Illinois. Also, for its liberal extracts from the oration of Rev. J. I. Davidson.

The Illinois counties on the Mississippi River are Alexander, Union, Jackson, Randolph, Monroe, St. Clair, Madison, Jersey, Calhoun, Pike, Adams, Hancock, Henderson, Mercer, Rock Island, Whiteside, Carroll, and Jo Daviess, embracing the cities of Cairo, Chester, Belleville, Alton, Quincy, Rock Island, Fulton, and Galena, and a population of 365,660.

National Lodge U. D., at Chicago, held its first meeting Feb. 27. L. A. Hamblen, Master. Thirty visitors were present, including R. W. Bro. J. W. Clyde, District Deputy, and Bro. W. B. Bateham, and others. Bro. C. H. Lillibridge, long Secretary of 141, presented the lodge with the three great lights. Success to National Lodge.

PRESENTATION.—R. W. Bro. Thomas Moore, who has presided over Metropolis Lodge No. 91 ever since 1854, upon being relieved was presented with a gold-headed cane, by Bro. W. H. Scott, the reverend Chaplain of the lodge, in eloquent remarks, which were appropriately responded to by Bro. Moore. The families of the brethren listened to an able address by Rev. Bro. Scott, upon "The Objects of Masonry." Good humor and friendly greetings abounded. Bro. Moore is the Deputy for the first district.

Our New Masonic Halls

Have been completed, and dedicated by the Grand Lodge since our last issue.

For the information of brethren abroad, we will say that the rooms are situated in the new and elegant building erected by the Portland Savings Bank, on the easterly side of Exchange street, just above Middle street.

The lower floor is occupied by the Bank and for stores. The second story temporarily by the Custom House. The third and fourth stories are occupied by the Masonic Fraternity. The southerly half is used for a large hall running up through the two stories; the other half for a blue lodge hall and Templar armory below, and a chapter hall and banqueting-room above, each with suitable ante-rooms.

The first room entered is the Superintendent's room, 18x20 feet, neatly frescoed and carpeted with oil cloth. On the left is the Templar armory, 21x38, finished in black walnut, with closets, drawers, and stalls with glass doors.

On the right is Tyrian Hall, 37x27, furnished with black walnut, upholstered in blue, the walls and ceiling elegantly frescoed.

Egyptian Hall is entered through a vestibule and folding doors. This hall is 64x37 feet, with ceiling 22 feet in height, finished in the Egyptian style of architecture, and appropriately frescoed by Schumacher, who is not excelled by any artist in the country. This is one of the very best specimens of his skill. It is lighted by a 25-light chandelier in the centre, and 13 bracket and pedestal lights. The sofas, chairs, altar, and pedestals are of black walnut, carved and gilded, and the upholstery green plush. The old fashioned canopies are dispensed with, and the frescoed alcoves are in much better taste. We are pleased also to see that the fences or railings each side of the first three officers are omitted, and simple elegant pedestals substituted. By a fortunate chance, this hall is the finest speaking hall of its size we have ever seen. The carpets are rich Brussels and Wiltons, and light up finely.

Signet Hall, on the fourth floor, is the chapter hall, 37x27 feet, with crimson and oak furniture. Adjoining this is a banqueting-room of equal size, connected by a sliding door, so that the whole can be thrown into one apartment, 70 feet long, when required for a large dining-hall, or for drilling. On one side is a kitchen 20 feet square, supplied with cooking-stove and dishes.

The whole building is heated by steam, and there are wash-rooms and water-closets in each story.

The whole cost of fitting and furnishing these apartments will amount to $25,000. The property is held in trust by a board of ten trustees, elected two from each of the three lodges and one from each of the other four bodies represented. That portion of the cost not paid down is raised by a loan from the different bodies, to be liquidated by a sinking fund.

These halls were dedicated Tuesday evening, November 5th, by Grand Master Murray, with the assistance of the grand officers, a large number of whom were present from all parts of the State.

We should have been pleased to have had a grand "house warming" on the occasion, but the heavy losses entailed upon the Fraternity here by the fire rendered it impossible to raise a sum sufficient to defray the expenses of such an occasion, without pressing too heavily upon some already overburdened.—Portland Token.

Apron and Diploma.

An Incident of the Late War.

From the Masonic Review.

Bro. Moore:—I have a circumstance to report, which, as it illustrates the strength of the "mystic tie" among those who have truly seen and appreciated the "light by which Masons work," I send to you.

Early in July, 1864, the 149th Ohio National Guards, with which I served, was ordered to report to Gen. Wallace, who was then at Monocacy Junction, watching the advance of Gen. Early into Maryland. We arrived by rail at noon on the 7th, and as Early's advance was then near Frederick City, and our men were engaged with them, we were ordered off the cars, into line of battle. Our baggage was left by the side of the road, under a small guard. That night we relieved the regiment on duty at the front, and was all day of the 8th engaged, the main battle coming off on the 9th. We had no opportunity of looking after our baggage, which, on the retreat of our troops on the evening of the 9th, fell into the hands of the enemy. In my trunk was my Masonic diploma from Mt. Joliet Lodge No. 42, Illinois, a diploma from New Vienna Lodge No. 160, Ohio, and a Masonic apron.

Months passed on; the war ended, and I returned home. On a visit to Joliet, Ill., in the summer of 1865, I found my diploma from that lodge in the possession of the Secretary, accompanied by the following letter:

Co. D, 5th Div., Camp Prisoners of War,
Point Lookout, Md., Oct. 23, 1864.

Secretary of Mt. Joliet Lodge No. 42:

Dear Sir and Bro.—Having found this chart in the hands of a man who says he found it on the battle-field, I bought it. Thinking the owner may be dead, and his family and friends having nothing of his as a memento, I send it to you, hoping that you may be able to send it to his family.

Trusting you will not deem this act one of presumption, I beg to remain,

Fraternally yours,
A. C. Loyd, Co. D, 4th Ga. Reg't.

In 1867, the following letter was received by the Secretary of New Vienna Lodge, and forwarded to me:

Purdy, Tenn., Feb. 9, 1867.

Secretary of New Vienna Lodge No. 160, F. and A. Masons:

Dear Sir—I have in my possession an apron and diploma, belonging to Thomas Hildebrant, a member of your lodge, which was captured by me on the battle-field at Monocacy Creek, Md., near Frederick City, which I hold subject to his or the order of your lodge. I will send it by express if he desires.

I remain, very respectfully, your brother,
R. C. Maynard.

I immediately wrote to Bro. Maynard, and in a short time received by express the apron and diploma. Verily, there is that which takes from the rugged front of war much of its horror, and mingles with its bitter cup of woe the soothing balm of fraternal love. How I would rejoice to take by the hand these men, who, although on that bloody day were arrayed against me in mortal strife, I recognize as brethren, for whom I would peril much, and who, although enemies in war, recognize the principles of brotherly love, relief, and truth, as paramount to every other consideration.

Give this a place in the Review, that others may be induced to do likewise.

Yours, fraternally,
T. Q. Hildebrant.

Wilmington, O., January, 1868.

Grand Secretary's Office, G. Lodge of Va.,
Richmond, Feb. 3, 1868.

Wor. Sir and Bro.—Below I have the pleasure to present you the action of the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Virginia, in relation to the Grand Lodge of West Virginia.

Very fraternally,
John Dove, G. Sec.

The Special Committee on that portion of the Grand Master's address relating to West Virginia made the following report, which was adopted:

Whereas, At the last grand annual communication of this Grand Lodge, it was

"Resolved, That this Grand Lodge is willing to recognize the Grand Lodge of West Virginia, whenever we shall be satisfied that a full majority of the thirty-three active lodges in the boundaries of West Virginia, holding charters from this grand lodge, shall desire to separate from us and unite with the Grand Lodge of West Virginia, and shall return their charters and pay off their dues to this Grand Lodge to December, 1865;" and

Whereas, The conditions set forth in the above resolution have not been complied with, but on the contrary a number of said subordinate lodges have by resolution, and through their delegates to this grand lodge, expressed an undiminished affection for this grand lodge, and an unalterable purpose to remain under its jurisdiction as long as they can, which expressions of feeling are highly appreciated and fully reciprocated by this grand lodge; therefore, be it

Resolved, That should this grand lodge, from a desire to maintain fraternal relations with our seceding brethren of West Virginia, hereafter extend Masonic recognition to the grand lodge which has been formed in that State, yet this grand lodge, while it would not, subsequent to such recognition, create any new subordinate lodges within the State of West Virginia, would also not undertake (without the consent of, and in the absence of any Masonic delinquency on the part of such subordinate lodges within the State of West Virginia, chartered by this grand lodge, and now working under such charters, as wish to remain under its jurisdiction), to revoke any charters, or in any manner dissolve the connection of such subordinate lodges with this grand lodge, as it knows of no Masonic law or usage which would justify such a procedure.

Wm. Terry,
L. B. Williams,
John Dove.

Salutatory.

With this number we begin the publication of the Kentucky Freemason.

We commence with a light heart, buoyant of the future. We have faith that the Craft will sustain us in the effort to establish a dignified organ of our Order.

Freemasonry is not a mere system of mystic rites. Every feature of our ceremonies is pregnant with sublime and useful truth. Much of this meaning of our symbolism may be disclosed to the public. The allegories of the lodge-room may be translated into the common vernacular of the people, without doing violence to the beautiful symbology, in which we read our lessons, when shut in by prying eyes.

To enable Masons to better understand the worth of our principles, and to win the worthy from the world to our altars, will be our loftiest ambition.

We begin our task, feeling that the work we have undertaken is befitting the employment of nobler capacities than we possess. Yet, we trust to intensify our powers by a faithful study of the history and philosophy of Masonry, and to focalize the best light we can obtain upon our columns. If any brother can throw a ray into our lense, we shall feel grateful, and we now take occasion to invite communications from our brethren. Enrich the paper with your best matured thoughts, and make it a repository of Masonic intelligence.

Contributors, however, must expect us to examine their work, and if we should sometimes pronounce it neither oblong nor square, and throw it among the rubbish, they may console themselves by considering that ancient stupidity, which made the Master Overseers reject the chief stone of the corner.

Although our chisel may not be of the finest edge, we shall have to claim the privilege of chipping any rough ashlar that may be sent, until it suits our purpose.

We hope, however, that any who may undertake to contribute for our paper will not, by their carelessness, necessitate the use of any tool of iron where we build.

Make ready the stones before you send them hither.

Let Entered Apprentices learn to read the designs upon the Master's trestle-board, before they attempt to draw them.

As we do not expect to confine our attention to mere traditional Masonry, but to include a wide amplification of all the arts and sciences of which our Order is the patron, we invite poets to give us the products of their muse, astronomers the result of their star-gazing, chemists the residuums of their retorts, litterateurs the matured fruitage of their thoughts, and even lovers the sighing of their hearts. Welcome all.

Let the wives and daughters of Masons, and all who woo the muses, feel free to employ our columns. If there are any who do not like us, let them complain through our type, and we will endeavor to quiet or hush their murmurings.

If there be any to scold, we will either scold back, or answer so sweetly that we shall turn storms into zephyrs, frowns into smiles, and rebukes into compliments.

We mount the tripod in an exceedingly amiable mood, and we are persuaded now that it would take a hurricane of abuse to disturb our equilibrium.

May we never have occasion to do aught but smile at our readers, and from every fireside the Freemason visits, may we receive only words of cheer! So mote it be.—Kentucky Freemason.

Decisions by the G. Lodge of Maryland.

1. That no lodge shall initiate, pass, or raise a candidate from another jurisdiction, until he has been a resident twelve months.
2. Although a candidate may have resided twelve months within the jurisdiction of the lodge to which he applies for the honors of Masonry, inquiries are made of the lodge in whose jurisdiction he last resided.
3. The suspension of a charter is not a suspension of the members of its lodge.
4. The question on suspension, expulsion, rejection, or re-instatement is decided through the ballot-box, and in no other way.
5. When a ballot is taken for a degree or for membership, the result only is made known.
6. A separate ballot is taken for each degree, upon application.

The above should be the law everywhere.

Decisions and opinions will be regularly numbered through the volume, and will not be repeated, but reference will be made to them.

ILLINOIS.

No. 23.—An application rejected for the first degree is rejected for twelve months.

No. 24.—A ballot taken on an application for initiation or affiliation before the expiration of four weeks from the time of reference to a committee, is void, unless taken by virtue of a dispensation.

GENERAL.

No. 13.—The loss of the right hand thumb is a bar to initiation.

No. 14.—Any officer or member of a lodge in good standing has a right to demit for proper cause.

No. 15.—Entered Apprentices and Fellow Crafts, who remove from the jurisdiction of one grand lodge into that of another, are under the jurisdiction of the lodge nearest to their respective places of residence, to which they should apply by petition for such degrees as they have not received.

No. 16.—No request or permission to confer degrees from a lodge in a foreign jurisdiction should be entertained; for, to entertain such a request or permission, is an admission of jurisdiction which does not exist. A certificate is important, and should be entertained.

No. 17.—An appointment pro tem. confers no rank, and creates no eligibility to any station whatever.

No. 18—No chapter has a right to entertain charges against a companion which involve the secrets of Masonry above the 7th degree, or of any other rite.

Miscellaneous Reading.

That Awful Woodpile.

Coming home from school one day, says a gentleman, a large pile of wood lay before our little back door. "There's work for you, Billy," said Ned Blake, the boy who was with me. "Your father had better do as my father does, hire a man to get it in; it is too much for a boy, mother says, and it will take the whole of Wednesday afternoon; you will have no time for play. Now, Bill, I would not do that, I tell you."

This was the substance of Ned's talk as we stood before the woodpile, and the more he said, the higher it grew; by the time he left me I began to think myself a poorly used boy, indeed. "There is work for you, Willie," said mother, as I sidled into the kitchen; "did you mind that beautiful wood at the gate as you came in?" "I reckon I did," I muttered to myself, but said nothing aloud, only asking how father did. He was sick and had been for many months, and the family funds I now knew were becoming low. "It is a monstrous pile," I at length said, getting a glimpse of it from the window. "So much the better for us, Willie," said mother, cheerfully; "a long winter is before us, you know."

Dinner was soon ready; the table spread in the little kitchen, and father was helped out from an adjoining room by his two little daughters, one on each side. Father and mother sat down to our frugal meal with thankful hearts, I am sure; the girls chatted as usual, while I sat brooding over that "awful pile." I am afraid my chief dish was a dish of pouts. Father asked me several questions, but I took no part in the pleasant table-talk. "Well, my boy," said father, after dinner, "there's that wood to be got in; no school this afternoon, so you have time enough; you had better do it the first thing." "It will take the whole afternoon," I said coldly; "the boys are going nutting." I was not sure of this, but anything in the way of an objection to the wood.

My father said nothing. Dear, dear, father; God forgive me for wounding his feelings. "Mother," said I, following her out into the pantry. "Ned Blake's father hires his wood drawn; his mother thinks it is too much for a boy to do. Why don't father hire?" "Ah," said my mother, sadly, "the Blakes are very differently off from us; your poor father"—tears came into her eyes, she stopped. Mary ran in where we were, and I, half ashamed of myself, escaped out the back door. Still Ned Blake's words rankled in me, and I thought it was too bad; nor did the brisk west wind blow off the fumes of the foolish grumbling, which made a coward of me. I sat down on the wood-block with my hands in my pockets, and shuffled my feet among the chips in sour discontent. "It is such a monstrous woodpile," I said to myself a dozen times.

Presently out came mother. I jumped up. "Willie," she said cheerfully, "I would take right hold of the work now—you will soon get it in." "It is so monstrous, mother," I said, in a self-pitying tone; "it will take me forever, and half kill me into the bargain." "Forever is a long, long while," she said; "come, let us look at the pile. It is big, but all you have to do is to take a stick at a time; that won't hurt you, Willie, I am sure; only one stick at a time will make that pile vanquish quicker than you think for, Willie. Try it, now."

There was a kindness and yet decision in my mother's tones which were irresistible. She could put even hard things, or what we thought hard, in a very achievable light. "Only one stick at a time," I cried, jumping up and following her; really the pile seemed already to lessen under this new mode of attack. "Only one stick at a time," seemed easy enough. "Only one stick at a time." What was the need of a man to do that? "One stick at a time;" if Ned could not do that, he was a poor tool. Ah, a poor tool he proved to be. My mother had got my metal up, and I boldly went to work.

"Father," said I, bolting into the house at a later hour in the afternoon, all in a glow, "father, please tell me what time it is?" "Eight minutes after three," answered he, looking at his watch. "Whew!" I shouted, "and the pile is mastered." Never did I feel snch a strong and joyous sense of the power of doing. Finding mother, "Mother," I said, putting my arms around her neck, "I was a naughty boy, but 'one stick at a time' has cured me."

I did not know then the full value of the lesson I had learned. Years of labor, successful labor, have since tested and amply proved its value. When your work looks insurmountable, and you seem to have no heart to take hold of it—as work many a time will—remember it is only one stick at a time, and go at it.

A Day Without a Night.

W. W. Thomas, late United States Consel at Gothenburg, Sweden, in a letter on Norway, thus describes that far northern country, and one of its particular phenomena:

"Imagine a high table-land, rising 3,000 to 6,000 feet sheer above the sea—one vast rock, bleak and barren, covered with snow, swept with rain, frozen in winter, sodden in summer—the home of a few reindeer and Lapps, and you have Norway proper, nine-tenths of the Norway that is shown on the map. But the rock is not whole; it is cracked apart here and there, and fissures show like slender veins over the country. The sides of these ravines are steep as the cleft left by an ax, and their depths are always filled by a foaming brook or river tumbling along from the drenched table-land above the sea. I have always looked from the bottom of one of these valleys and seen the perpendicular rock rise like a strip of blue ribbon. Wherever in these dales there lies a bit of earth 'twixt rock and river, there the Norwegian peasant has built his cot; and it is of such bits of earth that inhabited Norway is situated, and here live 1,200,000 people. The land just round his door gives the Norwegian potatoes, rye, barley, and oats; his cattle climb the steeps above for every stray blade; for the rest he depends upon the sea and river. Were it not for the excellent fisheries along this northern shore, Norway would be uninhabitable.

"One night in July, 1865, Hon. H. Campbell, late minister at Stockholm, the two Messrs. Buckley, of Birmingham, and myself, landed on the shore of a northern inlet in latitude sixty degrees north. We ascended a cliff which rose 1,000 feet above the level of the sea. It was late, but still sunlight. The Arctic Ocean stretched away in silent vastness at our feet. The sound of its waves scarcely reached our airy look-out. Away in the north the huge sun swung along the horizon, like the slow beat of the pendulum in the tall clock in our grandfather's parlor corner. We all stood silent, looking at our watches. When both hands came together at 12 midnight, the full round orb hung triumphantly above the wave—a bridge of gold running due north spanned the waters between us and him. There he shone in silent majesty, with no setting. We involuntarily took off our hats; no word was said. Combine, if you can, the most brilliant sunset and sunrise you ever saw, and its beauties will pale before the most gorgeous coloring which now lit up ocean, heaven, and mountain. In half an hour the sun had swung up preceptibly on its beat, the colors changing to those of morning, a fresh breeze rippled over the fiord, one songster after another piped up in the grove behind us—we had slid into another day."

Ladies the Best Company.

Thackeray says that it is better for you to pass an evening once or twice in a lady's drawing-room, even though their conversation is slow, and you know the girl's song by heart, than in a club, tavern, or pit of a theatre. All amusements of youth to which virtuous women are not admitted, rely on it, are deleterious in their nature. All men who avoid female society have dull perceptions and are stupid, or have gross tastes and revolt against what is pure. Your club swaggerers who are sucking the butts of billiard cues all night, call female society insipid. Poetry is insipid to a yokel; beauty has no charms for a blind man; music does not please the poor beast who does not know one tune from another; and a true epicure is hardly ever tired of water, sauce, and brown bread and butter. I protest I can sit for a whole night talking to a well-regulated, kindly woman, about her girl coming out, of her boy at college, and like the evening's entertainment. One of the great benefits a man derives from woman's society is, that he is bound to be respectful to them. The habit is of great good to your morals, men, depend upon it. Our education makes of us the most eminently selfish men in the world. We fight for ourselves, we yawn for ourselves, we light our pipes and say we will not go out; we prefer ourselves, and our ease and the greatest good that comes to a man from woman's society is that he has to think of somebody to whom he is bound to be constantly attentive and respectful.

Schiller's Appearance.

As every reader of a book paints for himself a portrait of the writer—of his person, his gait, voice, and speech—it would have been very natural that the author of "The Robbers" should be mentally delineated as a passionate youth; his outward appearance already proclaiming the profound thinking poet, whose luxuriance of thought and force of expression, as well as his secular views, must every moment overflow in the most uncurbed recklessness. But how agreeably were these previous opinions dissolved! The most intellectual countenance smiled kindly on the stranger, whose complimentary address was evaded by the most engaging modesty. In conversation, not a word to offend the most susceptible feelings. His views on all points, especially on music and poetry, were novel, singular, and convincing, though national in the highest degree; his expressions about the works of others very striking, but yet forbearing, and his criticisms never unaccompanied by evidence to support them. A youth in years, but a mature man in mind, the scale he applied to all subjects carried conviction with it, lowering the standard of much that had been hitherto considered great, and making much hitherto esteemed common-place appear of importance. His face was naturally pale, but flushed brightly in the course of conversation. His weak eyes, the simple form in which his hair was moved back, and his slender, white throat, gave the poet a peculiar appearance, contrasting as favorably with the affectation and pretensions of society as the sublimity of his expressions did with his common-place phrases. There was especial skill in the manner in which he contrived to connect different subjects, and to place them in order, so that one seemed to be developed by another, thus contributing more than any one to the conversational pleasures of the company—very often the hands of the clock being accused of undue speed, no one being able to comprehend the possibility of time having flown with such rapidity. His singularly charming and attractive countenance, which never betrayed any sharp or disagreeable expression; powers of conversation which elevated the listener to a level with the poet, ennobling every feeling and embellishing every idea; thoughts which revealed the most pure goodness, yet without any alloy of weakness.

The Wife.

Here is the best tribute to woman we ever read:

Only let a woman be sure she is precious to her husband—not useful, not valuable, not convenient, simply, but lovely and beloved; let her be the recipient of his polite and hearty attentions, let her feel that her cares and love are noticed, appreciated, and returned; let her opinion be asked, her approval sought, and her judgment respected in matters of which she is cognizant; in short, let her only be loved, honored, and cherished, in fulfillment of the marriage vow, and she will be to her husband, her children, and society, a well-spring of happiness. She will bear pain, and toil, and anxiety, for her husband's love to her is a tower and fortress. Shielded and sheltered therein, and adversity will have lost its sting. She may suffer, but sympathy will dull the edge of sorrow. A house with love in it—and by love I mean love expressed in words and deeds, for I have not one spark of faith in love that never crops out—it is to a house as a person to a machine, one is life, the other mechanism—the unloved women may have bread just as light, a house just as tidy as the other, but the latter has a spring of beauty about her, a joyousness, a penetrating and prevading brightness to which the former is an entire stranger. The deep happiness of her heart shines out in her face. She gleams over. It is airy, graceful, and warm, and welcoming with her presence; she is full of devices and plots, and sweet surprise for her husband and family. She has never done with the romance and poetry of life. She herself is a lyric poem, setting herself to all pure and gracious melodies. Humble household ways and duties have for her a golden significance. The prize makes her calling high, and the end sanctifies the means. "Love is heaven, and Heaven is love."

Wooden Swearing.

I know a little boy, who, when he is 'put out', slams the door, stamps hard with his feet, jerks his chair, throws down his play-things, and, if he is told to pile up wood, makes a great racket in the wood-house. His cross and angry feelings are apt to show themselves in this noisy way.

I know a little girl who does so, to the great sorrow of her dear mamma. The other day I found out what to call such conduct. It is a very hard name, but a true one. It is called wooden swearing, for it is the same kind of feeling which makes wicked men and boys curse and swear. Of course, children who are brought up to know better do not dare to use awful words and take God's name in vain; but they make doors and chairs and boots give vent to their angry feelings in a very noisy and troublesome manner, grieving their parents very much, and grieving and displeasing God, who looks at the heart and knows what is there, whether it is spoken in words or not.

Think of this, children; and while I know you would not, for the world, be guilty of taking God's name in vain upon your lips, be equally careful not to do any wooden swearing either.

Johnsonese.

A sprightly article on "The Engligh Language," in the last Princeton Review, says:

Dr. Johnson was a great sinner in this line. "Our Father, who art in heaven," translated into Johnsonese, would read on this wise: "Parent Divine, who existed in the celestial regions!" "If a body kiss a body, need a body cry," is a piece of as good English as was ever written. Turned into Johnsonese, it would run somewhat on this wise: "On the supposition that an individual salutes an individual, does an individual lie under an obligation to exclaim in a vehement and plaintive voice?" A boy in an English charity-school was once asked "what King David did when the servant told him that his child was dead?" "Please, sir, he cleaned himself and took to his victuals." The admirers of the high-polite style would be quite shocked at such homespun talk, and would array the matter thus: "What course of action did King David pursue when he received intelligence of the demise of the infant?" Answer: "He performed his ablutions, and immediately proceeded to partake of refreshments."

An Esquimaux Belief.—The following is the singular belief of the Esquimaux in regard to the origin of the sun and moon:

"In a distant country there once lived an unmarried woman who had several brothers. Being once at a festive gathering, she felt herself suddenly and violently seized by the shoulders. This she knew was a declaration of love, for such is the custom of her people; but who the man was she could not discover, since the hut was quite dark. There being, to her knowledge, no men in the village besides her brothers, she at once suspected that it must be one of these. She broke from him, and running away, smeared herself with soot and oil. Upon returning to the hut she was seized again, and at this time she blackened one side of the face of her unknown lover. A lighted taper being brought soon afterward, her suspicions were confirmed. Seizing the taper she now ran out of the hut, and bounded over the rocks with the fleetness of a deer. Her brother lighted a taper and pursued her, but his light went out: yet he still continued the chase, and without having overtaken her they came to the end of the earth. Determined not to be caught, the girl then sprang into the heavens. Her brother followed her, but he stumbled in the act of springing, and before he could recover himself, the object of his pursuit was far away from him. Still bent upon gaining the prize, he continued the race, and from that time to this the sun has been going around and around, and the moon around and around after her, trying to catch her. The bright light of the sun is caused by the taper which the maiden carries, while the moon, having lost his taper, is cold, and could not be seen but for his sister's light. One side of his face being smeared with soot, is therefore black, while the other side is clean; and he turns one side or the other toward the earth, as suits his pleasure."

Alexander T. Stuart will soon erect a block of dwellings up town in New York, to cost $1,000,000, and to be forever the home of the working-women in New York. It is not to be an almshouse, but a home—more extensive than the working-women's home in Elizabeth street—where women may find food and shelter at prices within their reach, and whatever revenue it may yield is to be employed in the erection of other like institutions. Mr. Stewart has also resolved to expend $5,000,000 in the erection of tenement houses on an approved plan, and to devise them to a Board of Trustees, to be composed of one person from every religious denomination in the city, and to be so rented as to yield a revenue that shall be applied in the construction of other model tenement houses in New York perpetually.

Definition of Dogmatism.—"Robert, my dear," said Jenny, with a deferential air of a scholar; "Robert, what did Mr. Carraway mean when he said he hated dog—dogmatism?"

Topps was puzzled.

"Robert, my dear," Jenny urged, "what in the world is dogmatism?"

Now it was the weakness of Topps never to confess ignorance of any thing to his wife. "A husband should never do it."

Topps had been known in a convivial season to declare, "it makes 'em conceited." Whereupon Topps prepared himself as was his wont, to make a solemn, satisfying answer.

Taking off his hat and smoothing the wrinkles on his brow, Topps said:

"Humph! What is dogmatism? It is this, of course—dogmatism is puppyism come to its full growth!"

A Court Convulsed.—We have seldom heard of an instance of more beautiful simplicity than was evinced by a matter of fact witness on a recent riot trial case.

"What were the mob doing when you first saw them?" was one of the questions asked by the district attorney.

"They was a singin'," replied the witness.

"Singing!" exclaimed the public prosecutor; "what were they singing about?"

"I don't know, I'm sure; but they were singin', anyhow."

"Well, what was it? What were they singing? What did they seem to be talking about?"

"Wal, as far as I re-collect," replied the witness, "they was singing abeout a man o' the name o' Tucker, who refused to come to his tea."

No Housekeeper.

"Mrs. Jones is a right nice woman, good-hearted, and all that, but I am sorry to say she is no housekeeper."

"Don't know how to cook, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes, she knows how to cook—I never sat down to better bread and cake and coffee and relishes, than I've seen on her table, and she does her own work, too."

"What is the trouble, then?"

"Why she isn't neat—don't keep things in order, as a woman should."

"Don't comb her hair or sweep her room, or dust her things?"

"Her hair always looks well enough, and I believe she sweeps and dusts every morning; but then she lets the children have their own way too much."

"Does she? I really was not aware—"

"I mean," said Mrs. Smith, "they have their baby rags and dolls, and blocks, and other playthings over the floor, and they keep house in the corners of the room, and I don't know what all; now I should soon go distracted with all that nonsense."

"So you don't allow your children such privileges, do you?"

"I rather think not; they have to do better than that when I'm about. What's the use of having a house in such confusion, and everything at all sixes-and-sevens?"

"Well, now, Mrs. Smith, I want to know how you manage your little ones. Come, tell me your rules."

"I don't know as I have any particular rules—only they shall not make a noise around me, nor litter up the floor with their gimcracks."

"You let them have their playthings, don't you?"

"No, indeed, I locked them all up long ago, to keep them from being broken. I tell you, there's no use in humoring young ones so much. I must keep things tidy in my house, and the dear knows I have a time of it anyhow, with Mr. Smith not cleaning his feet on the mat, and the children most always quarreling about something or other."

"Do you think Mrs. Jones has as hard a time as you have, Mrs. Smith?"

"No, I don't believe she worries about anything. Seems to me she don't care how things go."

"Yes, she cares a great deal, and knows exactly how to make her children happy at home, and her husband is always welcomed with a smile, mat or no mat. When her children come here to see mine, they are neither noisy nor quarrelsome, but gentle, playful, healthy, and happy."

"And my children?"

"Well, they are somewhat different. You see, they are kept so tightly at home that they are pretty boisterous in other houses."

"Why don't you send them home, then?"

"Because they will not go; they openly declare that 'Ma is cross, and won't let them play, and they don't like home a bit.'"

"Do my children thus speak of their mother," said Mrs. Smith, as she rose and drew her shawl around her face to hide the coming tear.

"They often do it, my dear friend; but take courage—there is time yet to draw their hearts to you. Have patience with them; give them their toys, and let them enjoy them in their own home. Your house is always so painfully neat and quiet that I almost hate to go there."

"You shall hate it no more on that account," said Mrs. Smith, as she wrung her friend's hand. "I own up that Mrs. Jones is the better housekeeper."

Trot, a Christmas Story.

"Hopedale!"

I opened my sleepy eyes as the conductor's voice rang through the cars, and taking my little carpet-bag, sprang out upon the platform of the little station. My brief holiday was over, and with a shrug, I prepared for my short walk through the morning air, looking forward to the good fire and cup of coffee I was sure Mrs. Watson was keeping for me.

It was a very rare event for me to leave the little village whose name heads this story. My father had been the only resident physician, from the time I was a boisterous schoolboy up to the hour when in his professional rounds he fell dead from heart disease in the main street, leaving me, his heretofore assistant, sole heir to his name, property, and practice. Ten years before they had carried my mother to the little churchyard, and installed Mrs. Watson in her place. The villagers were willing to let the young doctor step into his father's place beside their sick beds, and so for five years I had fulfilled his duties. In all those five years I had taken no holiday, so when an invitation came from my old college friend and since correspondent, Clement Payne, to spend Christmas with him, at his father's place on the Hudson, I was sorely tempted to accept, and finally did so. It was literally Christmas I spent, leaving home at midnight on the 24th, and my friend's home exactly twenty-four hours later. It was a pleasant break in the monotony of my life, and as I stood at sunrise on the Hopedale station platform, I was sure my recreation would give me new vigor for my daily duties.

As I turned to descend the steps leading to the road, some impulse, nay, a Providence, led me to look in the window of the room, by courtesy, "Ladies' Room," of the station. It was cold and desolate. No fire was lighted, and there was no furniture, unless the hard wooden benches against the wall could be so denominated. But curled up on one of these benches, sleeping soundly, lay a strange child. His dress of rich fur-trimmed velvet, the warm fur cap, long gaiters, and mittens, spoke of wealth and care, and the pale face, around which clustered short curls of sunny brown, was round with health and wonderfully beautiful. He was no Hopedale child; I knew them all. My professional instinct made my heart thrill with a sudden shock, as I caught sight of the pale face, for well I knew the danger of that deep sleep in the biting winter air. How long had he been there? Was he already dead? were the questions that I asked myself as I strode across the room and lifted him in my arms. There was no breath came from the white lips, no throb at the wrist, only a faint, very faint, fluttering under my fingers as I pressed them over the baby heart. Mantling him warmly in my heavy cloak, I ran down the steps and raced along the road at a pace that would have considerably amazed my patients, had any of them been awake at that early hour.

Allowing Mrs. Watson no time for amazement, I pressed her into the service, and in what she called "a jiffy," we had the little form undressed, in my bed, undergoing the most vigorous treatment. It was so long before we were successful that my heart almost failed me; but at last the faint heart throbs grew stronger, color came to the pale lips and cheeks, and a pair of large brown eyes appeared from under the heavily-fringed lids I had watched so anxiously.

Only a look of sleepy inquiry was visible as he stared a moment at me, and then obeying my order to drink the warm food prepared by Mrs. Watson, my little patient closed his eyes again, and turned over to finish his nap. He was safe now, I knew; so leaving him to Mrs. Watson's care, who by this time knew as much about him as I did, I went to sleep myself, to be ready for the day's duties.

It was nearly nine o'clock when my housekeeper roused me to say that breakfast was ready and the child awake.

Very wide awake I found him, the glorious brown eyes staring round the room, taking in every detail of its arrangement.

"Who are you? How did you get here? Am I nearly at Australia? Who's that man in the picture?" were the questions poured rapidly forth, before I had time to frame one inquiry. "I want to get up? Who's got my clothes, and who put me to bed without my nightdress?"

Not a sign of fear or a word of home-sickness. I was puzzled.

"What is your name?"

"Trot! I want to get up!"

"You shall get up in a minute, but first tell me your name, and how you came to be asleep in the station?"

"My name is Trot; and the plaguy cars started off without me when I got out. It was a dark night and I could not catch them, so I went into the room and went to sleep till they came again."

"Was your mother in the train—in the car?"

"No; nobody but just me. I'm going to Australia."

"Going to Australia?"

"Yes; Ellen is there! They have roses there at Christmas, and we wanted some for our tree."

"But, my child, you did not leave home alone?"

"Yes, I did! I am not afraid! I am going back right away, as soon as I find Ellen and get the roses."

"But do you know you will have to sail in a great ship for months to get to Australia?"

"Ellen went in the cars. We saw her go, mamma and I. We went in the carriage and said good-bye, and she got in the cars with Mr. Williams."

"Who is Mr. Williams?" I said, eagerly catching at a name.

"Ellen's husband. Our milkman he was, before he went to Australia. He is jolly! always filled my cup for nothing, when I was up."

"And who was Ellen?"

"My nurse."

"What's your father's name?"

"Papa!"

"But his other name?"

"Harry, dear. Mamma always called him so."

"Where does he live?"

"He's dead!" said the child in a whisper. "Mamma cries all the time, most, and wears an ugly black gown every day."

"Well, where does your mamma live?"

"At grandma's with Aunt Daisy, and Walter, and Sue, and baby, and—ain't it funny—baby's my uncle, and he is so little he has to be carried about, and Walter's littler than me, and he's my uncle, too; and Sue's only six, and she's my aunt."

"Where does grandma live?"

"Why, home, in her own house."

"Well, what is her name?"

"Grandma!" in a very positive tone, and becoming restive under so much questioning.

I took him from the bed and began to dress him, and explain his position; but even when he understood that he must give up the Australian journey, and was made to feel something of his mother's despair at losing him, he ceuld give me no clue by which to find his home. Grandpa, grandma, mamma, who was called Mary by the rest, Aunt Daisy and the three children, were all mentioned, and persistent questionings revealed that he lived in a large house in the country, but that was all. My heart grew fairly sick as I looked in his beautiful face and pictured the grief of his widowed mother over the loss of this only child. In vain I searched his clothing for the mysterious "locket containing the miniature of a beautiful female," always found on the stray children in novels; no "strawberry or raspberry mark" disfigured his smooth skin. His clothing, of the most dainty material and make, was marked with the initials "A. H."

Days passed away, and little Trot—for he would own to no other name—was an inmate of my cottage, the very darling of Mrs. Watson's motherly heart. I advertised him in all the cities, hoping some paper would reach his country home; yet, as the days wore away, and he became reconciled to his new home, and ceased to grieve for his family, I began to dread the hour when he should be claimed. His frank, bright joyousness, his merry prattle, his loving caresses, began to fill an unsuspected void in my heart, and Mrs. Watson was a perfect slave to his loving tyranny. She furnished for his bedroom a small apartment leading from her own sleeping-room. She made the day one long act of service for his comfort, and as weeks glided into months, and there was no clue found to guide us to his home, she taught him to call her grandma, while Uncle Charley became my newly acquired title. To tell how he was petted in the village would be a vain task to attempt. To say that he was the hero and idol of Hopedale, will give but a faint idea of his popularity. Gradually the memory of his home, Ellen, visit to Australia, died away, and he seemed to forget that he ever lived away from us. Mamma and Aunt Daisy had been the ones of whom he spoke most; but I judged from all he said that his father's death was very recent, and his residence at his grandparent's a brief visit only in his memory.

Eleven months had this dear little treasure been an inmate of my house, when there came a new dream of hope and happiness. About five miles from Hopedale there resided, and had lived for many long years, an eccentric old bachelor, by name Hermon Graham. His home, Leehaven, was very far away from any cluster of houses, indeed nearly a mile from any other residence; and here, in solitary state, with only two ancient servitors for his household, he had lived ever since I could remember. He was a morose, ill-tempered man, and some early cross had made him adopt a perfectly hermit like seclusion, though his wealth would have commanded every advantage society could offer. It was early in November that I was summoned to attend this odd genius professionally. The little note brought to my office by an elderly man on horseback, was signed "Lilian Graham," and urged my immediate attention.

It was a long, cold drive, but the man represented his master as very ill, so I prepared to obey the summons. "I had no idea your master had a daughter," I said, referring to the note.

"That's master's niece," was the reply, "a sweet young lady as ever I see. She comes down on a visit sometimes from her father's place near Albany. They were burnt out, her father's folks, last winter, and the family all went to Europe while the new house was building. They came home about a fortnight ago, but they wont go into the new house till spring, so some of them's a boarding in New York, and some in Albany, and Miss Lilian, she's come to spend the winter with her uncle. They are all coming down for Christmas, I expect."

I found my new patient very ill, and for a week my visits were frequent, and more than once I passed a whole night at his bedside. I do not mean this for a love tale, so I will not weary my reader with the why and the wherefore of my heart bending in allegiance to Lilian Graham's charms. Her beauty, gentleness and winning grace touched my heart as no woman had ever before thrilled it, and before that weary week of anxiety and watchings was over, I loved her. As her uncle began to recover, my visits slid from a professional capacity into a social one, and I saw that my welcome was a sincere one from both, from the old gentleman and the fair girl, whose devotion to his sick bed proved her love. I was agreeably surprised to find the hermit neither so savage or inaccessible as he had been represented to me. He had a painful chronic disorder; his manner was brusque, and his voice often harsh, but he could soften, and I was able to give him relief from pain, for which he repaid me by a gracious reception.

Christmas was drawing near, and I resolved to lay my heart before Lilian, and ask her to be my wife. I was heir to considerable property left by my father, I had a good practice, a pleasant home, and could offer her the pure love of a young heart, so I was not without hope, especially as I could see the flush deepen on her cheek, and the glad light spring to her blue eyes whenever I was announced. She was in mourning, and I often longed to question her about the loss it implied, but our interviews were very brief, and but seldom occurred, and she never spoke of her sorrow. I, too, had a story to tell. Of course, if she became my wife she must hear about Trot. It was the day before Christmas, and the snow was smooth and hard around Hopedale, so I ventured to propose a sleigh-ride, meaning to open my heart as we drove. She accepted my proposal readily, and we were soon on our way. Somehow there fell a long silence between us; I longing but not daring to speak, my eyes fixed upon that lovely face, framed in its pretty fur-bound hood, the eyes looking down, the sweet mouth set with a sadder expression than I had ever seen it wear. Suddenly she spoke:

"I expect my parents, brothers and sisters here to-morrow."

"For Christmas gayeties?" I questioned.

"No, to escape them. They are coming here to pass the day quietly, far away from any festivity. It is a sad day for us. Doctor do you believe in a broken heart?"

"Yes; I know they exist."

"And are fatal?"

"Sometimes! I have seen heavy sorrow drain away life."

"My poor sister," she said sadly, her eyes filling with tears, "I fear her heart is broken." And after a pause she said: "A year ago—a year ago—poor little Trot!"

"Trot!" I cried, breathlessly.

"My sister's only child, who died on Christmas day last year."

"Died!" I said, my hope sinking.

"Burnt to death!" she said, sadly. "We had a Christmas tree for the children in the nursery. My sister had been a widow only three months, so we had no holiday gathering, but we dressed a tree for the little ones and lighted it on Christmas Eve. The next morning they, the children I mean, were all in the nursery, and we suppose one of them tried to light the tree. Certain it is that they set the room on fire, and before we could save anything the whole house was in flames. All escaped but my sister's child, her only one. He perished in the fire."

"Are you certain?"

"Where else could he be? My two little brothers and my sisters were saved with difficulty, and the roof fell in while we were all frantically searching and calling for Arthur, or, as we always called him, Trot. My sister's health gave way entirely under this blow. She had concentrated all the strength of her love upon this child after her husband died, and the loss prostrated her utterly. We took her to Europe; we have had the best advice for her, but she is slowly dying of a broken heart."

"It is from no impertinent curiosity," I said, "that I question you. Will you answer my inquiries?"

We were speeding over the frozen ground toward my home, as she answered:

"Certainly."

"This little child—he had a pet name for you?"

"Yes; my home name. They call me Daisy, and he called me Aunt Daisy."

"And your sisters' names are Mary and Sue, your brothers' Walter and Baby."

"Yes, yes," she said, and turning very pale.

"And Trot's nurse, Ellen, did she go to Australia?"

"Yes, a year ago last fall. Your face is radiant! Speak quickly—our lost boy."

We were at the door; her face was ashy white with emotion, but she obeyed my motion, and let me lead her from the sleigh to my office. I made her sit down, and began to explain, when—"Uncle Charley's come! Uncle Charley!" rang out from my pet's voice, and Trot burst into my room. Lilian rose to her feet with a wild cry of "Trot! Arthur! darling!"

For a moment he stood bewildered; then a sudden rush of memory came over the chiildish heart, and he sprang into her arms.

"Aunt Daisy! Where's mamma! I want mamma! Quick! quick! Uncle Charley, Aunt Daisy, take me to mamma!"

For nearly three hours we sat in the little office before Lilian could tear herself away from the child, but at last she let me take her to the sleigh, consoling Trot by a promise that to-morrow he should see his mother.

I left the disclosures to her womanly heart. But on the morrow, when I drove over with the child, dressed in his black velvet suit, altered to fit him by Mrs. Watson's trembling fingers, and moistened I am sure by many tears, I found all prepared for the great joy.

Such a Christmas never dawned for me. To tell of the gratitude of the pale widow, the joy of the grandparents, the boisterous greetings between the children, is beyond the power of my pen.

Of course the precise time and manner of Arthur's escape from the house we could only conjecture. The nurse was in the kitchen nearly an hour when the alarm of fire was given, and the flames had gained great headway before they were discovered, the family sitting-room being on a different floor, and some distance from the nursery. Of course the fearless boy had left the house before the attempt to light the tree was made, but the others, absorbed in Christmas delights, did not miss him. The distance from the house to the station was very short, and Ellen had gone to New York from the little village near which Mr. Graham's house was situated. The departure for Europe, and the certainty all felt of his fate, had prevented any search being made for the boy, and we presume the railway officials supposed he belonged to some party on the train.

It was a glad day for all, for if I lost my little treasure, I won from Lilian the right to be called in good truth Trot's Uncle Charley.

Playing Lady.

Just twelve years old this very day—
Thank Heaven! I'm not a baby—
Next come my glorious teens—but stay,
I'll put my playthings all away,
Hoop, ball, and skipping rope, and swing,
And dolly house, and everything—
I'm going to be a lady!

A lady with bewitching air,
And toilette a la Paris;
And, now I think of it, I'll wear
A sprig of something in my hair,
And snatch my robe up daintily,
And scream at every bug I see,
And romp no more with Harry.

As mother says, with serious face,
"Old Time flits fast and faster;
'Tis first a walk, and then a pace,
And then a madly hurrying race,
So soon the prattler's smiles and tears
Give way to woman's hopes and fears,"
As if that were disaster!

Nay; press along, old charioteer,
Thy coursers swift and steady!
Through many a far and future year,
Bear—bear me on—I have no fear;
For bliss or woe, for good or ill,
With patient hope, and pliant will,
My beating heart stands ready.

Farewell, ye trifling, childish toys,
Mud pies, and all that folly!
Farewell, ye little girls and boys!
I smile at your small griefs and joys,
For fancy soars on daring wings,
And beckons towards sublimer things
Than—goodness! there's my dolly!

O, Betsy, Ann! your hat's askew,
Your shoulder's dislocated,
Your frock is torn, you've lost a shoe,
That cruel pin has pierced you through,
And O, that fixed, despairing eye—
Dear me! how can I pass you by—
My heart is not casemated.

O, Betsy Ann! you've conquered—there!
Adieu to grown-up fancies!
Now Hal may laugh and Debby stare,
And mother rave in wild despair,
I'll be a little girl again;
There's time enough for care and pain
And all life's grave romances.

—Little Corporal.

The Masonic Trowel.—This work, containing valuable Masonic reading, edicts, and decisions, is published by H. G. Rynolds & Son., at Springfield, Ill., at $1.25 per annum. It should be read by every Mason. —Pine Bluff Dispatch.

Married.

At the residence of Mr. Samuel Spencer, in Winslow, Ill., Feb. 13, 1868, by Rev. Bro. Geo. Richardson, Bro. WILLIAM BODDY, of Franklin Lodge No. 18, Kansas, to Miss ANNA E. MEEKER, of Winslow.

Died.

On the 12th ult., at Nauvoo, Bro. W. K. BURT, a member of Reclamation Lodge No. 54, A., F. & A. M. The lodge passed appropriate resolutions.

Near Lafayette, Stark county, Sunday, Feb. 23, after a long and severe sickness, the wife of W. Bro. Wm. B. Smith, Master of Stark Lodge No. 501.

In Brighton, Ill., January 31, 1868, VIRGINIA E. RICHMOND, eldest daughter of Volney P. Richmond, of Paddock's Grove, Madison county, Ill.

Our dear Jennie has left us and gone; she has passed through the dark valley of the shadow of death, and gone home to her Heavenly Father, and the blessed Father of us all. And she may be even now hearing the seraphim's songs and the angelic anthems of the redeemed in Heaven.

"Oh! power eternal, source of all good,
In whom all perfection we see,
Oh! grant us a due resignation of mind,
And fix our affection on Thee."

It may truly be said, she was "One of the excellent of the earth."

And oh! how bright, in realms of light,
Her sinless soul will shine,
While on her tongue the angel's song,
Will rise in strains divine.

By her affectionate uncle, G. P. W.

DECKER & CO.'S

IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

PIANO FORTES!

Warerooms: No. 2 Union Square, corner Fourteenth St. and Fourth avenue,

NEW YORK.

These Instruments are celebrated throughout the country, and are distinguished for

THEIR SINGING QUALITY,
VOLUME and PURITY OF TONE,
SYMPATHETIC, ELASTIC, EVEN TOUCH,
DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION,
and BEAUTY OF FINISH.

Decker & Company's Pianos have always received the First Premiums, whenever and wherever they have competed with the most celebrated makers in this country.

OUR IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

Is an invention beautiful in its simplicity and wonderful in its practical effects. It is the most compact Agraffe ever invented, and its influence upon the tone is to render it mellower, rounder, and more clearly brilliant, while it utterly overcomes that sharp, metalic quality which disfigures the instruments of all other makers.

WHY WE EXCEL.

While other Pianos are rarely in tune,

THE DECKER & Co.'s PIANOS invariably retain their Pitch and Tone.

While other Pianos are made of poor or unseasoned materials,

THE DECKER PIANOS combine the Best Materials, Skillful Workmanship, and Scientific Construction.

While other Pianos are deficient in the great requisites of a good touch,

THE DECKER & Co. PIANOS have a flexibility under skillful manipulation, which not only adapts them to the style of every performer, but which causes the player to feel en rapport with the Instrument, and affords his taste and fancy free expression.

IT IS A FACT—That philosophy of construction is not less important than fitness of material.

IT IS A FACT—That various minute, unobserved appliances, adaptations, and improvements have an influence in the tone, durability and manipulative character of a Piano, in no degree inferior to the more ostensible modifications.

IT IS A FACT—Therefore, that science, as well as experience; artistic discrimination, as well as methodic care; capital, as well as conscientiousness, are requisite in the production of a GOOD PIANO-FORTE. In our

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte

is exhibited the result of an uninterrupted, persevering regard for these facts and principles; and purchasers who have so often spoken of the uniformity of excellence in our Instruments will be led to understand how this superiority and uniformity has been attained—a result which is apparent to even ordinary judges, in the volume and richness of tone, the sustained and human character of their singing quality, while connoisseurs and critics fully indorse all that we have adverted to.

The unanimous opinion of the best artists and the most reliable critics is, that

THE DECKER & COMPANY'S

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte is the only Square Piano-Forte, which, in Voluminous Sonority, and Positive Solidity of Tone,

Can stand comparison with the

BEST GRAND PIANO-FORTES MADE.

☞ Every Piano is Warranted for Seven years.

The Masonic Trowel.

"The grand object of Masonry is, to promote the happiness of the human race."--Washington.

VOL. VII. SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS, APRIL 15, 1868. NO. 4.

Selected Poetry.

Strike for the Just and True.

Strike for the just and true,
Though with the weak and few,
Not with the sabre, the sword, or the dart,
Helmet, shield, coat of mail,
All are but weak and frail.
Truth, like a light'ning flash, pierces the heart.

What though the cannon roar,
Drenching the field with gore;
Love is the power will govern the world:
Strike with thy sympathy,
Thought that is pure and free
Laughs at the thunders that despots have hurl'd.

Falsehood shall fade and die,
Falsehood shall shrivell'd lie,
Scorched by the radiance that darts from the truth;
Truth shall mount up on high,
Eagle-like, pierce the sky,
Ever renewing her beauty and youth.

Cold is expediency;
Virtue is heavenly,
She drinks the nectar that seraphims quaff.
What though the world may rail,
Let not thy courage fail,
Earth's frowns and favors are light as its chaff,

Fickle as Fancy's child,
By every toy beguiled.
Heaven gives justice, and mercy, and love;
But earth's "Hosanna cry,"
Changes to "Crucify."
"Well done, ye righteous," comes down from above.

God is the Holy One,
Strive that His will be done,
Vain are the malice and craft of the foe;
Onward the truth must run;
On like the radiant sun,
Vainly the storm-clouds are muster'd below.

Up o'er the mountain path;
Up spite of scoff and wrath,
Virtue must labor, though Vice sit supine;
Up where the orb of day,
Darts its refulgent ray,
Vice is seductive, but Truth is Divine.

See! at the pearly gate
Angels of glory wait!
Beck'ning the spirits that strive for the true;
Mark where the golden crown
Flashes resplendence down!
Heaven is open, and waiting for you!
—Freemason's Magazine (London).

Communion with the Departed.

How pure at heart and sound in head,
With what divine affections bold,
Should be the man whose thought would hold
An hour's communion with the dead!

In vain shalt thou, or any, call
The spirits from their golden day,
Except, like them, thou too canst say,
"My spirit is at peace with all."

They haunt the silence of the breast,
Imaginations calm and fair,
The memory like a cloudless air,
The conscience as a sea at rest.

But when the heart is full of din,
And doubt beside the portal waits,
They can but listen at the gates
And hear the household jar within.

Lament of the Exiles.

Sacred history tells us that our ancient brethren were "carried captives to Babylon"—away from their loved Judea, and the city and graves of their fathers. The poet has seized upon the moment of their departure, in chains and captivity, to give utterance to their sorrows; and it is done with a touching pathos that goes home to the heart, We do not know who is the author.—Ed.

Oh! God of our fathers, El Shaddai the blest;
Look down on thy people, by famine oppressed;
See, wearily, sadly, with sorrow and weeping,
We leave this loved land where our fathers are sleeping.

No more in fair Judah our harvests we'll reap;
No more by her waters we'll lead forth our sheep;
Her day star is setting, 'twill rise on us never,
For we leave her green valleys for ever and ever.

With song and with laughter, or sound of our voice,
The homes of our childhood no more shall rejoice,
And soon shall the spider her curtains be weaving
Around these loved halls which now sadly we're leaving.

Gone—gone, are the bulwarks on which we relied;
Prone—prone, in the dust lies our glory and pride;
Fled—fled, are our hopes, our sad hearts are sighing,
As the flower of our lives droops withered and dying.

The bird which flies southward when winter is near,
At the coming of spring time again will be here;
But none of us exiles, with sad hearts now burning,
Shall ever with joy to our homes be returning.

Selections from the Poets.

COURTESY.

Above all things, raillery decline;
Nature but few does for that task design:
'Tis in the ablest hands a dangerous tool,
But never fails to wound the meddling fool.
For all must grant it needs no common art
To keep men patient when we make them smart.
No wit alone, nor humor's self will do,
Without good-nature, and much prudence, too,
To judge aright of persons, place, and time—
For taste decrees what's low, and what's sublime;
And what might charm to day, or o'er a glass,
Perhaps at court, or next day, would not pass.
—Stillingfleet.

DELAY.

Shun delays, they breed remorse;
Take thy time, while time is lent thee;
Creeping snails have weakest force;
Fly their fault, lest thou repent thee;
Good is best when soonest wrought—
Lingering labors come to naught.

Hoist up sail while gale doth last—
Tide and wind stay no man's pleasure;
Seek not time when time is past—
Sober speed is wisdom's leisure.
After-wits are dearly bought;
Let thy fore-wit guide thy thought.
—Robert Southwell.

DRUNKENNESS.

It hath pleased the devil, drunkenness, to Give place to the devil, wrath; one
Unperfectness shows me another, to Make me frankly despise myself.
I will ask him for my place again; he Shall tell me, I am a drunkard: had I
As many mouths as Hydra, such an answer
Would stop them all. To be now a sensible
Man, by-and-by a fool, and presently
A beast! Every inordinate cup
Is unblessed, and th'ingredient is a devil.
Oh, thou invisible spirit of wine!
If thou hast no name to be known by, let Us call thee devil!

FASHION.

Fashion, leader of a chattering train,
Whom man for his own hurt permits to reign—
Who shifts and changes all things but his shape,
And would degrade her vot'ry to an ape—
The fruitful parent of abuse and wrong,
Holds a usurped dominion o'er his tongue,
There sits and prompts him with his own disgrace,
Prescribes the theme, the tone, and the grimace,
And, when accomplished in her wayward school,
Calls gentleman whom she has made a fool.
—Cowper's Conversation.

PURITY.

Fair girl! by whose simplicity
My spirit has been won
From the stern earthliness of life,
As shadows flee the sun;
I turn again to think of thee,
And half deplore the thought
That, for one instant, o'er my soul
Forgetfulness hath wrought!
I turn to that charmed hour of hope,
When first upon my view
Came the pure sunshine of thine heart,
Borne from thine eyes of blue.
'Twas thy high purity of soul—
Thy thought-revealing eye—
That placed me spell-bound at thy feet,
Sweet wanderer from the sky.

THE SYMBOLISM OF SACRED PLANTS.

As Developed in Freemasonry and the Kindred Institutions of the Ancient World.

BY ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D.

XX.

THE BO TREE.

Again are we involved in the mystical symbolism of oriental mythology. Passing from the children of Zoroaster—the worshipers of Ormuzd—and from their modern descendants—the Guebres of Persia and the Parsees of India—we are now about to mingle with the disciples of Budha, whose sacred tree is to be the subject of our present consideration.

The Budhist religion, which, according to Professor Neumann, is practiced by three hundred and sixty-nine millions of people, is the prevailing faith in China, Thibet, the Indo-Chinese countries, and Tartary. Ceylon, which has been described as the most beautiful of the Indian islands, is the chief depositary of this extraordinary form of worship.

More than two thousand years ago, this religion was introduced by Gotama, the son of Sudhodana, a king of Kapilawastu, on the borders of Nepaul. Born in the year before Christ 624, he was reared in all the luxury and dissipation of an eastern prince. But when about seventeen years of age, he became disgusted with the pleasures of the world, and, abandoning his family and friends, he retired into the forest of Uruwela, where he passed six years in solitude and ascetic discipline, reducing his daily allowance of food to a minimum, until one night he fell to the ground senseless from exhaustion. After this he proceeded to another part of the forest, where, seated under a bo tree, he was attacked by innumerable hosts of demons, who sought by divers temptations to turn him from the paths of rectitude, but who, abashed by his firmness and tranquility, at length fled from his presence, and left him to receive the reward of his constancy and privations in the possession of the Supreme Budhaship. Budhas, in this mystical faith, are beings who appear in the world at intervals, and who, after having passed through a great variety of transmigrations, have, by their ab-to Adam, assuring him of the continuance of life and happiness, even to immortality and everlasting bliss, through the grace and favor of his maker, upon condition of his perseverance in this state of innocency and obedience. Of this he might eat and live."

Dr. Raphall, in his recent version, says: "The tree of life, the fruit of which prolongs life or renders immortal," and he refers, as I shall, hereafter, to the fact that the Indian and Persian mythology have preserved a tradition of this tree.

Heidegger, in his "Roshe Abbot," goes more extensively into the discussion. His language is too long for translation in full, but his views are substantially as follows: The tree of life, he says, received this name not because there was in it any inherent power of eternal life, or because it was more salubrious than other trees, but because it gave to man a certain pledge of the eternal life which he should obtain whenever he should have fulfilled the duty of perfect obedience. Its name was therefore not derived from this temporal life, but from the eternal and heavenly one, of which it was a symbol. And that it referred not to a prolongation of life on earth, but to a future immortality, he thinks is apparent from the subsequent record that Adam was thrust out of the garden lest he should put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life and eat and live forever.

There can then be no doubt that the tree of life was, like the "life-giving Homa" of the Zoroastric Persians, a symbol of the great doctrine of immortality in a future life.

Professor Tuch, in his "Commentary on Genesis," confirms, with great learning, this idea of the prevalence among all nations of a myth referring to a paradise and a tree of life. His language on this subject is worth a full citation:

"In the mythology of Thibet, the paradisiacal state is represented as perfect and spiritual; but mankind lose their spirituality from the desire to eat of a sweet plant called Shima, and then they become conscious of the feeling of shame as well as of the want of clothing. Necessity drives men afterwards to agriculture; virtue is lost, and in its place comes murder, adultery, and all other vices. The Zendavesta exhibits a still more striking analogy with the account of Genesis, and it therefore merits a closer comparison with the Scriptural narrative. Immortality is bestowed by the sap of the death-dispelling tree Homa, which restores the dead to life at the resurrection. Ahriman, with his fatal gift of death, descends from heaven in the form of a serpent—the usual self-created disguise under which the evil principle appears together with the Deos. We find, also, that the first parents of the human race, Mashja and Meshjane, are destined for happiness so long as they remain in unity with their Creator. But the wicked spirit penetrates into their thoughts, and causes them to acknowledge the creation of the good principle to be the work of Ahriman. The happiness of the soul, which was created pure and immortal, is lost; then Deo presents to them fruit, of which they eat, and only one blessing out of a hundred remains to them. They next clothe themselves with the skins of beasts; they build houses, but forget to thank the author of their existence. Thus the Deos obtain a cruel power over them, and produee among them revolts, enmities, hatred, and envy. The resemblance here pointed out has long been acknowledged by commentators, and it will be seen especially that the Biblical narrative manifests the influence of Central Asiatic ideas in the primeval water, the marvelous trees, the serpent, the enmity of man with the serpent tribe, and the Cherubim."

Priaulx, in his "Questiones Mosaicæ," gives further illustrations of the prevalence of this belief of a terrestrial paradise and a tree of life among the ancient nations.

"In the legends of the Chinese," says he, "We hear sometimes of a fountain of immortality; at others, of a tree of life; and in the heaven of Indra, so the Hindu mythology teaches, is a tree which sprang from the Amurnam, which was charmed by the gods; and those in the heavenly world who eat of its fruit have immortality and whatsoever they desire."

Nor will the reader forget the legend of the tuba tree of Mohammed, which grows in the palace of the prophet in Paradise, although a branch of it will reach to the house of every true believer, and will be laden with fruits unknown to mortals. From its roots will flow streams of milk and honey, and, above all, the river of life.

Then, in the Buddhist faith we have the legend of the Tavateinza Paradise, where grows the lota tree, which is the sacred image of the heavens. This tree, every thousand years, produces a most exquisite fruit. The gods and those mortals who have reached the eternal bliss of heaven periodically visit this tree, to wait an hundred years that they may partake of its immortality-bestowing fruit.

It would be needless to multiply these instances. All the religions of antiquity show some reference to the myth of a paradise or garden, and some mystical tree which promises, to those who shall eat of its fruit, the gift of immortality.

Seeing, therefore, that the Biblical legend of a tree of life is thus found, in various modifications, dispersed over all the ancient world, then, that we may understand what is the analogy between the tree of Eden and the other sacred trees which represent it in the ethnical systems, we are only to inquire what is the true symbolic import of the Paradisiacal tree.

We have already learned that, according to the orthodox opinion, which may be given in the language of Cruden, the tree of life was "so called because it was a natural means of preserving man's life and freeing him from all infirmities, diseases, and decays during his abode on earth; and also a sacramental pledge of his continuance in that life, upon condition of his perfect obedience."

Now, all the Fathers of the Church have agreed that the tree of life, as a symbol, referred to the doctrine of immortality. Thus, St. Augustine says that the tree of life was in the material Paradise what the Divine Wisdom is in the spiritual; and Jerome says that as the tree of life was in the midst of Paradise, so is the Church quickened by the wisdom of God, that is Christ. And hence we are told, in the Book of Revelations, "to him that overcometh will I give to eat of the Tree of Life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God."

And thus, too, this symbolic idea is still retained in the church, and in an old and beautiful hymn which is sung on Good Friday, the Cross on which the Saviour of the world suffered is thus addressed:

"O, faithful cross! O, noblest tree!
In all our woods, there's none like thee;
No earthly groves, no shady bow'rs
Produce such leaves, such fruit, such flow'rs."

Recalling, then, all that has been hitherto said of the sacred plants which have been found among the religions of antiquity, all of which—the acacia, the pine, the laurel, the palm, the myrtle, and the olive, as well as many others—have been shown to have been symbolic of the doctrine of immortality, we are constrained to believe that all of these trees of immortal life find their great prototype in that tree of life described in the cosmogonic document that has been preserved by the compiler of the Book of Genesis, and which must have furnished to each of these religions of the ancient peoples the foundation of a similar tradition, which they have modified according to their own imaginations and the peculiar influences of their religious faith.

"Jerusalem and its Temple."

LECTURE BY THE REV. PROF. PORTER, D. D., LL.D.

Tuesday evening, February 11, the Rev. Dr. Porter, who had for fourteen years been a resident of the Holy Land, delivered a lecture in Belfast, Ireland, on "Jerusalem and its Temple; with notices of the remarkable excavations now being made by English Engineers." The lecture was delivered under the auspices of the Masonic body, and the object was to raise funds for carrying out the excavations now being made by the Royal Engineers, under the patronage of her Majesty, with a view to the discovery of the ruins of the temple. The hall was fairly filled, and the attendance was most influential. A great many members of the Brotherhood, who wore the brilliant and suggestive insignia of the Order, were in attendance. Rev. Dr. Porter said:

The importance of the subject upon which I am about to address you is universally admitted. The eyes of Christianity are concentrated on Jerusalem as the cradle of the Christian religion. The children of Abraham, from the places of their exile in every country under heaven, turn with respect and veneration to Jerusalem as the capital of their fatherland, and the ancient sanctuary of their God. Two hundred millions of Mohammedans, ranging from the shores of the Atlantic to the wall of China, honor Jerusalem as one of the holiest shrines of Islamism. Scholars, too, without regard to sect, or party, or race—scholars of all creeds, and of no creed, admit that Jerusalem, as an ancient and distinguished city, has paramount claims upon their attention. In historic and sacred interest, Jerusalem is first among the cities of the world.

The reverend gentleman then passed rapidly in review a few of the events which bore specially upon his subject, embellishing the retrospect with the choicest and most eloquent language. Returning to the temple (which was illustrated by a well-executed diagram placed on the platform) he said:

The buildings and decorations of the Jewish Temple I shall now endeavor briefly to describe. This splendid plan will enable you, I believe, to follow me with ease. I may state—and I trust, sir, you will excuse me for making the statement—that it has been prepared under the direction, and in the office, of one who is himself a master of the old Phœnician art—one, too, whose architectural genius has not only placed him at the head of the noble Order of Masons in Ulster, but has recently gained for him, at the hand of the representative of his sovereign, that title which he now bears and adorns.

Mount Moriah appears to have been originally a rugged crown of white limestone, which rose steeply from the crest of a long ridge. On its eastern side was a deep ravine, called Kidron, separating it from the Mount of Olives. On its western side was another ravine, equally deep, but much narrower, called Tyropœon, dividing it from Mount Zion. The southern prolongation of the ridge of Moriah was called Ophel; the northern, Bezetha.

On the rough, projecting crown of Moriah, David built his altar. The crown was deemed sacred. It was left untouched; and upon it Solomon constructed the great "altar of burnt-offering." That great natural altar—that "holy rock"—was the center—the nucleus—of all the subsequent buildings from Solomon to Herod; and it is, as I shall show you, deemed sacred to the present day. Immediately to the west of the altar, and facing it, Solomon built the temple itself, or shrine, 80 cubits long, by 20 wide and 20 high. It was divided into three parts. At the extreme end, on the west, was the "most holy place," which measured an exact cube. There the ark was placed, and the Shekinah glory hovered over it, thus wondrously realizing the symbolic name Moriah—"The manifestation of Jehovah." Next, and divided from the "holy of holies" by the veil, was the "holy place," double the size of the other, or just two cubes; and in front was the porch, in size half a cube, and containing the two famous pillars, Jachin and Boaz. The arrangement was such, that had the doors been open, and the veil drawn back, the Shekinah would have been in full view of the smoking sacrifice on the great altar. Along each side (and some say the western end of the shrine) was a range of small chambers for the priests, carried up in three stories to near the top of the temple walls. The whole length of the building, including the chambers, was 80 cubits, or 120 feet; and the breadth 40 cubits, or 60 feet. A peaked roof rose over all to a height, from the ground, of 30 cubits. The porch was remarkable, differing from that of any other ancient building known. It was raised to a height of 180 feet. Probably, each wing was carried up so as to form a tower, resembling some of our great English cathedrals which have two towers in front. The summit of Moriah, we are told, was barely sufficient in extent for the great altar and the shrine. None but the priests were permitted to enter these hallowed precincts, and they were shut in by an ornamental barrier. A much larger space was therefore required for the vast concourse of worshipers.

The steep sides of Moriah prevented the people from seeing the sacrifices, or taking part in the solemn services. To remedy this, Solomon planned and commenced a work whose magnitude and boldness of design, even in these days of colossal engineering, strike the architect with astonishment. He erected massive walls, first along the eastern side of the hill, filling up the space inclosed partly with earth, and partly with enormous piers and arches. It is, doubtless, to these substructions the sacred writer refers when he says, "And the foundations were of costly stones, even of great stones, stones of ten cubits, and stones of eight cubits." Gradually the work advanced. On the southwest and southeast the foundations of colossal walls were laid nearly at the bottom of the Tyropœon and Kidron. Josephus's account of it is almost startling: "They surrounded Moriah," he says, "from the base with a triple wall, and accomplished a work which surpassed all conception. The sustaining wall of the lower court was built up from a depth of 300 cubits (450 feet!), and in some places more. There were stones used in this building which measured 40 cubits."

Perhaps some may be inclined to smile incredulously on hearing such measurements as these; if so, just wait a little till I describe the wonderful discoveries made by recent excavations. A vast artificial platform, measuring about 1,000 feet square, having at length been constructed, the several courts of the temple were arranged as follows: The inner court was some ten feet lower than the platform around the great altar, from which it was separated by a barrier. A portion on the east was inclosed and set apart for women. The inner court could only be entered by Jews, who were ceremoniously clean. It was encircled by a wall forty cubits high on the outside—that is, above the level of the outer court—but only twenty-five within. The principal gate was on the east, facing the temple, but there were also three gates on the north and three on the south side. Outside the wall, at some distance, was a balustrade of exquisite workmanship, with tablets at intervals, inscribed in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, indicating that no foreigner was permitted to pass this boundary. The outer court was of great extent. It encompassed the inner; but was so arranged that there was a much larger space on the south and east than on the other sides, the temple being situated near the northwestern corner. The outer court was surrounded by cloisters erected on the top of the massive exterior walls. The cloister along the eastern side was double, supported by three rows of Corinthian columns. Having been originally founded by Solomon, it is called in the New Testament "Solomon's Porch." It was in it our Lord taught; and in it the multitudes crowded around the apostles Peter and John when they cured the poor cripple. Along the southern side of the court ran the "Royal Porch," the most remarkable of Herod's magnificent works. It consisted of four rows of Corinthian columns, forming nave and aisles. Each niche was 30 feet wide and 50 feet high; and the nave 45 feet wide and 100 feet high. The shafts of the columns were monoliths of white marble; and the roof was of cedar, elaborately carved and gilt. The position of this noble stoa, extending across Moriah from valley brink to valley brink, along the summit of the lofty colossal wall, rendered it an object of unparalleled grandeur from every point of view in and around the city. The outer court was also called the "Court of the Gentiles." It was a place of common resort—a public park, in fact, alike for Jews and strangers. In it were exposed for sale the animals, flour, oil, and other things necessary for sacrifice and oblation. In it were the money-changers. In it our Lord on more than one occasion taught publicly, and exercised His kingly power by driving out dishonest dealers.

One of the most stupendous works of ancient Jerusalem was the bridge that connected the outer court of the temple with the palace on Zion, spanning the Tyropœon ravine. We read of the Queen of Sheba that when she saw among other wonders, "the ascent by which Solomon went up to the house of the Lord, there was no more spirit in her." This "ascent," or bridge, is frequently mentioned by Josephus. It was exactly opposite the middle avenue of the royal porch, and was of the same breadth. The magnificence of this approach to the temple must have been very striking. Even in this 19th century it has no equal for beauty or effect.

The internal arrangements and decorations of the temple were in a style of grandeur corresponding to that of the architecture. The whole interior of the shrine—floor, walls, and ceiling, the whole of the doors, and also, it seems, the most prominent portions of the outside, were covered with plates of gold, sculptured by the first artists of the age. Beside the altar stood an enormous laver, or fountain, of brass, supported on twelve colossal lions. Three aqueducts brought water to the temple; two of them from Solomon's Pool at Etam, eight miles distant, the other on a higher level from the mountains near Hebron. The length of the latter could not have been less than twenty miles! Immense subterranean cisterns were excavated in the solid rock of Moriah. We read also in the Talmud that at the southeast corner of the great altar was a hole pierced through the rock for carrying off the blood into caves below, and that, connected with these caves, was a system of subterranean drains which could be flushed with water at pleasure, so as to wash away the blood and refuse of the numerous sacrifices down to the bottom of the Kidron.

Such was the temple as originally designed by Solomon; and, after being twice destroyed, was rebuilt, and finally completed by Herod. The Jews tell us that forty-six years were spent in rebuilding it. Its site was grand, and it was adapted with consummate skill to the peculiarities of the site. Its spacious courts occupied an artificial platform about a thousand feet square, the sustaining walls of which were, on the southeast and west, of an enormous height. The courts rose, in a series of ornamented terraces, to the little platform of rock on the very summit of the mount, and there, high over all, towered the golden fane itself, bright and gorgeous as a vision of a paradise. When we consider the colossal magnitude of its walls, the perfection of its plan, the architectural beauty of its cloisters, and the gorgeous richness of its decorations, we are compelled to pronounce the temple of Jerusalem unequaled, and even unrivaled, in ancient or modern times. How much of this noble structure now remains? Are there such fragments and traces of its extent as to enable us to illustrate the statements of the sacred writers, and to show that the glowing descriptions of Josephus and the rabbins are not exaggerated? These are questions of the greatest interest and importance to the Biblical scholar, to the antiquarian, and to the historian. They are questions which recent researches and excavations fortunately enable us to answer.

I shall now try to waft you all away with me to the Holy City, that I may show you its present state, the remains of its temple, and a few of the results of the excavations. I place you on the brow of the Mount of Olives. It is holy ground. It is the spot where our Lord sat when His disciples, with true national pride, said to Him, "Master, see what manner of stones, and what buildings are here!" The city is now before us like a panorama. At our feet is a deep glen, coming down from the right, and running away among bleak mountain tops to the left. It is the Kidron. Immediately beyond it, opposite the spot on which we stand, rises a little hill, with steep, shelving sides. It is Moriah. On its summit is a large rectangular enclosure, surrounded by a lofty and massive wall. That is the temple area; and that wall, as we have seen, was founded by Solomon. In the center of the area is a broad platform, raised some 20 feet, and flagged with marble. Upon it stands a large and beautiful octagonal building, surmounted by a graceful dome, and the dome is tipped by a golden crescent. That building is the Great Mosque, one of the holiest shrines of Mohammedanism, and it stands upon the very site of the ancient altar of the temple. Just behind the temple area, on the west, is the ravine of the Tyropœon, now to a great extent filled up. Beyond it rises another hill, longer and higher than Moriah. It is Mount Zion—the Salem of Melchizedek—the fortress of the Jebusites, and the site of the palace of the kings of Israel. On its northern brow still stands a massive square tower, whose Cyclopean masonry declares its Jewish origin. It is the tower of Hippicus, and was one of the strongest defences of the ancient city. I shall now take you into the city, that we may examine two or three of the most interesting relics of its ancient grandeur, in the light of modern research. We go first to that mosque which, as I stated, stands upon the site of the great altar. We are struck with its beauty, richness, and symmetry. On entering, the brilliancy of its stained-glass windows attracts attention. They are not surpassed by those of our cathedrals. But the sanctum of the mosque—the most remarkable object within it—is a huge, bare crown of rock, the very summit of Moriah, which rises about five feet above the floor, and is some sixty feet in diameter. The Mohammedans hold it sacred, and from it the mosque gets its name—Kubbet-es-Sukhrah—"The Dome of the Rock." This is the spot on which Abraham sacrificed. This is the spot on which Ornan had his threshing-floor. This is the spot on which David erected his altar, and on which the great altar of burnt-offering stood in all after ages. I have already stated that at the southeastern angle of the great altar there was a great hole opening into caves below for carrying off the blood. It is there to this day. The caves, too, are there. One of them I entered myself, and I saw the opening in its floor to the lower one. Recent explorations have shown that a great drain, tunneled in the rock, runs through the lower cave; that it is connected with enormous cisterns, from which it could be flushed with water, and that it runs away underneath the harem area down to the bottom of the Kidron. Here, then, modern research has not only identified the exact site of the great altar, but it has discovered that wonderful system of drainage which swept away the blood and refuse of the sacrifices from Solomon's temple. Modern research has also brought to light the remains of the three great aqueducts which, as I have stated, supplied the temple and the city with water. Research and excavation have discovered, too, those enormous subterranean cisterns which were hewn in the solid rock of Moriah; and it has been calculated that they are capable of containing from six to eight millions of gallons. The site of the altar being known, the site of the holy house itself can not be mistaken. It stood immediately to the west. It is not there; for the prophetic judgment pronounced by our Lord has been fulfilled—"There shall not be left one stone upon another."

We shall now examine the exterior walls—the most stupendous works of ancient Jerusalem. I shall first take you to a most interesting spot on the west, beside the Tyropœon. There is here a small open area, on one side of which rises the massive wall. The stones are of enormous size—from ten to twenty feet long. Though beautifully hewn and closely jointed, time has made rents and holes in them. But observe the strange figures that are here: Old men, and frail, haggard women, dressed in the costumes of every country of Europe and Asia. Some are on their knees, some burying their faces in the rents of the old stones, some kissing them, and sobbing and wailing as if their hearts would break. These are Jews who have come from every country under heaven, that with failing eyes they may fondly gaze on, and with their last breath wail over, the fallen and dishonored ruins of the sanctuary whose very dust is still dear to them.

> "Oh! weep for those that wept by Babel's stream,
> Whose shrines are desolate, whose land a dream;
> Weep for the harp of Judah's broken shell;
> Mourn—where their God hath dwelt, the godless dwell!"

I shall now ask you to accompany me to the southern wall. That you may be able to understand my description, and see the results of the excavations, there is represented on the plan a section of Moriah, in the line of the temple wall, from the Tyropœon to the Kidron, showing the present height of the wall, the present surface of the ground, the depth of the foundations, and the original elevation of the royal porch. We go first to the southeast angle. Here is a magnificent fragment of the temple, and one of the finest specimens of mural architecture in the world. The stones are colossal, ranging from 10 to 30 feet in length, by 5 in height—all noble "corner-stones," polished after the similitude of a palace. The elevation of the wall above the present surface is 73 feet. The Royal Engineers sunk a shaft to the foundation, which they discovered at the depth of 60 feet. This angle must, when perfect, have been 140 feet high. And this is not all. It stands on the rocky side of Moriah, which sinks, almost perpendicularly, 200 feet to the bottom of the Kidron. And, besides, on the top of the wall stood the royal porch, 100 feet in height. Consequently, the summit of the porch was 240 feet above the foundation of the wall, and 440 above the Kidron! This was that "pinnacle of the Temple" which was the scene of one part of our Lord's temptation. We now go over to inspect the still more extraordinary discoveries at the southwest angle. We pass on our way two ancient gates, which opened from the low suburb of Ophel, where the priests dwelt, to long subterranean avenues leading up to the temple. The masonry of the southwest angle is even finer than that of the southeast. At present the angle rises 90 feet above the ground. Captain Warren, with great labor, and at no little risk, sunk a shaft, and discovered the foundation laid upon the rock, at the enormous depth of 100 feet. The grandeur of this angle almost surpasses conception. The corner-stones are colossal, measuring from 20 to 40 feet in length, by about 6 in height. One stone, which I myself measured, and which is placed 110 feet above the foundation, is 34 feet long, and weighs above 100 tons. I believe I may say that to raise a stone of such dimensions to such a position would try the skill of modern engineers. It was near this angle the bridge stood, which spanned the Tyropœon, connecting the temple with the palace. The remains have been discovered. The following measurements will give some idea of its stupendous size and grandeur: The spring-stones of one of its arches are 24 feet long by 6 feet thick. The breadth of the roadway was 50 feet, corresponding exactly to the central avenue of the royal porch. The span of each arch was 46 feet. The height above the bottom of the Tyropœon was 225 feet. This stupendous bridge would bear favorable comparison with some of the noblest works of the present century. Can we wonder that, when the Queen of Sheba saw it, "there was no more spirit left in her?"

Though my subject is far from being completed—though my description of Jerusalem and its temple has been brief and very imperfect, I find that I have exhausted my time, and, I fear, more than exhausted your patience. Before concluding, permit me to refer to the Palestine Exploration Society. It has already done a noble work. The committee are continuing to carry on the excavations and surveys with zeal, skill, and eminent success. They have proved themselves worthy of the royal patronage with which they have been honored, and worthy of every support which we can afford them. The distinguished names which appear upon the committee are a sufficient guaranty that everything which zeal for Bible truth, profound scholarship, antiquarian lore, and mature experience can do for the thorough exploration of Jerusalem, will be done. A committee composed of such men as the Archbishop of York, Lords Derby, Shaftesbury, Stratford, and Dufferin, Baron Rothschild, Sir Roderick Murchison, Sir Henry Rawlinson, Deans Stanley and Alford, Dr. Norman McLeod, Professor Owen, Austin Bayard, Gilbert Scott, and Beresford Hope, with the efficient and accomplished Secretary, George Grove—a committee, I say, composed of such men, can not fail to command the universal confidence of the British public, and to insure ultimate success. We already owe them a deep debt of gratitude for the discoveries they have made in connection with the temple. They have earned the gratitude of all Biblical scholars, of the whole Jewish people, of universal Christendom. The study of the temple is not, as some may be disposed to think, a mere dry detail of antiquarian curiosities. It is not a subject which is only interesting because it is old, or which is only important because of its connection with an ancient and remarkable system of worship. Those who think so, make a great mistake. The study of the temple and its ritual, when rightly prosecuted, can never cease to be both interesting and important. I maintain, and I am prepared to prove it, that the study of the temple and its worship is not only interesting to us all in this practical nineteenth century, but that it is, in the present day especially, of paramount importance to the Bible student, to the Christian theologian, and to the patriotic statesman. We have, in the architectural arrangements of the temple, and in its ceremonies—in its sacrifices, oblations, incense, intercessions, mercy-seat, and Shekinah—in the whole of that gorgeous and solemn ritual, a divinely-appointed and most instructive symbolical embodiment of the grand fundamental principles and ennobling doctrines of Christianity. Further, the temple was the center—the nucleus—of the Jewish polity; and the Jewish polity was designed to be, not in its external form, or its accidental and temporary mode of ritualistic development, but in its fundamental principles, a divine model for all perfect human governments. The temple service, with the polity of which it formed the center, was fully inaugurated by the wisest of men and by the most enlightened of monarchs. And its inauguration was not the result merely of the highest human genius, and the most eminent practical ability—it was mainly the result of divine intuition and inspiration. And we see, in that temple ritual, and in the full development of it throughout the Jewish nation, a practical embodiment of the grand fundamental principle—that God is supreme in everything, civil and sacred. We see also, as the necessary result of that principle, a great national establishment of religion. We see, too, that it is only when a nation in a spirit of faith and holy devotion thus consecrates to the King of Kings its wealth, its influence, its power, and its genius, that He will by His blessing make that nation, in the highest and noblest sense, great, glorious, and free.

Correspondence.

From the East Indies.

BOMBAY, 19th March, 1868.

Bro. H. G. Reynolds:

DEAR SIR AND BRO.—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your very kind and fraternal letter on the 12th January last, and the receipt of the books on the 13th instant, and have much pleasure in enclosing Bank of England draft for the amount.

In acknowledging the receipt of the books presented to the library, I have, on behalf of the committee, to return you their best thanks for the handsome and fraternal gift. Individually, I hardly know how to express my feelings at the truly Masonic manner in which you have met me, but of this you may feel assured, that I shall never forget it; it is to me another tangible proof of the length and strength of the "fraternal bond of brotherhood," not to be weakened by distance, but rather gaining strength as it spreads itself over the length and breadth of the land. In India, Masonry may be said (comparatively) to be in its infancy; it has not the vitality, the healthful vigor, that we would wish, but we hope that by disseminating "Masonic knowledge," by placing within the reach of the brethren the means of allaying that thirst for "Masonic knowledge" which (I believe) in initiation is implanted in the breast of every Mason, that Masonry will rear its head higher and still higher, until it will be seen, admired, and beloved by all.

As an evidence of the infantile state of Masonry here, I refer you to a copy of a now defunct Masonic journal, which I send per same mail, particularly to the remarks of an old Mason, made at the dinner table after the working of the 15 sections, "that he did not believe it could have been done."

During my sojourn here, Masonry has made very slow but sure progress, and the future looks bright and cheering.

I have been very much interested in reading the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of Illinois, and admire the procedure. I would like yearly to have a copy if you could favor me with it, and the proceedings of any other grand body that may be at your command, as, in my opinion, these proceedings mark the progress (or otherwise) of the Craft better than could be effected by any other means.

I am sorry to learn that you did not receive the Indian Calendar of Freemasonry sent. I have much pleasure in sending a copy for 1868, and to prevent loss I register it. As requested, I shall have much pleasure in sending you any Masonic information that may come under my notice and that may be worth sending; I am sorry that I have nothing worth mentioning now.

I now conclude, wishing you health and prosperity, and believe me to be,

Dear sir and brother,
Sincerely and fraternally yours,
H. H. Avron, D. G. R.,
Sec. and Treas. M. G. L.

From R. W. Bro. Hawley.

Dixon, Ill., April 20th, 1868.

Dear Comp.:

I am this day in receipt of commission from Grand Council of New Brunswick, Canada.

Last Thursday evening (16th inst.) I constituted Rock River Council R. and S. M., and installed officers and conferred degrees on five companions. Rev. Comp. John Gierlow, T. I. G. M.; Albert J. Jackson, D. I. G. M.; and John A. Ladd, P. C. W., are the three first officers. The companions at Sterling have been some time getting at their labors, but start off in good shape. Comp. H. W. Hubbard has been with us, posting in chapter work; he left here last Wednesday morning. Our new hall is now nearly completed, at a cost of some $7,000. We built the 3d story of the block in which our hall is located, at a cost of $4,000; have had walls and ceiling frescoed, new carpet and furniture throughout, at a cost of nearly $3,000. Making in all, $7,000. We claim to have the finest hall outside of Chicago, and only yield the palm to Oriental and Blancy, there. We expect to dedicate soon, and shall expect to have you here at that time.

I shall acknowledge receipt of commission soon, and return my thanks to the G. P. of New Brunswick. I am very sorry to notice in Trowel that you have been so sorely afflicted, and assure you of my sympathy and prayers. God bless you, and strengthen you in your afflictions, is the prayer of the Craft in Illinois.

Fraternally yours,
James A. Hawley.

"Let There be Light."

Olive Branch Lodge No. 38, A., F. & A. M.,
Danville, Ill., April 21, 1868.

H. G. Reynolds, Secretary of the Masonic Grand Lodge of Illinois:

Dear Sir—By request of the Worshipful Master, I forward to you the inclosed copy of an ancient document, which may probably have been long known to you, but comes to us as a revelation of the past, and a guide for the future, and believing that what so highly interested us would be profitable to the whole Fraternity, we have republished it in a portable form, and have decided to send a copy to each lodge in the State.

We perceive, in this old record, an authoritative precedent and powerful auxiliary to a design for some time entertained by the W. M. and seconded by some of the brethren; to endeavor to revive the ancient spirit and practice of Freemasonry, by making the lodge a pleasant resort for instruction and recreation.

In furtherance of this design we have appointed the third Tuesday in every month for the reading of an essay by such of the brethren as the W. M. may appoint. Thus far our limited experience has given satisfaction to the officers and brethren, and elicited the approbation of visitors. We trust, by a continuance of this course, to give useful instruction to our initiates and younger brethren, inducing them to become thinking men, and ultimately proficient in composition and the delivery of their ideas, fitting themselves to instruct others.

One object in communicating our design and mode of operation to you is to assure you that, if from your superior stand-point and experience, you please to give us any instruction or information whereby our objects may be the better attained or our views extended, it will be respectfully received and acknowledged in behalf of the lodge by

Yours, fraternally and very respectfully,
Benjamin Palmer.

A letter from the learned Mr. John Locke, to the Right Hon. Thomas, Earl of Pembroke, with an old manuscript on the subject of Freemasonry.

6th May, 1686.

My Lord—I have at length, by the aid of Mr. Collins, procured a copy of that MSS. in the Bodleian library, which you were so curious to see; and in obedience to your lordship's commands, I herewith send it to you. Most of the notes annexed to it are what I made yesterday for the reading of my Lady Masham, who is become so fond of Masonry as to say that she now more than ever wishes herself a man, that she might be capable of admission into the Fraternity.

The MSS. of which this is a copy, appears to be about 160 years old; yet, as your Lordship will observe by the title, it is itself a copy of one yet more ancient by about 100 years; for the original is said to have been the hand-writing of King Henry VIth. Where that Prince had it, is at present an uncertainty; but it seems to me to be an examination (taken, perhaps, before the king) of some one of the Brotherhood of Masons, among whom he entered himself, as it is said, when he came out of his minority, and thenceforth put a stop to a persecution that had been raised against them. But I must not detain your Lordship longer by my preface from the thing itself.

Certayne questyons with answeres to the same, concerning the mystery of Maconrye; written by the hande of Kinge Henriye the Sixthe of the name, and faithfullye copyed by me (1) Johan Leylande, antiquarius, by the commaunde of His Highness. (2)	Certain questions with answers to the same concerning the mystery of Masonry, written by the hand of King Henry the sixth of the name and faithfully copied by me (1) John Leland, Antiquary, by command of his Highness. They be as followeth:	They be as follow:
Question. What mote ytt be? (3)	Q. What may it be? (3)
Answer. Ytt beeth the skylle of nature, the understondynge of the myghte that ys hereynne, and its sondrye werkynges; sonderlyche, the skylle of rectenyngs, of waightes and metynges and the treu manere of faconnynge al thynges for mannes use, headlye, dwellynges, and buyldynges of alle kindes, and al other thynges that make gudde to manne.	A. It is the knowledge of nature, the understanding of the power that is therein, particularly the science of numbers, of weights and measures, and the proper manner of forming all things for man's use, chiefly dwellings and buildings of all kinds, and all other things to benefit man.
Q. Where dyd ytt begynne?	Q. Where did it begin?
A. A. It began with the first (4) men in the easte, who were before the first man of the west (5) and coming westward it has brought with it all comforts to the wild and comfortless.
Q. Who dyd bringe that westlye?	Q. Who did bring it to the west?
A. The (6) Venetians, whoo beynge grate merchaundes, comed ffyrste ffromme the este ynn Venetia, for the commodytye of marchaundysynge beith este and weste, by the redde and myddlelonde sees.	A. The Venetians, who being great merchants came first from the east for the advantages of trade both east and west, by the Red and Mediterranean seas.
Q. Howe comed ytt yn Engelonde?	Q. How came it in England?
A. Peter Gower (7) a Grecian journeyedde ffor kunnynge yn Egypte, and yn Syria, and yn everyche lande whereas the Venetians hadde plauntedde Maconrye, and wynnynge entraunce yn al lodges of Maconnes, he lerned muche, and retournedde, and woned yn Grecia magna (8) wachsynge, and becomyng a myghte (9) wyseacre, and greatelyche renowned, and he framed a grate lodge at Groton (10) and maked many Maconnes, some whereoffe dyd journey yn Frannce and maked many Maconnes, wherefromme, yn processe of tyme, the arte passed yn Engelonde.	A. Peter Grower (7) a Grecian traveled for knowledge in Egypt and in Syria and in every land wherein the Venetians had planted Masonry, and gaining entrance into all lodges of Masons he learned much and returned and dwelt in Grecia Magna (8) gaining much wisdom and renown, he there framed a great lodge at Groton, and made many Masons, some of whom traveled to France and made many Masons wherefrom in process of time the art passed into England.
Q. Dothe Maconnes descouer here artes unto odhers?	Q. Do Masons reveal their arts to others?
A. Peter Gower whenne he journeyedde to lernne, was ffyrste (11) made, and anonne techedde, evenne soe shulde all odhers beyn recht. Natheless (12) Maconnes haueth alweys yn everyche tyme from tyme to tyme communicatedde to mannkynde soche of her secrettes as generallyche myghte be usefulle; they haueth keped bache soche allien as should be harmfulle yff they comed yn euylle hanndes, oder soche as ne myghte be holpynge wythouten the techynges to be joined herwythe in the lodge, oder soch as do bynde the freres more strongelyche togeder, bey the profytte and commodytye comyng to the confrerie herfrome.	A. Peter Gower, when he traveled to learn, was first made (11) and then taught, even so should all others to be right. Notwithstanding, Masons have in every time, from time to time, communicated to mankind such of their secrets as might be generally useful; they always kept back such as would be harmful if they got into evil hands, other such as would not be beneficial without the teachings of the lodge, others that do bind the brethren more strongly together by the profit and advantages coming to them thereby.
Q. Whatte artes haueth the Maconnes techedde mankynde?	Q. What arts have the Masons taught mankind?
A. The artes (13) agricultura, architectura, astronomia, geometria numeres, musica, poese, kimistry, governments, and relygyonne.	A. The arts of agriculture, architecture, astronomy, geometry, mathematics, music, poetry, chemistry, government, and religion.
Q. Howe comethe Maconnes more techers than odher menne?	Q. How came Masons to be teachers more than other men?
A. The hemselfe haueth allein in (14) arte of fynding neue artes, whyche arte the ffyrste Maconnes receaued from	A. Masons have always the art of finding new arts, which art the first Masons received from God; by which they find

What other men find out is only by chance, and therefore but little, I believe.
Q. Whatte dothe the Maconnes concele and hyde?	Q. What do the Masons conceal and hide?
A. They concelethe the arte of ffyndynge new artes, and that ys for her own proffytte and (15) preise; they concelethe the arte of kepynge (16) secrettes thatt soe the worlde mayeth nothinge concele from them; they concelethe the art of wunderwerckynge, and of foresayinge things to come, that, so thay same artes may not be usedde of the wyckedde to an euyell ende; they also concelethe the (17) arte of chaunges, the way of wynnynge the facultye (18) of Abrac, the skylle of becomynge gude and perfyghte wythoute the holpynges of fere and hope; and the universalle longage of Maconnes.	A. They conceal the art of finding new arts, and that is for their own profit and honor; (15) they conceal the art of keeping secrets (16) that so the world may nothing conceal from them; they conceal the art of wonder-working and of fore-seeing things to come, that these arts may not be used of the wicked to an evil purpose; they also conceal the art of changes, the way of winning the faculty of Abrac, and the ability to become good and perfect without the aid of fear and hope, and the universal (19) language of Masons.
Q. Wylle he teche me thay same artes?	Q. Will they teach me these arts?
A. Ye shalle be techedde yff ye be worthye, and able to learn.	A. You shall be taught if you are worthy and able to learn.
Q. Doth all Maconnes kunne more than odher menne?	Q. Do all Masons know more than other men?
A. Not so. Thay onlyche haueth recht and occasyoune more then odher menne to kunne, but many doeth fale yn capacity, and manye more doeth want industrye, thatt is pernecessary for the gaynynge all kunnynge.	A. Not so. They only have right and opportunity to know more than other men, but many do fail in capacity, and many more do want industry, which is indispensably necessary for the gaining of knowledge.
Q. Are Maconnes gudder menne thun odhers?	Q. Are Masons better men that others?
A. Some Maconnes are not so vertuous as some odher menne; but yn the moste parte thay be more gude than thay woulde be yf thay war not Maconnes.	A. Some Masons are not so virtuous as some other men, but for the most part they are better than they would be if they were not Masons.
Q. Dothe Maconnes love eidther odher myghtylye as beeth sayde?	Q. Do Masons love each other mightily, as is said?
A. Yea, verylyche, and yt may not odherwise be; for gude menne and treb, kennynge eidher odher to be soche, doeth always love the more as thay be more gude.	A. Yes, in truth, and it can not be otherwise for good men and true knowing each other to be such, must always love the more as they be more good.
(Here endeth the questyonnes and awnswers.)	(Here endeth the questions and answers.)

I know not what effect the sight of this old paper may have upon your Lordship, but for my own part, I can not deny that it has so much raised my curiosity as to induce me to enter myself into the Fraternity, which I am determined to do (if I may be admitted) the next time I go to London, and that will be shortly.

I am, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient and most humble servant,

JOHN LOCKE.

NOTES BY MR. JOHN LOCKE.

(1) John Leland was appointed by Henry VIIIth, at the dissolution of monasteries, to search for and save such books and records as were valuable among them. He was a man of great labor and industry.

(2) His Highnesse (meaning the said King Henry the VIIIth). The Kings of England had not then the title of Majesty.

(3) What mote ytt be? That is, what may this mystery of Masonry be? The answer imports that it consists in natural mathematical and mechanical knowledge, some part of which (as appears by what follows) the Masons pretend to have taught the rest of mankind, and some part they should conceal.

(4) Fryste menne yn the este, &c. It would seem by this that Masons believe there were men in the east before Adam, who is called the ffyrste manne of the west; and that arts and sciences began in the east. Some authors of great note for learning have been of the same opinion; and it is certain that Europe and Africa (which in respect to Asia may be called western countries) were wild and savage, long after arts and politeness of manners were in great perfection in China and the Indies.

(6) The Venetians, &c. In the time of monkish ignorance, it is no wonder that the Phœnecians should be mistaken for the Venetians; or, perhaps, if the people were not taken one for the other, similitude of sound might deceive the clerk who first took down the examination. The Phœnecians were the greatest voyagers among the ancients, and were in Europe thought to be the inventors of letters, which, perhaps, they brought from the east with other arts.

(7) Peter Gower. This must be another mistake of the writer. I was puzzled at first to guess who Peter Gower should be, the name being perfectly English; for how a Greek should come by such a name; but as soon as I thought of Pythagoras, I could scarce forbear smiling to find that that philosopher had undergone a metempsycosis he never dreampt of. We need only consider the French pronunciation of his name, Pythagore, that is, Petagore, to conceive how easily such a mistake might be made by an unlearned clerk. That Pythagoras traveled for knowledge into Egypt, &c., is known to all the learned; and that he was initiated into several orders of priests, who in those days kept all their learning from the vulgar, is as well known. Pythagoras, also, made every geometrical theorem a secret, and admitted only such to the knowledge of them as had first undergone a five years' silence. He is supposed to be the inventor of the 47th proposition of the first book of Euclid, for which, in the joy of his heart, it is said, he sacrificed a hectacomb. He also knew the true system of the world, lately revived by Copernicus; and was certainly a most wonderful man. [See his life, by Lion Hall.]

(8) Grecia Magna. A part of Italy formerly so called in which the Greeks had settled a large colony.

(9) Wyseacre. This word at present signifies simpleton, but formerly had a quite contrary meaning. Weisager in the old Saxon, is philosopher, wiseman or wizard, and having been frequently used ironically, at length came to have a direct meaning in the ironical sense. Thus, Duns Scotus, a man famed for the subtility and acuteness of his understanding, has by the same method of irony given a general name to modern dunces.

(10) Groton. Groton is the name of a place in England. The place here meant is Crotona, a city of Grecia Magna, which in the time of Pythagoras was very populous.

(11) Fyrste made. The word made, I suppose has a particular meaning among the Masons, perhaps it signifies initiated.

(12) Maconnes haueth communycatedde, &c. This paragraph hath something remarkable in it. It contains a justification of the secrecy so much boasted of by Masons, and so much blammed by others; asserting that they have in all ages discovered such things as might be useful, and that they conceal such only as would be hurtful either to the world or themselves. What these secrets are, we see afterwards.

(13) The artes, agricultura, &c. It seems a bold pretence this of the Masons that they have taught mankind all of these arts. They have their own authority for it; and I know not how we shall disprove them. But what appears most odd is that they reckon religion among the arts.

(14) Arte of ffyndyng neue artes. The art of finding new arts must certainly be a most useful art. My Lord Bacon's novum organum is an attempt towards something of the same kind. But I much doubt if ever the Masons had it, they have now lost it; since so few new arts have lately been invented and so many are wanted. The idea I have of such an art is, that it must be something proper to be applied to all the sciences, generally, as algebra is in numbers, by the help of which new rules of arithmetic are and may be found.

(15) Preise. It seems the Masons have great regard to the reputation as well as the profit of their order; since they make it one reason for not divulging an art in common, that it may do honor to the possessors of it. I think in this particular they show too much regard to their own society, and too little for the rest of mankind.

(16) Arte of keepyng secrettes. What kind of an art this is, I can by no means imagine. But certainly such an art the Masons must have. For though, as some people suppose, they should have no secret at all, even that must be a secret which being discovered, would expose them to the highest ridicule, and therefore it requires the utmost caution to conceal it.

(17) Arte of chaunges. I know not what this means unless it be the transmutation of metals.

(18) Faculty of Abrac. Here I am utterly in the dark.

(19) Universelle longage of Maconnes. An universal language has been much desired by the learned of many ages. It is a thing rather to be wished than hoped for. But it seems the Masons pretend to have such a thing among them. If it be true, I guess it must be something like the language of the Pantomimes among the ancient Romans, who are said to be able, by signs only, to express and deliver any oration intelligibly to men of all nations and languages. A man who has all these arts and advantages, is certainly in a condition to be envied. But we are told, that this is not the case with all Masons; for though these arts are among them, yet some want capacity, and others industry to acquire. However, of all their arts and secrets, that which I desire most to know is, The skylle of becommynge gude and perfyghte; and I wish it were communicated to all mankind, since there is nothing more true than the beautiful sentence contained in the last answer, "The better men are the more they love one another." Virtue having in itself something so amiable as to charm the hearts of all that behold it.

BRETHREN—Permit me to call your attention to the fact that the MSS. from which John Locke copied being found in the Bodleian Library is conclusive evidence of its antiquity and authenticity. The fact that it was thought worthy of preservation by the learned man appointed to examine and select from the mass of matter found in the numerous monastic institutions at the time of their suppression, of its being transcribed and laid before the King Henry VIIIth, who, however low his historic character as a moralist, was a man of considerable literary attainments, is also evidence of the importance attached to it at that time. It may, I think, be fairly inferred also that the Masonic Fraternity kept at least a traditionary knowledge of its existence, for we find the Grand Master of the ancient York Masons, some hundred and fifty years later, asking aid of one of the master minds of that day to discover its place of deposit. When found the impression it made upon that profound thinker you have heard in his own words. In this old document we find the answers to the questions propounded a very complete exposition of the principles and objects of Freemasonry in that day; and which the brother avers to have been handed down from then very ancient times.

How complete a refutation is this of the modern charges against the Institution. One of them, "That speculative Freemasonry is of recent origin, dating only from the beginning of the eighteenth or at farthest the latter end of the seventeenth century," which it annihilates by simply stating the claims and avowed objects of Freemasonry three centuries before these objectors were aware of its existence, and showing that the Institution was then very ancient. Then that "Fremasonry is subversive of religion." Our ancient brother avers that religion was not only revered in the lodge, but taught by Masons to mankind; and is it subversive of religion that from the highest type of Christian man to the least informed Christian, Jew, Mahommedan, Hindoo,

"Or the poor Indian whose untutor'd mind Sees God in clouds and hears him in the wind,"

each one can find in the well informed Mason a brother who with him can bend the knee to the great source of light and life. To the idle or careless in the lodge, as out of it, Freemasonry is a sealed book! but when in the fullness of time all true worshipers of the "Great First Cause, least understood," shall harmonize for the better promulgation of truth and morality, it will be found that speculative Freemasonry has preceded them by centuries. Again, "That Masonry has an immoral tendency;" read aloud the last question addressed to, and the answer given to it by, the ancient brother, with the comments of Locke thereon, and Let the accusers blush!

It appears by this and other remains of Masonic history, the Institution has had its periods of healthful vigor and of comparative prostration, that it lived through centuries while the old civilizations of Greece and Rome succumbed, is a noble memento of its worth, and comparing the enlightened condition of Freemasonry as elicited in the examination of the ancient brother with the degraded position of the majority of mankind at that, perhaps the darkest period of what has been emphatically called the dark ages, it must have been a bright oasis in the desert of ignorance and vice. Yet it need call for little surprise that in the social chaos caused by the uprooting of time-honored establishments, having deep hold upon the habits and even the affections of the people, that Freemasonry should have passed under a cloud for a time; and although cherished in the hearts of the Brotherhood, we hear little of it until revived in the time of the second Charles under the Grand Mastership of Sir Christopher Wren, and then principally as an operative organization for the building of St. Paul's Cathedral in London. Shortly after the death of Sir Christopher, speculative Freemasonry appears under the name of Ancient York Masonry, and gradually gaining strength, at least in numbers, has spread its branches over the civilized world. Of its progress in this noble heritage of man, we may well be proud! We number over 500 lodges in our State alone. Brethren, we have a history!

But no institution can live upon the past, however bright the record of bygone days, intelligent humanity will still demand utility in the present, progress for the future! Then let us aid with energy the endeavor to provide means to sustain and educate the offspring of our esteemed indigent brethren, under the supervision of the grand lodge of the State. Nor will the brethren of this Olive Branch Lodge No. 38, be slow to sustain the W. M. in his laudable endeavors to make it a place of instruction and pleasant recreation; let the brethren unite their efforts until this and every Masonic lodge becomes again, as it once was, and is of right, a college of the highest order of science and of morals; then shall we practically realize the statement of our ancient brother, that every Mason has the right and opportunity to become the noblest work of the Almighty's hand,

A cultivated man.

Then let us hold the even tenor of our way, regardless of the clamor of those who know nothing of our principles or objects; but drawing upon their imaginations for facts on which to build objections, will find the foundations airy as the structures they raise, and both will disperse, like the mist of the morning, in the Sunlight of Truth.

Priestly Opposition to Freemasonry in France.

It must be admitted that many of our brethren, when called upon to occupy exalted positions, have been anything but faithful to the principles of the Craft. For example of this we may refer to Bro. Napoleon III. and Bro. Pius the Ninth. The former has virtually assumed the command of the Order in France, and the latter has exerted the whole power of his priesthood against us. The present Emperor of the French and the present Pontiff were, we believe, in their youthful days not only Freemasons, but also members of the revolutionary secret society of the Carbonarists, and we fear that in later years their recollection of the early events of their lives has faded, and possibly led them to confuse the working of two essentially distinct, and, indeed, totally opposite associations. However this may be, the Roman Catholic Church is the bitter enemy of our Brotherhood in all parts of the world. In Spain, whose virtuous Queen recently received the Golden Rose, or highest mark of Papal favor, the Order has been utterly suppressed. However desirous we may be to view the Roman Catholic religion favorably, it is not at all calculated to increase our feelings of respect for the Pope to see him on the one hand hurling thunderbolts against Freemasonry, which in England, at any rate, is one of the noblest and most beneficent institutions that has ever existed, while on the other hand he is bestowing the highest marks of approval on the most notoriously wicked woman of the present age. It is conduct like this which adds renewed strength and pungency to the trenchant language of the late Walter Savage Landor, who wittily observed that, "If the Popes are the servants of God, it must be confessed that God has been very unlucky in the choice of his household." In Austria, Freemasonry is only likely to spring into life under the constitutional liberty which has made the Concordat a dead letter; and in France, the "eldest son of the church," our Order is persecuted in the most violent manner. In England even, we are not much better, as every year hundreds of Catholics are prevented joining our ranks by the threats of the priests. Within the last year or two, in one of the provinces of the Grand Lodge of England, a man of gentlemanly birth and education, who had been elected W. M. of one of our lodges, was compelled to tear up his Grand Lodge Certificate and publicly to do penance in a manner which, to persons of other religious creeds, appeared utterly degrading and suitable only to the superstition of the Middle Ages. If such an exhibition of clerical tyranny can actually take place among us, it may easily be believed that the priesthood go to still greater lengths in France. A French Mason is not only regarded as worse than a heretic whilst living, but at his death, unless he will recant, he is refused the last offices of the Church, and dies under the ban of excommunication. These proscriptions are no light matter in a Catholic country, although to the majority of Englishmen, who are wont to care very little about what ultra-sacerdotalism may do or say, they may appear so. Moreover, any person who may let a house for the carrying on of a Masonic lodge is visited by the priests and threatened with similar pains and penalties if the Masons are not at once turned out. People who are outside the Catholic Church generally believe that the Roman priesthood are profoundly subtle, and ready to be "all things to all men" in order to extend their Church. In this there may be some degree of truth; but to our minds the action of the Church is often needlessly foolish, and calculated to excite animosity where it would not otherwise exist. For ourselves, constant association with liberal and right-minded Catholics had given us a very high opinion of the piety, benevolence, and public spirit of members of the Roman Church, and when we came right in front of the organized opposition of the priesthood to Freemasonry, we received a rude shock to our charitable feelings. A letter appeared in the Freemason's Magazine, recently, from a Catholic, which, referring to the vagaries of a certain Father Suffield, who had constituted himself the great iconoclast of Freemasonry, endeavored to show that it was only the bigoted Catholics that, like bigoted Protestants, were opposed to our Order. This is, however, a mistake, which would probably have been brought home by the priesthood to the mind of the writer of that letter if he had dared to publish his name. A man can not be a good Catholic, in the sense of being an acknowledged member of the Roman Church, and at the same time be a Freemason—unless he has a special dispensation from Rome, which can only be obtained with great difficulty, and is never granted except to persons of very great influence. It must then be apparent to all but the most blindly prejudiced, that our Order, the traditions of which are entirely Scriptural in character, and which has numbered among its members so many good and devout Christians, is most unfairly treated by the authorities of the Catholic Church. Under these circumstances, we do not feel hopeful with regard to the future of Freemasonry in France, inasmuch as it is to be feared that the very men who would give strength and ability to the Grand Orient will be kept apart from it by the priests. We can scarcely wonder, indeed, that the attitude of the clerical party has emboldened the free thinking section of the community to believe that ere long they must be admitted to our Order as a dernier ressort. This we hope will never be, but if it is not so we must not be surprised if the number of brethren in France should be stationary, or even decrease. We are aware that Bro. Pinon's edition of the Annuaire Maconnique estimates that there are now 10,000 more Masons in Paris alone, than there were in 1862, but it must be remembered that Paris is altogether an exceptional place. It is a commou fallacy in England to believe that the Catholic Church is losing its influence in France, and that the people are becoming more and more infected with religious indifferentism every day. This idea has been promulgated by our religious periodicals, and even by newspapers for many years, but we are satisfied that it is an egregious mistake. Comparing the religious devotion of the people under Louis Phillipe with what it is under Napoleon III., fostered by the undoubted piety and zeal of the Empress Eugenie, it must be conceded that the Church is incalculably stronger than it was, and that the number of devout worshipers has been wonderfully increased. Freemasonry will have to contend with even greater difficulties than those which it has overcome, and unless, as is by no means unlikely, the Emperor should get a law passed forbidding the priests to excommunicate persons for joining societies which are legalized by the civil power, we fear that the struggle between Freemasonry on the one hand and priestcraft on the other will be an unequal contest in which the strength is all on one side. What has happened at St. Malo, where a priest boasted to us that the Church had "closed the lodge," will occur elsewhere, and the time may come when a Freemason in the country towns of France may be a rare phenomenon.

In a conversation which we had recently with a French priest of high standing, to whom we carried a letter of introduction from a Catholic friend, the whole question was discussed. This priest, though otherwise a man of enlightened views, and not at all bigoted as regards Protestants, was strongly excited immediately the name of Freemasonry was introduced.

"Freemasonry," said he, "is a union of all the enemies of religion and good government. It is a society of skeptics and revolutionaries who meet under its banner to devise their wicked schemes against Church and State."

"But," said we, "this is an entire mistake, for the constitutions of the Grand Lodge of England and the Grand Orient of France expressly forbid all politics in lodges, and moreover a Freemason can not be a skeptic; he must believe in the existence of God."

We referred to Article 2 of the constitution of the French Masons, which says:

"Freemasonry respects the religious faith and the political opinions of its members, but all dissension on religious or political matters is interdicted at its assemblies, and controversy on different religions and criticism upon the acts of the civil authority, or upon divers forms of government, is expressly forbidden. One of the principal duties of Freemasons is to respect the laws of the country which they may inhabit."

It is true that in 1848 a very improper address was presented to the Provisional Government, but the present constitution has been adopted since that time, and under it such a demonstration is simply impossible. We also cited the following extracts from the "Book of Constitutions" of English Masonry:

"A Mason is obliged by his tenure to obey the moral law, and if he rightly understands the art he will never be a stupid atheist or an irresponsible libertine. He of all men should best understand that God seeth, for man looketh to the outward appearance, but God looketh to the heart."

"A Mason is a peaceable subject to the civil powers wherever he resides or works, and is never to be concerned in plots and conspiracies against the peace and welfare of the nation, nor to behave himself undutifully to inferior magistrates. He is cheerfully to conform to every lawful authority."

The reverend father, in reply to this, admitted that he did not consider that there was anything unchristian in the Craft degrees sanctioned by the Grand Lodge of England, and known as the Rite Francaise in France, but he said that in the higher degrees there were things done which were purposely concealed from the excellent men who joined the subordinate degrees, and which had led the Holy See to condemn the whole system. We pointed out the injustice of this, even if the charges were true, as in that case English Craft Masonry would be condemned for the sins of a body which it did not recognize in any way. But we also assured the worthy father that the charges in question were utterly false as against any Masons. He then said Rome would never tolerate any secret society whatever, nor allow any matters to be kept back at the confessional. Here he gave us the key to the entire question—the priesthood can not endure that anything, however trivial, should remain undisclosed at confession, and from their point of view we can not say they are wrong, for the great power of the Catholic Church is built upon the basis of the confessional. We deplore this state of things, but fear it is irremediable. A suggestion has, however, been made to us by a Catholic friend, who ardently desires to join our Order, but under existing circumstances is debarred from so doing, that if the Earl of Zetland and the Grand Lodge of England were to memorialize the Holy Father, it is not impossible that His Holiness might sanction the English degrees up to and including the Royal Arch. As we have already remarked, the priests admit that English Craft Masonry is very different to continental Masonry, and we fear this is partly true. If, then, the Pope could be induced to make an exception in favor of the English Order, a vast number of good and pious Catholics would immediately join us, and the English system would be brought into use in all Catholic countries. The effort, it is true, might be all in vain, but it would certainly, in any case, be appreciated as a kindly act by our Catholic fellow-countrymen, many of whom would be bright ornaments to the Craft.

In his youth Pope Pius the Ninth, like Bro. Louis Napoleon, advocated principles directly opposite to those which he now professes and enforces. Indeed, it has been alleged that they both became Masons in order to use Masonry for their own purposes, and that their subsequent conduct is dictated by fear lest others should copy their example. Napoleon III. is, however, by no means to be considered as an enemy of the Craft in the same sense as the Pope, although he has repeatedly acted unfraternally to his brethren. The Pope doubtless believes that Garibaldi, "the first Mason of Italy," has been assisted in his work of liberation by the Freemasons, and this may be true, for if the Roman Church deliberately excludes from her membership all those who join our Brotherhood, it is not to be wondered at that a spirit of retaliation should sometimes be aroused. It is needless to remark that there is nothing essentially Protestant in Freemasonry; but, nevertheless, the Pope and all his priests are making themselves Protestant missionaries when they attack Freemasonry, and we would suggest that the next time the dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church proceed to cast up the number of converts which their religion is making, they should at the same time take into account the large number of honest, large-hearted Christian men who are repelled from their communion by their totally unnecessary and groundless vilification of Freemasonry; and we rather think they will be startled at the result. Attempts to un-Christianize or sectarianize the Craft are equally reprehensible; and though appearances may be opposed to bright anticipations, we would fain hope that as "peace on earth and good-will toward men" become more widely extended, so Freemasonry, being the noblest synonym for those Christian watchwords, may become even yet purer in its development, and still better understood by those who are members of the Order as well as by the outside world.

It is evident that inside the Romish Church there is not unanimity upon the question of Freemasonry. The Pope's attack on our Order was brought about by the fact that the Archbishop of Paris had attended the funeral of Marshal Magnan, the Grand Master of the Grand Orient. It is also well-known that, sub rosa, we have even Catholic ecclesiastics in our ranks; but we confess that we do not like the position of those brethren. It is true that Freemasonry is a secret society; but it is secret in seeking to do good only that it may achieve the reward that is promised "openly" to the righteous. There is an essential difference between secrecy and darkness. Some men, as we read in Holy Writ, "love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil;" but, nevertheless, there is also the command which Freemasonry literally fulfills, that we are not to let the left hand know what the right hand doeth. Freemasons seek to do the good work which they have undertaken in secret; but they must not, therefore, be confounded with those who love darkness because it hides their misdeeds. Any man may be proud to say, "I am a Mason," while resolutely declining to disclose the secrets of the Order; but the man who belongs to a secret society which has unworthy objects will be ashamed to avow his connection with it, and will seek to gain his ends by the underhand and deceitful means which, rightly or wrongly, have been ascribed to the Jesuits.

As an illustration of the bitter and unscrupulous manner in which the priesthood persecute Freemasons, we may state that in consequence of having attended a Masonic meeting of English lodges, and spoken in defence of French Craftsmen, a French brother was compelled to resign a valuable public appointment which he held. Soon afterwards, being taken ill, he, as a member of the Catholic Church, sent for a family confessor, when the reverend father declined to attend unless our brother would consent to give up Masonry. This being refused, the haughty ecclesiastic forwarded a message to say that if our brother died he should be refused the burial offices of the Church! Such are some of the obstacles to Freemasonry in France.—J. A. H.—Freemason's Magazine (London).

THE MASONIC TROWEL.

The Beehive.

The symbolic idea associated with the beehive is industry. By industry, in general terms, is meant labor, occupation, or employment of some reputable character. The impression prevails among the uninitiated, and far too much among the Craft, that the Institution of Freemasonry is a sort of charitable or relief society against the evils of life, however unworthy a brother, his widow, or orphans may be. To relieve the distressed, alleviate human misery, and sympathize with the unfortunate, are certainly important missions of Masonry, as they are of humanity; but we most decidedly deprecate the idea that Freemasonry is essentially a relief society. In the sense of charity, it is all that is claimed, but even this is by no means a main feature. In defending Masonry, its votaries are prone to point to deeds of beneficence and relief as illustrative of the designs and intentions of the Institution, and as the chief end of it; whereas, acts of charity, deeds of benevolence, and relief of the needy, are but the outgrowth of principles, teachings, and examples. All these are no more than should be practiced by men singly or collectively. In Freemasonry, charity, relief, and sympathy operate effectively, because they are governed and directed by immutable laws, enforced in silence, and willingly obeyed. To obtain relief or even sympathy, one must be worthy; for the principles of Masonry deny relief or sympathy to its own members who persistently render themselves unworthy. If relieved at all, it is upon principles of broad humanity, but in no sense of Masonic obligation. To be worthy of relief, a Freemason must be industrious in his calling, temperate in his habits, careful in his expenses, and honorable in his dealings.

The beehive not only teaches methodical and patient industry, but it teaches the art of building, providing, and storing, so that when winter or adversity comes, house, fuel, and provisions may be sure. Let every Freemason learn from this that providing for present wants, and a seeming labor only to that end, are not all that is required, but that his duty as a citizen, and more especially as a Freemason, requires him to husband his means, and to lay by in store for old age, winter, and adversity. All this implies a home, accumulating property, and ready means. A brother may honestly, patiently, and laboriously strive to attain such an end, and may not succeed. Sickness may come, misfortunes can not always be avoided, and adversity may be stern and bitter. Very well. When a brother has striven to do well, his duty is done, conscience is easy, and the rest is with God.

The industry implied by the beehive is not to be confined to home and family; it may be, and generally should be, mainly there; but every Freemason should be industrious to do his part as a citizen, in relief of distress, resistance of oppression, care of the sick, burial of the dead, in advancement of education, science, arts, morals, and religion. No matter what the station, wealth, talents, or position of a Freemason may be, he is one of the Fraternity, and should cheerfully fill his place according to his means and ability.

This subject might be wrought out at great length, but we pass to a brief notice of an idea not considered much in the treatment of the beehive symbol.

Masonic bodies—lodges especially—should apply this principle in an associated capacity, and labor to obtain permanent lodge-rooms, so that they may not only have a place to meet, but a property that will bring an increasing annual income, and also for funds and investments secured against waste and loss. Unity, labor, and method—qualities which distinguish the bee tribe—are indispensable to secure so important results.

Caution is also a characteristic of the bee, and if one will not work he shall not eat, and every drone is forcibly expelled.

Let industry and caution govern in every Masonic hive, and neither admit nor retain idle, quarrelsome, or mischief-making men. Put them out and keep them out, and stay with and stand by each other until you become strong and firm, and never swarm until sufficiently numerous and united to do so without hazard to usefulness and comfort.

Out Among the Craft.

Accompanied by our friend and brother, John Fults, we took a trip last month through Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio.

We spent several hours viewing the beautiful and thriving metropolis of Indiana. Masonry in Indianapolis seems to be in a flourishing condition. The Grand Lodge Hall is a large, substantial building, erected in 1841, and at the time was undoubtedly a great addition to the city, but it is beginning to show the effects of time. The State House is a large brick building, plastered over so as to represent stone; it is in a miserable condition, and, were it not for the dome, would very likely be mistaken by strangers for a livery stable in bad order.

Jeffersonville, Ind., is pleasantly located on the Ohio River, directly opposite Louisville, and has about 8,000 inhabitants; the population and wealth is raidly increasing. It has two lodges, a chapter, and council, all doing well.

We spent several days in Louisville, had several pleasant interviews with Grand Secretary McCorcle, who is also cashier of the Masonic Bank of Louisville; had the pleasure of a chat with Bro. Fred. Webber, Grand Head Centre of the A. & A. Rite in Kentucky.

The growth of Louisville is equalled by no other prominent city in the West, except Chicago; in 1860 it had less than 40,000 inhabitants; it now numbers nearly 150,000, an increase of 275 per cent. in seven years. We visited the office of the Louisville Courier, the leading democratic paper in the South, and, notwithstanding its migrations through the South, and the many disasters that happened to it in its traveling career, it is now in better circumstances than it was previously. Cave Hill Cemetery far exceeds, in beauty, any cemetery we ever saw, although we believe Spring Grove Cemetery, at Cincinnati, and Oak Ridge, at Springfield, will equal it in a few years. The Grand Lodge Hall, the new Hebrew synagogue, and many other places of interest, were duly visited and admired; and, kind reader, when you visit Louisville please take a stroll through Broadway of a pleasant afternoon, and you will see more handsome ladies than you can in any other two cities in the United States—outside of Illinois.

Nashville, the capital of the State of Tennessee, is a beautiful city, situated on the right bank of the Cumberland River. At present it has about 30,000 inhabitants. In common with all the South, it is suffering from the effects of the war; business is dull, its streets are swarming with negroes, who seem to have nothing to do but idle around, ragged and destitute generally; large numbers of white persons, like the negroes, seemed to have no desire to work or better their condition. The State House is a splendid stone edifice, situated on a commanding elevation near the center of the city, and it is the most prominent object in the country around, and has no superior in the West. The Fraternity in Nashville are in a flourishing condition; Cumberland Lodge No. 5 is the sole owner of one of the finest houses in the city, a brick building, about 50 feet front by 80 feet deep and five stories high; the rooms are lofty, and the halls of the different Masonic bodies are elegantly fitted up, and the rents yield a large revenue. The calls for charity upon the Nashville brethren have been very heavy, and nobly have they been answered. We hunted up Bro. John McClelland, Grand Commander of the Grand Commandery of Tennessee, and had a long and pleasant interview with him. R. W. Bro. Fuller, the Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge, was thought to be in a dying condition; a few more days, and the places which know him now, will probably know him no more. Visitors could not see him. The cemetery south of the city is in a miserable condition; there is in it a fine marble monument over the grave of P. G. Master Tannehill, erected to his memory by the Fraternity of Tennessee. The graves of the Confederate soldiers who were killed at Franklin and other battles, and buried at Nashville, seem to be entirely neglected; time and the weather had erased the names from the head-boards, and unless they are soon renewed, it will be impossible to tell the names of the fallen soldiers; we inquired for the grave of General Zollicoffer, and there was only one person among several in the cemetery who could tell us where it was, and he was a Union man during the entire war. At Cave Hill cemetery, Louisville, the graves of the Union and Confederate dead were in admirable condition, and side by side the departed heroes of the contending armies rest in peace.

> Soldier, rest, thy warfare's o'er,
> Sleep the sleep that knows no waking.

The battle-field of Franklin, three miles south of the city, is converted into farms, and it now presents a much more pleasing aspect that it did on those two dreary December days, when the armies of Thomas and Hood contended in battle for the possession of the Rock City. Fort Negley, which played such an important part in the action, is now entirely dismantled. The city is nearly surrounded by splendid, heavily timbered hills, over which the beaten and baffled hosts of the Confederate forces retreated in confusion. While in the city, we attended a fair at the Masonic hall for the benefit of the Orphan Asylum, and although we did not hesitate to make it known that we were northern men, we were received with as much cordiality as we would have been in Illinois, and we did not hear one word during our stay in the city that would tend to show that there was any hostility towards the northern people. The garrison at Nashville is very small; it is stationed outside of the city. Nashville is certain, in time, to become a populous and wealthy city, but it must first get rid of the hordes of lazy, shiftless whites and blacks that infest its streets.

On our way home we took steamboat from Louisville to Cincinnati, spent one day in the Queen City, from thence to Chicago, then down to our old home at Knoxville, where we visited all our boyhood acquaintances, then down to Quincy, where we saw Bro. Dills, Grand Treasurer, and, under the guidance of R. W. Bro. James Lowe, we saw the most beautiful city we had passed through on our whole trip. Business in Quincy is very good, much better than in any other place we visited. From Quincy home. During our trip of over 1,600 miles and through five States, we found Masonry everywhere in splendid condition. We tried to see Bro. Moore, of the Review, and Grand Secretary Hacker, of Indianapolis, but could find neither. JUNIOR.

Harmony Lodge No. 3.

We are under many obligations to R. W. Bro. Geo. F. Gouley, Grand Secretary of Missouri, for the papers on file in his office in relation to the original organization of Harmony Lodge, at Jacksonville.

The petition was signed by John T. Jones, who initiated Abraham Jonas, in Cincinnati, many years before; Wm. B. Warren, the first Grand Secretary and afterwards Grand High Priest and Grand Master; Alexander Dunlap, the first Grand Treasurer and the third Grand Master; Wm. S. Vance; Phillip Coffman, for several years Grand Treasurer; James L. James; Samuel M. Prosser; George Henry; Matthew Stacy; Geo. Hacket; Benjamin Harvey; Richard Henry; and Denniss Rockwell, who was many years Circuit Clerk.

The petition was recommended by St. Louis Lodge No. 20, on the 3rd of October, A. D. 1837. Bro. Vance represented the lodge in October, 1838, and on the 30th of November Wm. B. Warren constituted the lodge, and installed the Master, John T. Jones, and the Junior Warden, Alex. Dunlap. He was then installed as Senior Warden by the Master. Of the petitioners, Breth. Dunlap, Warren, Coffman, and Rockwell are deceased. We believe that Bro. Jones resides at Eureka; of the others we can give no definite information at present, although it is our impression that most of them have passed away.

The grand lodge was organized at Jacksonville in 1840, and its sessions were held there until 1845. During those years, Harmony Lodge held the leading position in the State, and has always been an influential lodge.

M. W. Bro. Chas. A. Fuller.

We had occasion, a few weeks since, to write Bro. Fuller on a matter of business. The letter is replied to by M. W. Bro. John Frizzell, P. G. M., who says that Bro. Fuller is very ill, and quite low. We sincerely hope that he may recover, although we are aware that he has been an invalid for many years, and yet, in addition to his arduous duties as Grand Secretary and Grand Recorder of all the Masonic grand bodies in Tennessee, he has contrived to write some of the most complete and scholar-like reports on correspondence that have been published of late years, breathing, throughout, his genial, manly, and independent spirit. After a long and noble service at the head of all the grand bodies of Tennessee, and as their Grand Secretary and Recorder, the work of Bro. Fuller is well done, and he is ready when the Supreme Master calls. He will find a mansion prepared and furnished for him.

New Chapters.

Deputy Grand High Priest M. E. Comp. J. H. Miles, of Chicago, has granted a dispensation for a new chapter in Chicago, to be called W. M. Egan. J. E. Church H. P., D. A. Starrett K., T. C. Hatch S. Located at the corner of Twelfth and Clinton streets.

Also, for a new chapter in Chicago, to be called Home. E. B. Stevens H. P., Moore Conger K., E. S. Brewster S. Located on the corner of Twenty-second street and Cottage Grove avenue.

The M. E. Grand High Priest, Geo. W. Lininger, has granted dispensations as follows:

Chillicothe, at Chillicothe, Peoria county, to Wm. McLean H. P., Henry Hosmer K., John L. Kenner S.

Petersburg, at Petersburg, Menard county, to H. Hamilton H. P., T. W. McNeely K., John T. Brooks S.

Sangamon, at Dawson, Sangamon county, John C. Reynolds H. P., O. P. Hall K., R. K. Hawley S.

La Harpe, at La Harpe, Hancock county, James Major H. P.

Kansas, at Kansas, Edgar county, A. P. Forsyth H. P., A. J. Hogue K., Samuel Shy S.

Wisconsin--Memphis Rite.

The Grand Commandery of Wisconsin, at its session in January last, resolved as follows:

"Resolved, That this Grand Commandery acknowledges and recognizes no degrees of Masonry or orders of knighthood to be regular, except those conferred by and under the authority of the following constituted authorities in the United States of America, and those of corresponding rank in foreign countries, to-wit: The Grand Encampment of the United States, the Grand Consistory, and the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States, Grand Councils of R. and S. Masters, and the Grand Lodges of the several States; and any knights holding or receiving, or having received, any irregular degrees under the assumed name of Masonry or knighthood, particularly those known by the name the 'Egyptian Masonry, Rite of Memphis,' or the 'Ancient Primitive Rite of Memphis of thirty-three degrees,' shall be compelled to withdraw therefrom, under pain of being expelled from all participation in any of the privileges contained in the provisions of the statutes of the Grand Commandery of Wisconsin; and no council or commandery shall be permitted to receive any candidate or visitor into their respective bodies, who in any manner or in any wise is concerned in or with such clandestine degrees."

In the notice of the foregoing resolution by the St. Louis Freemason, the words "The Grand Consistory" were omitted. Why was this? Is it not highly discourteous to an acknowledged legitimate body to omit any portion of a resolution adopted by it? And is it not a marked and contemptuous disrespect to the M. E. Grand Master of Templars, who is a member of the Wisconsin body? The editor is Grand Commander of Missouri, and subordinate to Grand Master Palmer; it seems to us that he should have given the whole of the resolution, or none.

A Pleasant Call.

R. W. Bro. John W. Clyde, District D. G. Master for the Chicago district, being in the city a few days since on business, gave us a brotherly call, and from him we ascertained that the lodges in Cook, Lake, Will, and Kankakee are all prosperous and harmonious, and in his official visits he has met with cordial reception and courteous treatment.

Bro. Clyde is a thorough master of the Barney or Baltimore work, which is now more wrought than any other work in the world, and will ultimately be the only work wrought where the English language prevails. Any attempt to introduce any other system in Illinois is rank rebellion, and any who attempt so foolish a thing will be consigned to obscurity and contempt.

The Chicagoan.

We have the first number of the Chicagoan, a new weekly journal of literature, science, art, the drama, music, and society.

It is a large eight-column sheet of four pages, and makes an admirable start, worthy of the metropolis of the Northwest, and in our judgment bids fair to equal any literary paper in the land.

This new paper supplies a long-felt want—a first-class literary newspaper. Its writers are able men, and we find every article possessing positive merit, and an absence of trifling or vapid writing. Its humor is humor, and its whole is, like the appearance of the paper itself, plain and elegant.

Published by E. L. Taylor & Co., 84 Dearborn street, Chicago, at $3.00 per annum.

New Council.

Freeport Council U. D. commenced labor April 29, assisted by Comps. Jas. A. Hawley, Th. Ill. G. P., Dr. W. A. Levanway, J. B. Charters, and D. W. McKenney, of Dixon, and the degrees were conferred on twelve candidates.

The officers are:

"The Squair and the Level."

Somebody who signs himself M. S., requests us to insert a piece of poetry headed as above; it commences as follows:

"We meet upon the level and part upon the squair;
What words of precious meaning these words Masonic are."

The chief conservator claims those lines, save and except errors in punctuation and orthography; we say claims, for we do not admit that the ideas are original even with him. But to steal a man's poetry, and then mis-spell it and butcher its punctuation, is one steal too many.

Trouble in the Peoria Postoffice.

We have lately received several complaints from subscribers in Peoria that they do not get their TROWELS. In every instance THE TROWEL has been regularly sent and carefully directed and packed up, this is all we can do. After we put THE TROWEL in the postoffice we are no longer responsible.

With such brethren as Ellis and Austin, with whom we have wrought in other fields, the chapter may write "Excelsior" upon its banner, and "success" upon its walls, and we cordially say, "peace be with thee."

After the election, the officers and members sat down to a banquet at the St. James Hotel, which is described as being perfect. Toasts followed of course, and good humor prevailed. Where were the ladies? A Rose Croix banquet, it seems to us, is imperfect without the wives and daughters. Religious fanaticism and insane jealousies may make the countenance and good-will of women as precious and necessary in the future as in the past. This digression is for all Masons, as well as for Scotch Rite brethren. We owe one to our good Bro. Bailey, of the Voice, for advance slips of the doings above alluded to.

The Children's Children.

BEARDSTOWN, Ill., April 27, 1868.

Editor of Masonic Trowel:

DEAR SIR AND BRO.—I am requested by the lodge to send you for publication the following resolutions, passed at a regular meeting of Cass Lodge No. 23, A., F. & A. M., held Monday, April 20, A. L. 5868:

Bro. Julius Elmore, Sr., feeling conscious of his inability to meet with his brethren in the lodge on earth again, requested, through his son, Bro. Travis Elmore, an interest in the prayer of the brethren. On motion, it was Unanimously Resolved, That we extend to Bro. Elmore our sympathy in the infirmities natural to his advanced age, and our prayers and wishes that he, as a Master Mason, may enjoy the happy reflections consequent on a well-spent life, and that when the Grand Master calls him to the Silent Lodge above, he may realize the hope of a glorious immortality.

Resolved, further, That Bro. Elmore, Sr., is hereby constituted an honorary member of Cass Lodge No. 23, for life, and the Secretary is requested to present a copy of these proceedings to Bro. Elmore, and a copy to THE MASONIC TROWEL for publication.

Bro. Julius Elmore was initiated, passed, and raised in Robinson county, Tenn., in 1803; is now 89 years old, having been a Mason sixty-five years; some years back, he used to visit this lodge.

Cass Lodge now numbers among her members Breth. Julius Elmore, Sr., two of his sons, and one grandson, thus hiving three generations of this family among her membership.

Bro. Elmore resides in the east corner of Cass county. His wife is still living, they having been living together over 60 years.

An Elegant Tobacco-Box.

Fairbury Chapter No. 99, at Fairbury, on the railroad from Peoria to Logansport, has prepared a beautifully ornamented silver tobacco-box for its High Priest, in the form of a keystone, three and a half inches in length. On the cover is a miniature keystone, with the usual circle and letters, with an inner circle enclosing a double triangle, and in the center of that the forty-seventh problem of Euclid.

On the back or bottom of the box, enclosed in flowers and a beautifully engraved representation of another keystone, is the following:

J. W. PECK,
W. M. Tarbolton Lodge No. 351,
H. P. Fairbury Chapter No. 99,
Th. Ill. G. M. Fairbury Council No. 32,
and member of De Molay Commandery No. 24.
A token of esteem from his companions of Fairbury Chapter No. 99, Fairbury, Ill., 1868.

Bro. Peck deserves this testimonial. Tarbolton Lodge has ever been a prosperous one, but since Bro. Peck took a prominent part in Masonic affairs at Fairbury, the chapter and council have been formed, and, in spite of losses by fire, Masonry is a live thing at that point.

The dispensation for Fairbury Chapter was granted May 4th 1866, to Comp. J. W. Peck as H. P., B. F. Scriven as King, and H. Remington as Scribe. A charter was granted at the convocation in October of that year, and at the subsequent elections of that and the following year Comp. Peck was elected H. P., and, tho' "far away," is H. P. still. At its last return, the chapter had forty members, and it has not been idle since. The box was manufactured by Nolin & McElwain, 5772 Clark St., Chicago.

Bro. Peck has removed to Wamego, Kansas, where he is engaged in the hardware business. We are sorry to lose him from Illinois, but we congratulate our Kansas brethren upon their good fortune.

Our Fairbury brethren will miss him, but we most heartily wish that every other place had the same enterprise, endurance, and persistence in Masonry, which Bro. Peck has left behind him in Fairbury.

Another Grand Lodge.

Blanchard, Oberlin & Co. had better send a missionary to Utah, New Mexico, Dakotah, Arizona, and Wyoming, and prevent the people in those regions from becoming the prey of the great red dragon of Freemasonry. Now is the time, for if they do not go to work in dead earnest, the Masonic Jews and Gentiles will have grand lodges in each of those Territories in less than three years. Delays are dangerous to their fanatical and insane projects, for Masonry marches hand in hand with civilization, commerce, and improvement.

IDAHO is the last on the list, and has followed rapidly in the footsteps of Nevada and Montana. On the 16th of December, a convention of delegates from Idaho, Boise, Placer, Pioneer, and Owyhee Lodges, met at Idaho City, and organized by electing Bro. George H. Coe President, and Bro. P. E. Edmondson Secretary.

A constitution was adopted, and the following brethren are the grand officers of the Grand Lodge of Idaho, viz.:

George H. Coe, Idaho City, Grand Master.
G. W. Paul, Boise City, Deputy.
A. Haas, Boise City, S. G. W.
Geo. T. Young, Placer City, J. G. W.
S. B. Connelly, —— G. Treas.
P. E. Edmondson, Idaho City, G. Sec.
I. B. Curry, Idaho City, S. G. D.
John Merrill, —— J. G. D.

The Grand Lodge was located at Idaho City.

A copy of the proceedings has been received. Every State in the Union, with the District of Columbia, and the Territories of Colorado, Washington, Montana, and Idaho, has a grand lodge.

New Brunswick.

The Masters and Past Masters of seven lodges under the English and Irish registry, in New Brunswick, met at St. John, to consider the propriety of forming an independent grand lodge, August 16, 1867, and appointed W. Bro. B. Lester Peters, Chairman, and W. Bro. Wm. Wedderburn, Secretary. Without coming to any settled conclusion, it was resolved to address the lodges in the Province by circular, and invite a full consultation and co-operation, and the convention adjourned until October 9th, at which time twenty lodges on the English, Scotch, and Irish registry were represented, and it was resolved to form a grand lodge, and a constitution, laws, and regulations were adopted, and officers selected as follows:

B. Lester Peters Grand Master, Wm. Wedderburn Deputy, Wm. P. Flewelling S. G. Warden, David Brown J. G. Warden, Rev. Wm. Donald Grand Chaplain, W. H. A. Keans Grand Treasurer.

The convention then adjourned until January 22d, when the grand lodge was organized and the officers duly installed by W. John Willis, the senior Past Master in the jurisdiction.

Wm. F. Bunting, of St. John, was appointed Grand Secretary, John Richards G. S. D., B. R. Stevenson G. J. D.

It was expected that Grand Master Murray, of Maine, would have been present to consecrate the new grand lodge, but in a polite letter he gave ample reasons for his inability to attend. The brethren then fell back upon thoir reserved rights, and the duty was lawfully performed by the oldest Past Master. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, were organized in a similar manner.

An Aged Mason.

The Milwaukee Journal of Commerce brings the obituary of Bro. Samuel Elmore, who died recently at the advanced age of eighty-eight years. He was made a Mason at Esopus, N. Y., in 1807, and lived through the times of the Morgan excitement at Elmore's Corners, where it was unsafe for a man to be known as a Mason. It was literally a "reign of terror."

He came to Milwaukee in 1854, and subsequently affiliated with Milwaukee Lodge No. 3, by whom his remains were deposited in their earthly resting-place. Like Fathers Noyes and Young, he lived a godly life, and, after requesting Masonic burial, passed serenely, with a Christian's faith, beyond the portals of time. Fifty-one years a faithful Mason!

Representative Appointed.

The Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters of New Brunswick, in the Dominion of Canada, have been pleased to confer the appointment of Representative for that most illustrious body upon our Th. Ill. Comp. James A. Hawley, of Dixon, with the rank of Thrice Illustrious Grand Master. It is an honor which the Grand Council of Illinois will highly appreciate, and will doubtless reciprocate. We congratulate Comp. Hawley on this token of regard from abroad.

Grand Lecturer Wade.

Since the last report of Bro. Wade, he has spent one week with Robert Burns Lodge No. 118, at Keithsburg, on the Mississippi River, and, after passing four candidates, left the brethren able to work all the degrees.

Another week was profitably spent with the brethren of Sunbeam Lodge, at Plano, Kendall county, where the members are well posted.

Subsequently, he lectured at Ancona and Streator, Livingston county, and raised two candidates at Ancona. These young lodges are prospering. We presume that Bro. Wade is now at Viola, Mercer county, where he has engaged to lecturer.

Impostor.

WILMINGTON, Ill., April 28, 1868.

Bro. H. G. Reynolds:

DEAR SIR—Believing that it is the duty of Masons to place all brethren on their guard against impostors, we caution the Craft against a man of this place named JAMES BELMONT, who often represents himself as a Mason, and displays a large pin bearing the square and compasses. He is about 5 feet 8 inches in height, light complexion, brown hair, light chin whiskers, and is traveling as a patent-right dealer, principally for a water-drawer called "Queen of the West."

Please publish in THE TROWEL, that brethren, having due notice, may govern themselves accordingly.

By order of Wilmington Lodge No. 208.

Death of Deputy Grand Master Henry H. Hartley.

Craftsmen generally throughout the State will be pained to learn of the death of Henry Hare Hartley, Deputy Grand Master, Past Grand High Priest, and Past Grand Commander of our Order in California. He died in Sacramento on Thursday, March 12th, after a brief illness. Bro. Hartley was born in Devonshire, England, in 1827, and came to the United States in 1847. In 1849 he came to this coast, and immediately identified himself with the interests of the State, and by his intelligence, energy, and general uprightness of character, soon gained an enviable position among his fellows. His funeral took place at Sacramento, on Tuesday last, March 17th. Next week we will pay a more lengthy tribute to the memory of our departed brother.

A Pleasant Episode.

Freeport Commandery No. 7, Freeport, and Crusader Commandery No. 17, Rockford, Illinois, are both flourishing and well-managed Templar organizations. We have long known this from hearsay; now we know it from actual observation. On Monday the 6th inst., we were at Freeport on business, and were the guest of our esteemed friend and frater, Dr. N. F. Prentice, E. C. of Freeport Commandery and Past Grand Commander of the jurisdiction of Illinois. We learned that a tour-nament was on the tapis, and received numerous cordial invitations to enter the litsts, all of which we were obliged to decline as our vocations required our return home the same evening. Prentice put it out of power to do the latter, however, by—with "malice prepense"—so arranging matters as to make us miss the train, and so we were only too glad to accept the former. The Sir Knights of Freeport had arranged to visit the Crusaders and to take part in the conferring of the Orders on three companions. one of whom was the well known and genial Knapp, long a conductor on the Galena road, and now the popular manager of the Merchants' Union Express. A special train had been engaged, and a band had been provided, and at 7 P. M., thirty-six knights in full costume, formed at their asylum and marched to the depot. The run to Rockford was made in an hour, and the trip was a joyous one. Arrived at Rockford, the party was received by a deputation of Crusaders, and together all marched to the asylum of No. 17, where a knightly welcome awaited us, the Crusaders being out in force. The Order of the Red Cross was then conferred very impressively by eminent Commander Porter and excellent Prelate Vincent. None of the large number present will ever forget the make up of Zerubbabel Knapp, who was robed in a costume expressly provided for him by the wags of Freeport. That costume was a stunner. We would be glad if it would do to describe it here. Those shoes! of which witty Gen. Hurlbut remarked, that Knapp did not put them off because "the place whereon he stood was holy ground," but because they contained too much cord wood! The banquet was a splendid affair, and was enlivened by numerous toasts and speeches; Past Grand Commander Prentice, Eminent Commander Porter, Gen. Hurlbut, Victim Knapp, and the editor participating. After the banquet, the Order of the Temple was conferred by the editor, who, although he was there clad only in pilgrim's weeds, was not allowed to decline the honor. Sir Knight Knapp was the recipient, and the work was impressively done, the admirable and unexcelled Prelate, Dr. Vincent, deserving especial commendation in this connection. At 1½ A. M. the Sir Knights of Freeport, escorted by the Crusaders, formed and marched to the cars, and soon—saluted by the hearty cheers of the genial Sir Knights of Rockford, they were under way for home. One stop was made at Pecatonica, to leave Sir Knight the Rev. Frater Foster and his party; and the run was made without accident. Thus ended one of the pleasantest Masonic gatherings we have ever attended. Freeport Commandery No. 7 was organized August 19th, 1857. Its first E. C. was that noble Sir Knight, N. F. Prentice, who amid the cares of an immense practice, finds time to cultivate his Masonic tastes. He served for four successive years most acceptably. After four years retiracy—during which time his successors were the well-known and capable L. L. Munn (P. G. H. P.) and M. D. Chamberlain, long a custodian of the work on the part of the Grand Lodge of Illinois—he was again re-elected, and is now in the second year of his new term of service. They have a splendid hall, and most of the Sir Knights are costumed. The commandery is doing a large amount of work. Crusader Commandery was organized August 25th, 1865. Its present E. C. is the courteous John R. Porter, who is but just installed, and is destined to make a superior officer. They have a good hall, better than the average, and like the Freeport Sir Knights, have plenty of ante-rooms, and a fine refreshment room. The Sir Knights are costumed. Both bodies are well equipped, the only things lacking being the banners. At Rockford we were glad to meet Sir Knight the Rev. Frater Reed, late Pastor of the Universalist Church in this city. Among the Sir Knights present, we noticed Sir Knights Munn, Chamberlain, Brawley, Lemon, the Hunter, Rev. Fraters Cleveland and Reed (Methodist) of Freeport. Rev. Frater Foster, of Pecatonica. Sir Knights, Past E. C. Andrus, Hurlbut, Richings, and others whose names we can not recall, of Rockford. We acknowledge ourself the debtor of the Crusaders and Freeporters for a most enjoyable evening, and we wish that about a score of these enthusiastic Sir Knights could be transplanted to Dubuque.—Evergreen.

Mrs. Bennett--New Chapter.

Kkoxville, Ill., April 4, 1868.

Dear Bro. Reynolds:

I have just returned from Petersburg, Ill., where I have been the recipient of so much fraternal kindness and genuine Masonic hospitality, that "from the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

I visited them, by invitation, to assist them in the inception work of their new chapter. Their dispensation came to hand the same evening of my arrival. The chapter organized and opened, and by-laws adopted, and twelve petitions received. The dispensation has fallen in good Masonic soil, and will bring forth abundantly. Comp. Hamilton will make a most efficient High Priest.

While in Petersburg, I was for several days the guest of our distinguished brother, R. W. John Bennett, whom to know is to love and respect; but, to be fully appreciated, he must be known as he is at home, in his town, his lodge, but more particularly in the domestic circle of his own family. Bro. B. is one of those positive men who leaves the impress of his own great moral worth upon all subjects and institutions with which he is associated.

No man is more happy or blest than he in his domestic relations. Mrs. B. is, as you are aware, a sister of our lamented and distinguished deceased brother, L. P. Cabiniss. The inclosed letter of presentation of a Bible and chair to Clinton Lodge, is the production of her polished mind and pen. The sentiment and chirography of the letter is an index to the beauty of mind and purity of heart of its author. The response of Clinton Lodge, through its committee, is also inclosed. If you should deem them worthy of a place in The Trowel, they are at your service.

The letter I send you is the original draught. A more beautiful and perfect copy of the original is transcribed, by the same hand, on a blank leaf of the Bible presented.

No appreciative Mason can visit Clinton Lodge without being impressed with sentiments of profound respect for its members; the high tone of its morals, the dignity, the fraternal kindness and courtesy of the brethren, the peace, harmony, system, and order which pervade the lodge, excite the spontaneous exclamation of David, "Behold! how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." It is a justly merited compliment to say of them that Clinton Lodge No. 19 is the great social, moral, and BENEVOLENT institution of Petersburg, and the most beautiful and interesting features of the Institution are the ladies—the wives, sisters, and daughters of Masons—that secret power behind the throne that is sometimes stronger than the throne. The brethren of Petersburg appreciate the ladies' potent power, and encourage them to exert it for the good of Masonry, an influence which,

"Though silent as the snowflake falling on the sod,
Yet, sure as the lightning, performs the will of God."

I left Petersburg with greatly exalted and enlarged conceptions of Masonry and its moral influences, and with renewed hope and a more sublime faith, at a time when humanity has so terribly corrupted its way among our people, that there is something yet to live and hope for.

Fraternally yours,

S. Stevens.

Petersburg, February 8, 1868.

Brethren of Clinton Lodge—We take great pleasure in presenting to you this evening, as a token of our high esteem for the noble Order of Masonry, and our affectionate interest in this lodge, a new Bible for your altar. May its sacred truths fall with a new and deeper meaning upon your ears, awaken a warmer love in your hearts for God and your fellow-men, strengthen your Faith, enliven your Hope, and increase your Charity. And, as the old Bible, worn and faded, is laid reverently aside, its work done, its place to be filled by another, so let each brother remember that the time will soon come when he, too, will have ended his work, and his place also in the lodge will be filled by another; and may each brother so live, that when that time shall come it may find him most truly a Free and Accepted Mason, free from all sin and accepted by the Grand Master of the Lodge on High, "eternal in the Heavens."

We also present the lodge with a chair, to be placed in the East, trusting that it may never be occupied by one unworthy the high and honorable position of Master of Clinton Lodge.

RESPONSE.

Dear Madame—The committee on behalf of the lodge take great pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of a Bible and chair, presented, on the evening of the 8th of February, by the wives of the members of Clinton Lodge, and hereby express their heartfelt thanks, not only for the articles presented, but for the esteem and affectionate interest which prompted the gift. The Bible we regard as one of the most beautiful books we have ever seen, and its presence in the lodge will always serve to remind us of the touching allusion of its noble donors to the sacred truths therein contained. The chair is not only neat and tasteful, but exceedingly comfortable, and it shall always be our care to see that it shall "never be occupied by one unworthy of so high and honorable a position."

Of the sumptuous banquet to which you invited us on the occasion, we find no words to express our satisfaction; we think it must have been best shown at the time, by the surprise and delight depicted on each brother's face, as he found not only such a feast of good things spread for his refreshment, but a cordial welcome from the same generous spirits who had made the donation to the lodge.

As a perpetual memorial of this token of your regard for this lodge and the noble Order of Freemasonry, the lodge will order that the name of each of you be engrossed within the sacred volume which you presented us; that your names may be recorded in our most sacred book, as they are already severally engraven upon the heart of that brother of ours who is dearest to you, and jointly enshrined in the grateful memory of all our brethren.

The Martyrdom of the Templars.—On the Christian Sabbath, at the hour of sunset, the appointed time of prayer, the Moslems were drawn up in battle array under their respective leaders. The Mameluke emirs stood in two ranks, clothed in yellow, and, at the sound of the holy trumpet, all the captive Knights of the Temple and Hospital were led on to the eminence above Tiberias, in full view of the beautiful lake of Gennesareth, whose bold and mountainous shore had been the scene of so many of their Saviour's miracles. There, as the last rays of the sun were fading away from the mountain tops, they were called upon to deny Him who had been crucified, to choose God for their Lord, Islam for their faith, Mecca for their temple, the Moslems for their brethren, and Mahomet for their prophet. To a man they refused, and were all decapitated in the presence of Saladin, by the devoted zealots of his army, and the doctors and expounders of the law.

Ingratitude is a crime so shameful, that no man was ever known to acknowledge himself guilty of it.

Jurisprudence.

To the law and the testimony.—Isa. 8, 20.

☞ We shall endeavor to answer questions of a legal character under the laws and usages of this and adjoining States under the head of States; other matter of a judicial character will be given under the head of "General." Our comments on law are not binding as such; those who desire decisions must get them from the Grand Master; we give opinions only. Questions will be omitted, unless they are necessary to elucidate the point at issue. Decisions and opinions will be regularly numbered through the volume, and will not be repeated, but reference will be made to them.

No. 26.—Notes should be given direct to a lodge or chapter, by proper description and number, and not to any person or persons. Every lodge and chapter is an incorporated body, and can sue or be sued by its name and number. The following is a proper form of note to a lodge:

Springfield, Ill., April 30, 1868.

For value received, I promise to pay Springfield Lodge No. 4, Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons, one hundred and ten dollars, three months from date, with interest. John Bunyan.

No. 27.—A motion to lay on the table, in a constituent lodge, is out of order; a motion to postpone to a time specified, or indefinitely, is in order.

No. 28.—No appeal can be taken from any decision of the Master in the chair to the lodge.

No. 29.—There is no rule which excludes a brother from the privilege of visit, on the score of time or residence.

No. 30.—No brother but a member of a lodge can submit charges, without the consent of the lodge. It should be an extraordinary reason, however, which should cause refusal.

No. 31.—No expelled Mason, whether E. A., F. C., or M. M., can be restored without a vote of the Grand Lodge, upon the recommendation of the lodge which expelled him.

GENERAL.

No. 21.—Nembership is severed when the Master announces that the vote of the lodge is in favor of granting a demit.

George C. Whiting.

When, on a certain morning, two thousand and nine hundred years ago, the workmen at the temple of Jerusalem ascertained that there were no designs upon the trestle-board, and it became known that one of our first Grand Masters was not to be found, deep sorrow was undoubtedly impressed on the countenance of every workman upon the building; but not deeper or more sincere than that which marked the countenance of each one of the Fraternity of this District, when, on the morning of the 4th of September last, the melancholy tidings came so suddenly upon our community that our beloved Grand Master was no more.

The first thought of every member of the Order was, how shall we most appropriately manifest to the world our appreciation of the virtues and goodness of heart of, and our affection for, our departed brother while in life, and our respect for his memory now that he is gone! Every thing was done that it was in the power of the Craft, in all its organizations, to do. The Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, over which he had so long, so efficiently, and so acceptably presided, was at once called together to make suitable arrangements for the funeral of our Grand Master, and among other things, a committee was appointed to prepare suitable resolutions appropriate to his memory, to be offered at some subsequent meeting of the Grand Lodge.—B. B. French.

Masonic Baptism.

Brother Gouley, of the St. Louis Freemason, pitches strongly into this innovation, as performed, or instituted, by Bro. Albert Pike, Sovereign Grand Commander of the Supreme Council of the Southern Branch of the Scotch Rite.

We think Bro. Gouley goes out of his way to attack the Scotch Rite, which is by no means antagonistic to the York Rite, it being long known to all unprejudiced Masons that there are no better lovers of the Ancient Blue Lodge than those who have also taken the Scotch Rite Degrees. When, however, any officer of the A. and A. Rite presumes on Masonic baptism, he is doing an act that would justify the "Blanchards" in opposing Masonry. Masonry is not Christianity, but it can not be doubted by an intelligent Mason, that the best Christian makes the best Mason. We should be jealous of all innovations.

Since writing the above we see in the National Freemason that Bro. Pike was not in New Orleans on the day this was performed, and that Quitman Lodge is responsible for this act of folly, who are of the York Rite, and composed of American Masons, under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Louisiana, which grand lodge met a few days after and expressed no disapprobation.—Voice.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens and Anti-Masonry.

The Saturday evening Express has an article on this matter which we subjoin. The Courrier des Etats Unis, in an article which we published last week, referred to the circumstance related below:

At the time when the great anti-Masonic excitement—born to life from the Morgan bugbear—swept over the land like a fierce simoom—from Maine to Georgia, Thad. Stevens was a member of the legislature of Pennsylvania. Espousing the cause of the anti-Masons from disappointment, and actuated by feelings of the bitterest animosity against the Masons, for reasons that will be made apparent, he introduced a resolution to the effect that the House, of which he was a member, inquire into the subject of Masonry, with power to send for persons and papers. The House, largely anti-Masonic—the members as well as the Governor of the State having been elected upon the then tremendous issue of the day—adopted almost unanimously the resolution, and a number of well known Masons were summoned to attend the "high court" then in session at Harrisburg, to give evidence in matters appertaining to the Masonic order.

A thorough investigation was to be had in the premises, and the secrets of the Brotherhood laid bare to the world. The "devil," the "goat," and the "gridiron" were to be shown up in all their hideousness; the fearful and horrible rites and ceremonies were to be brought forth and exposed to the light of day, and the black monster, Masonry, was to receive its death-blow then and there. Thad. Stevens was the St. George who was to annihilate the dragon. On the day appointed for the commencement of the proceedings, which were to consummate the above, every member was in his seat, anxious for, yet dreading, the uplifting of the curtain that was to reveal the hitherto veiled horrors that darkened the ceremonials of the Masonic Brotherhood. The house was packed with Masons and anti-Masons, and among the former was a well known Mason, Master of a lodge in the State, who had been summoned to Harrisburg in relation to the matter then about to be investigated in all its details, and him Thad., as Grand Inquisitor, proposed to examine first.

When all was in readiness, the self-constituted champion of the anti-Masons commenced his interrogations thus: "Are you a Mason?" "I am, sir." "Do you belong to a lodge in this State?" I do, sir." "What position do you hold in the lodge?" "The position of Master." "What are the initial proceedings consequent upon a meeting of a lodge?" "The lodge is opened with prayer." "Well, go on, and state what follows." "I am waiting for your questions." "Well, what are the ceremonies incident to the admission of a member?" "He is ballotted for, and if no votes be cast against him, is admitted a member of the order." "What then? Please state the subsequent proceedings. What follows next?"

"Mr. Stevens," said the witness, with a mischievous twinkle in his eye, "if on the — day of ——, 18—, you had been found worthy, you would have become a member of the —— lodge in ——, and would have been initiated in all the secrets and mysteries connected with the Order, and would have possessed a knowledge that, except he becomes a member, no man ever will possess." The witness sat down. Stevens was thrown completely back upon his haunches by this unexpected thunderbolt coming from a serene sky, and, paralyzed from the effects of the blow, stupefied with astonishment, he ignominiously wilted. The fact was, he had some years previously been proposed for membership in one of the lodges of the State of Pennsylvania, but was "black balled," which "little circumstance" he supposed forgotten. The reminder hurled at him at this particular juncture, knocked him completely off his pins. There was a universal buzz of satisfaction from the large number of Masons in the house, as the point blank shot of a brother went so true to its aim, and amid the commotion consequent from the mark being so squarely hit, the further examination of Masonic witnesses was postponed until the next day. It is needless to say this was the end of the matter. The whole thing, as far as legislative interference was concerned, was dropped like a hot pomme de terre.

Peace of Conscience.

There are many in our world who are stumbling along the pathway of human existence, little dreaming from whence peace of conscience is derived, and often overlooking means within reach for obtaining real happiness.

"If happiness has not the seat
And center in the breast,
We may be wise, or rich, or great,
But never can be blessed."

We have many who love Masonry, but have not learned how to turn the key which will unlock the door to a mind at peace, possessing a conscience void of offense. Some stand amazed to see individuals enjoy the true and real peace of heaven in the lowly cottage, with the scanty rations of earth.

It has not occurred to that portion of the world who are wedded to the dollar, how much happiness can be stored away in a neat little humble home on the hill-side, where love and quietness reign supreme. Those peaceful homes can not be encumbered with the great amount of furniture that the rich covet. Their minds are elevated above the gorgeous trappings of earth and show. While the miser is filling his coffers with gold, and dwarfing the mind, crippling the spirit, and beclouding his soul; the humble peasant, when through with his daily labor, is enriching his mind with improved thought, becoming a millionaire intellectually, expanding his whole moral, mental, and spiritual powers. He is storing away wealth that thieves can not steal, neither can moths eat, or rust destroy.

Anciently, when the Masonic Brotherhood was held together by ties which would secure fame and prominence in the operative art of erecting buildings suitable for the various purposes of life, it was necessary that preference should be given to a skillful craftsman. But since the noble conception of the grand scheme of changing the object of the institution, and making it speculative in character and aim, it has become necessary to cultivate mind quite differently, and direct the thoughts into a new channel.

Formerly the conscience was taught to work, and put together the several materials honestly and creditably; now, we are to use all the tools of our ancient brethren symbolically to erect a temple in the mind, purifying the soul, so that the spirit, the real indweller of this earthly tabernacle, can behold an edifice being put together harmoniously.—Square and Compass.

THE ravages of war, and the disasters to the crops of the last year, brought more or less suffering to the doors of many who had just claims upon the Order for assistance. In this emergency, the lodges of the State have provided as liberally as their scant means would allow for the relief of the sufferers, while private charity has accomplished much in the alleviation of the prevailing distress. From abroad we have had the most tangible evidences of the generosity of our brethren in the large donations made through the Grand Masters or their associate officers. From New York, we have received two donations; one of $500, another of $150. Illinois and Missouri have likewise remembered us and rendered aid. Minnesota, far up in the Northwest, with a comparatively young organization, has contributed the handsome sum of $500; while, from the Montezuma Lodge of New Mexico, the hardy generous pioneers of the plains have sent to their brethren of South Carolina $300, thus beautifully exemplifying the length and breadth of that noble charity which underlies and sustains our Order. —Gr. Master Orr, S. C.

Miscellaneous Reading.

The Harp in Heaven.

One of the sweetest recollections of my girlhood, said a lady, is a beautiful reply my mother once made me when my heart was swelling with girlish grief.

I had just returned from the house of a wealthy neighbor, who had kindly given me the use of their piano for a few hours a day to gratify my extreme love for music. Our own cottage home looked so plain in contrast with the one I had just left, and no piano within its walls, I laid my head upon the table, and gave vent to my overflowing heart. I felt grieved, and perhaps a little angry, that we were unable to afford the one thing I desired above all others—a piano—and expressed my feelings to my mother.

Never shall I forget her sweet, gentle tone as she replied, "Never mind, daughter, if you can not have a piano on earth, you may have a harp in heaven." Instantly the whole current of my feeling was changed. Earthly things dwindled into insignificance, and the "harp in heaven," with its golden strings, became the object of my desire. I felt reproved for my repinings against the Providence that had placed me in an humble home, and from that moment the enjoyment of heaven seemed far to outweigh all the pleasures of earth. That beautiful reply has followed me all my life, or rather has gone before me like a bright guiding star, lifting my thoughts above this transient life, and opening to my spirit's vision the glorious scenes in that "land of life and light." I have a piano now, but its charm is gone. Its music no longer gladdens my heart as it once did, for the ears that loved best to listen to its sweet tones are now enraptured with the grand harmonies of heaven. The dear fingers that so often touched its keys now sweep the golden harp-strings. Oh, that "harp in heaven!" How my soul longs for one breath of its rich melody.

As I look upon the dear baby fingers in the cradle near me, I think it matters little whether my child be poor or rich—whether her path be strewn with thorns or flowers; if she may only have a "harp in heaven."

The Dangers of Benzine.

Our lady readers, says the Journal of Chemistry, should be informed that the liquid called benzine, which they use so freely for removing grease and stains from clothing, is a very dangerous article. It is one of the substances distilled from petroleum, and is highly volatile, inflammable, and, when the vapor is mixed with air, explosive. We have been much alarmed, upon visiting neighbors and friends in the evening, to observe a phial of this fluid standing in close proximity with a lamp, or gas flame, and the odor pervading the room. A very small quantity is capable of doing irreparable mischief. The contents of a four-ounce phial, if overturned and evaporized, would render the air of a moderate-sized room explosive; or, if ignited, a whole family might be seriously burned, or lose their lives from it.

A Story for Married Folks.

Andrew Lee came home from his shop where he had worked all day, tired and out of spirits; came home to his wife, who was also tired and out of spirits.

"A smiling wife and a cheerful home—a paradise it would be," said Andrew to himself, as he turned his eyes from the clouded face of Mrs. Lee, and sat down with knitted brows and moody aspect.

Not a word was spoken by either. Mrs. Lee was getting supper, and she moved about with a weary step.

"Come," she said at last, with a side glance at her husband.

Andrew rose and went to the table. He was tempted to speak an angry word, but controlled himself and kept silent. He could find no fault with the chop, home-made bread, nor the fragrant tea. They would have cheered his inward man if there had been a gleam of sunshine on the face of his wife. He noticed she did not eat.

"Are you not well, Mary?"

These words were on his lips; but he did not utter them, for the face of his wife looked so repellant that he feared an irritating reply.

And so, in moody silence, the twain sat together until Andrew had finished his supper.

As he pushed back his chair his wife arose and commenced clearing off the table.

"This is purgatory!" said Lee to himself, as he commenced walking the floor of their little breakfast room, with his hands thrust into his trowsers' pockets and his chin almost touching his breast.

After removing and taking the things to the kitchen, Mrs. Lee spread a green cover over the table, and placing a fresh trimmed lamp thereon, went out and shut the door after her, leaving her husband alone with his unpleasant feelings. He took a long, deep breath as she did so, paused in his walk, stood still for some moments, and then drawing a paper from his pocket, sat down by the table, opened the sheet and commenced reading. Singularly enough, the words upon which his eyes rested were "Praise your wife." They rather tended to increase the disturbance of mind from which he was suffering.

"I should like to find some occasion for praising mine." How quickly his thoughts expressed that ill-natured sentiment! but his eyes were on the paper before him, and he read on:

"Praise your wife, man; for pity's sake, give her a little encouragement. It wont hurt her."

Andrew Lee raised his eyes from the paper, and muttered, "Oh, yes, that's all very well—praise is cheap enough. But praise her for what? For being sullen and making her home the most disagreeable place in the world?" His eyes fell again to the paper.

"She has made your home comfortable, your heart bright and shining, your food agreeable; for pity's sake tell her you thank her, if nothing more. She don't expect it. It will make her eyes wider than they have been for ten years: but it will do her good for all that, and you too."

It seemed to Andrew as if this sentence was written expressly for him, and just for the occasion. It was a complete answer to his question, "Praise her for what!" and he felt it almost as a rebuke. He read no further, for thoughts came too busy, and in a new direction. Memory was convincing him of injustice to his wife. She had always made her home as comfortable for him as she could make it: and had he offered the light return of praise or commendation? Had he ever told her of the satisfaction he had known or the comfort he had experienced? He was not able to recall the time or occasion. As he thought thus, Mrs. Lee came in from the kitchen, and taking her work-basket from the closet, placed it on the table, and sitting down without speaking, began to sew. Mr. Lee glanced almost stealthily at the work in her hands, and saw that it was the bosom of a shirt, which she was stitching neatly. He knew that it was for him she was at work.

"Praise your wife." These words were before the eyes of his mind, and he could not look away from them. But he was not ready for this yet. He still felt moody and unforgiving. The expression of his wife's face he interpreted to mean ill-nature, for which he had no patience. His eyes fell upon the newspaper that was lying spread out before him, and he read the sentence. "A kind, cheerful word spoken in a gloomy house, is the little rift in the cloud that lets the sunshine through."

Lee struggled with himself a while longer. His own ill-nature had to be conquered first, his moody, accusing spirit had to be subdued.

He thought of many things to say, and yet he feared to say them, lest his wife should meet his address with a rebuff. At last, leaning toward her, and taking hold upon the shirt bosom at which she was at work, he said in a voice that was carefully modulated with kindness:

"You are doing the work beautifully, Mary."

Mrs. Lee made no reply. But her husband did not fail to notice that she lost almost instantly, that rigid erectness with which she had been sitting, nor that the motion of her needle had ceased.

"My shirts are better made and whiter than those of any other man in the shop," said Lee, encouraged to go on.

"Are they?" Mrs. Lee's voice was low, and had in it a slight huskiness. She did not turn her face, but her husband saw that she leaned towards him. He had broken the ice of reserve and all was now easy. His hand was among the clouds, and a feeble ray was already struggling through the rift it had made.

"Yes, Mary," he answered softly, "and I've heard it more than once what a good wife Andrew Lee must have."

Mrs. Lee turned her face toward her husband. There was something light in it and light in her eye. But there was something in the expression of the countenance that a little puzzled him.

"Do you think so?" she asked quite soberly.

"What a queer question!" ejaculated Andrew Lee, starting up and going round to the side of the table where his wife was sitting. "What a question, Mary!" he repeated, as he stood before her.

"Do you?" she said.

"Yes, darling," was his warm spoken answer; and he stooped down and kissed her. "How strange that you should ask me such a question!"

"If you would only tell me so, now and then, Andrew, it would do me good." Mrs. Lee arose, and, leaning her face against the manly breast of her husband, stood and wept.

What a strong light broke in on the mind of Andrew Lee! He had never given his wife even the small reward of praise for the loving interest she had manifested daily, until doubt of his love had entered her soul and made the light around her thick darkness. No wonder that her face grew clouded, or that ill-nature took possession of her spirit.

"You are good and true, Mary, my own dear wife. I am proud of you, and my first desire is for your happiness. Oh, if I could always see your face in sunshine, my home would be the dearest place on earth."

"How precious to me are your words of love and praise, Andrew," said Mrs. Lee, smiling up through her tears into his face. "With them in my ears, my heart can never lie in shadow."

How easy had been the work for Andrew Lee! He had swept his hand across the cloudy horizon, and now the bright sunshine was streaming down and flooding that home with joy and beauty.—Ex.

Children.

BY MRS. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

"A little child shall lead them."

One cold market morning I looked into a milliner's shop, and there I saw a hale, hearty, well browned young fellow from the country, with his long cart whip and a lion shag coat, holding up some little matter, and turning it about on his great fist. And what do you suppose it was? A baby's bonnet. A little soft, blue satin hood with a swan's down border, white as the new fallen snow, with a frill of rich blonde around the edge.

By his side stood a very pretty woman, holding with no small pride, the baby—for evidently it was the baby. Any one could read that fact in every glance as they looked at each other, and the little hood, and then at the large blue, unconscious eyes, and fat dimpled cheeks of the little one. It was evident that neither of them had ever seen a baby like that before.

"But, really, Mary," said the young man, "isn't three dollars very high?"

Mary very prudently said nothing, but taking the bonnet, tied it on the little head, and held up the baby. The man looked and grinned, and without another word, down went the three dollars—all that the last week's butter came to: and as they walked out of the shop it is hard to say which looked the most delighted with the bargain.

"Ah!" thought I, "a child that shall lead them."

Another day, as I was passing a carriage factory, along one of our back streets, I saw a young mechanic at work on a wheel. The rough body of a carriage stood beside him—and there, wrapped up snugly, all hooded and cloaked, sat a little dark-eyed girl, about a year old, playing with a great shaggy dog. As I stopped, the man looked up from his work and turned admiringly towards his little companion as much as to say, "See what I have got there."

"Yes," thought I, "and if the lady ever got a glance from admiring swains as sincere as that, she will be lucky."

Ah, these children! little witches! pretty even in all their faults and absurdities! winning even in their sins and iniquities! See, for example, yonder little fellow in a naughty fit—he has shaken his long curls over his deep blue eyes—the fair brow is bent in a frown—the rose-leaf lip is curled in infinite defiance, and the white shoulders thrust haughtily forward. Can any but a child look so pretty even in their naughtiness?

Then comes the instant change—flashing smiles and tears, as all the good comes back all in a rush, and you are overwhelmed with protestations, promises, and kisses! They are irresistible, too, these little ones. They pull away the scholar's pen—tumble about his papers—make somersets over his books—and what can he do? They tear his newspapers, litter the carpets, break, pull, and upset, and then jabber unimaginable English in self defence—and what can you do for yourself?

"If I had a child," says the precise man, "you should see."

He does have a child, and his child tears up his papers, tumbles over his things, and pulls his nose like all other children, and what has the precise man to say for himself? Nothing—he is like everybody else, "a child shall lead him."

Poor little children! they bring and teach us human beings more good than they get in return. How often does the infant, with its soft cheek and helpless hand, awaken a mother from worldliness and egotism to a whole world of new and higher feelings? How often does the mother repay this by doing her best to wipe, even before the time, the dew and fresh simplicity of childhood, and make her daughter too soon a woman of the world, as she has been.

The hardened heart of the worldly man is unlocked by the guiltless tones and simple caresses of his son, but he repays it, in time, by imparting to his boy all the crooked tricks, and hard ways, and callous maxims, which have undone himself.

Go to the jail, to the penitentiary, and find there the wretch most sullen, brutal, and hardened. Then look at your infant son. Such as he is to you, such to some mother was this man. That hard hand was soft and delicate—that rough voice was tender and lisping—fond eyes followed him as he played—and he was rocked and cradled as something holy. There was a time when his heart, soft and unworn, might have opened to questionings of God and Jesus, and been sealed with the seal of Heaven. But harsh hands seized it—fierce, goblin lineaments were impressed upon it, and all seems over with him forever.

So of the tender, weeping child, is made the callous, heartless man—of the all-believing child, the sneering sceptic, of the beautiful and modest, the shameless and abandoned, and this is what the world does for the little ones.

There was a time when the Divine One stood on earth, and the little children sought to draw near to him. But harsh human beings stood between him and them, forbidding their approach. Ah! has it not been always so? Do not even we, with our hard and unsubdued feelings, our worldly and unscriptural habits and maxims, stand like a dark screen between our little child and its Saviour, and keep, even from the choice bud of our hearts, the radiance which might unfold it for Paradise? "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not," is still the voice of the Son of God; but the cold world still closes around and forbids. When of old, the disciples would question their Lord of the higher mysteries of His kingdom, he took a child and set him in the midst, as a sign of him who should be the greatest in heaven. That gentle teacher still remains to us. By every hearth and fireside, Jesus still sets little children in the midst of us!

Wouldst thou know, O parent, what is that faith which unlocks heaven? Draw to thy bosom thy little one, and read in that clear, trusting eye, the lesson of eternal life. But only to thy God, as thy child is to thee, and all is done? Blessed shalt thou be, indeed when "a child shall lead thee."

Married.

In this city, at the residence of the bride, by Rev. JAMES I. DAVIDSON, pastor of the First M. E. Church, NICHOLAS STROTT, Esq., Treasurer of the Scottish bodies in this city, to Miss SUE R. LAMB.

Well done, Nicholas! now let Samuel do likewise.

At the residence of the bride's father, March 17, 1868, by Rev. Mr. Place, Bro. JOSEPH JONES, W. M. of Loami Lodge No. 420 (at Loami, Sangamon co.), to Miss LAURIE E. DAVIS, the daughter of a Master Mason.

Died.

In Chatsworth, Livingston Co., March 31, Bro. JOSEPH DAVIS, aged 52 years, and a member of Chatsworth Lodge No. 539.

The deceased left a wife and family, and an honored name for viture, honesty, and patriotism.

In San Francisco, Cal., February 29th, NOVA L. COON, second daughter of Chas. D. and Susan W. Coon, a native of Springfield, Ill., aged five years.

Bro. Coon will be remembered as Senior Warden of Tyrian Lodge. We can assure him he has the sympathies of every Mason who knew him in this city.

At Yellow Bend, Ark., Bro. LOUIS CARY, a member of De Witt Lodge No. 84, at Clinton. Resolutions of respect were passed March 8th.

In Mt. Auburn, Christian Co., Bro. JOHN H. JONES, a member of Kedron Lodge No. 340.

The lodge passed resolutions testifying to the worth and amiable character and disposition of the deceased.

In Litchfield, W. Bro. WILLIAM T. ELLIOTT, on the 25th of March last.

We have not got his age, but judge that he was about forty years old. The new chapter at Litchfield was named "Elliott" in honor of him. He was an honored member and Past Master of Charter Oak Lodge No. 236. The funeral services were conducted by Grand Master Gorin, and the members of Charter Oak and Litchfield Lodges and Elliott Chapter turned out in force.

At Little Rock, Ark., April 10, 1868, Bro. and Hon. JOHN C. TOBIAS, a member of Taylor Lodge No. 98, at Washington, Ill., and a member of the Legislature of Arkansas, in the 33d year of his age.

The remains of the deceased were conveyed to Washington, and were consigned to the tomb with Masonic ceremonies. The lodge resolutions describe him as a kind husband, an affectionate father a good neighbor, valuable citizen, and esteemed Mason. Thanks are rendered to the Masonic bodies at Little Rock and Helena, Ark., and at Cairo, for care in sickness and services rendered in sending the body to its earthly resting-place; also, to Breth. Benjamin Thomas and F. M. Gibson, who accompanied the remains.

At Marine, Madison Co., April 27th, very suddenly, Bro. O. H. P. R. SPRING, a member of Marine Lodge No. 355, aged 54 years.

Bro. Spring had been our agent for some years; he was a pleasant correspondent. His lodge passed resolutions showing much love for the deceased and a warm sympathy for his family.

At Ramsay, Fayette Co., Ill., Bro. WILLIAM H. CASEY, a member of Ramsay Lodge No. 405, aged 31 years.

The members of the lodge deeply sympathize with Mrs. Casey and her two children in their sad bereavement. A good man has been taken away.

At Sidney, at the tender age of two years and two months, JOHN MERLIN, son of Dr. G. W. and M. E. Hartman.

This is the fifth death in the family of our worthy brother since Dec. 15, 1860. Well might one pray, "Let this cup pass from me"; yet, let the other sentiment follow—"Not my will, but thine, be done."

PROPOSALS

FOR THE PERMANENT LOCATION OF THE GRAND LODGE OF A. F. & A. MASONS, OF ILLINOIS.

At the Annual Communication of the Grand Lodge in October last, the first four officers were appointed a committee to receive proposals for the permanent location of the Grand Lodge from the several cities of Illinois.

The Fraternity of the several cities in Illinois are therefore invited to submit proposals for such permanent location, and to specify the amount offered in money, lands, lots, or other property—lands and lots to be described in full, with valuation.

Said proposals to be filed with one of the undersigned, indorsed "Proposals for permanent location of Grand Lodge," on or before the first day of July, A. D. 1868, to be opened in the presence of the Grand Lodge, on the first day of the Grand Communication in October next.

DECKER & CO.'S
IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

PIANO FORTES!

Warerooms: No. 2 Union Square, corner Fourteenth St. and Fourth avenue,

NEW YORK.

These Instruments are celebrated throughout the country, and are distinguished for

THEIR SINGING QUALITY,
VOLUME and PURITY OF TONE,
SYMPATHETIC, ELASTIC, EVEN TOUCH,
DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION,
and BEAUTY OF FINISH.

Decker & Company's Pianos have always received the First Premiums, whenever and wherever they have competed with the most celebrated makers in this country.

OUR IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

Is an invention beautiful in its simplicity and wonderful in its practical effects. It is the most compact Agraffe ever invented, and its influence upon the tone is to render it mellower, rounder, and more clearly brilliant, while it utterly overcomes that sharp, metalic quality which disfigures the instruments of all other makers.

WHY WE EXCEL.

While other Pianos are rarely in tune,

THE DECKER & CO.'S PIANOS invariably retain their Pitch and Tone.

While other Pianos are made of poor or unseasoned materials,

THE DECKER PIANOS combine the Best Materials, Skillful Workmanship, and Scientific Construction.

While other Pianos are deficient in the great requisites of a good touch,

THE DECKER & CO. PIANOS have a flexibility under skillful manipulation, which not only adapts them to the style of every performer, but which causes the player to feel en rapport with the Instrument, and affords his taste and fancy free expression.

IT IS A FACT—That philosophy of construction is not less important than fitness of material.

IT IS A FACT—That various minute, unobserved appliances, adaptations, and improvements have an influence in the tone, durability and manipulative character of a Piano, in no degree inferior to the more ostensible modifications.

IT IS A FACT—Therefore, that science, as well as experience; artistic discrimination, as well as methodic care; capital, as well as conscientiousness, are requisite in the production of a GOOD PIANO-FORTE. In our

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte

is exhibited the result of an uninterrupted, persevering regard for these facts and principles; and purchasers who have so often spoken of the uniformity of excellence in our Instruments will be led to understand how this superiority and uniformity has been attained—a result which is apparent to even ordinary judges, in the volume and richness of tone, the sustained and human character of their singing quality, while connoiseurs and critics fully indorse all that we have adverted to.

The unanimous opinion of the best artists and the most reliable critics is, that

THE DECKER & COMPANY'S

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte is the only Square Piano-Forte, which, in Voluminous Sonority, and Positive Solidity of Tone,

Can stand comparison with the

BEST GRAND PIANO-FORTES MADE.

WORDS TO CHRISTIAN CRAFTSMEN,

Who are Being Excommunicated by Bigots for their Adherence to the Craft.

BY REV. M. B. SMITH, 32°, P. M., P. H. P., &C.,
Rector of St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church,
Passaic, N. J.

[Our Rev. brother sends to the National and Freemason the following, which we respectfully dedicate to the American Baptist, the Church Journal, the Independent, and the religious (?) anti-Masonic press]:

Brothers, stand fast! To the Craft be true,
As our fathers were before us;
We stand on the rock of Jehovah's Word,
And the banner of Love floats o'er us.
Our cause is just, and the holy trust
Of Love we can not surrender,
But, hand in hand, each one must stand,
Our household's firm defender.

Brothers, stand fast! Though the thunder rolls
And the forked lightning flashes,
And the torch of the bigot is madly raised
To lay our fair temple in ashes—
Its fabric grand will doubtless stand
Unscathed by the storm that rages;
Built on a rock, it outlives the shock,
As of past, so of coming ages.

Brothers, stand fast! Let no paltry fears
From the path of duty move you;
The hand of Jehovah controls the storm,
And the trial is sent to prove you.
"Quit you like men," and rend each chain—
By bigotry forged—asunder;
Not one should fear when God is near,
Above, around, and under.

Brothers, stand fast! The great I AM
Gives strength to bear man's sneering,
And more is gained by steadfastness
And loving than by fearing.
In every fold of God's household
We share with you this burden,
And the great love of God above
Will give to each the guerdon.

Brothers, stand fast! For God and Truth
Forgiving—loving—blessing;
Your God will give—what men deny—
Communion worth possessing.
His free reward—a treasury stored,
A cup of bliss o'erflowing;
A golden yield from Love's own field,
To crown your faithful sowing.
—National and Freemason.

We are Brethren, A'.

BY ROBERT NICOLL.

A happy bit hame this auld world would be,
If men, when they're here, could make shift to agree,
And ilk said to his neighbor, in cottage and ha',
Come, gi'e me your hand—we are brethren a'.

I ken na why one wi' anither should fight,
When to 'gree would make a'body cozie and right,
When man meets wi' man, 'tis the best way ava,
To say, gi'e me your hand—we're brethren a'.

My coat is a coarse one, an' yours may be fine,
And I maun drink water, while you may drink wine;
But we baith ha'e a leal heart, unspotted to shaw;
Sae gi'e me your hand—we are brethren a'.

The knave ye would scorn, the unfaithful deride;
Ye would stand like a rock, wi' the truth on your side;
Sae would I, an' naught else would I value a straw;
Then gi'e me your hand—we are brethren a'.

Ye would scorn to do fausely by woman or man;
I haud by the right aye, as well as I can;
We are one in our joys, our affections, an' a';
Come, gi'e me your hand—we are brethren a'.

Your mother has lo'ed you as mothers can lo'e;
And mine has done for me what mothers can do;
We are one, high an' laigh, an' we shouldna be twa;
Sae gi'e me your hand—we are brethaen a'.

We love the same summer day, sunny an' fair;
Hame! oh, how we love it, an' a' that are there!
From the pure air of heaven the same life we draw—
Come, gi'e me your hand—we are brethren a'.

Frail shakin' auld age will soon come o'er us baith,
An' creeping alang at his back will be death;
Syne into the same mither-yird we will fa',
Come, gi'e me your hand—we are brethren a'.

Three Jolly Girls.

Three jolly girls I met in the stage,
Coming from school, on a rainy day,
Sixteen summers their average age,
Blithe and light-hearted, careless and gay.

Each had German and Spanish and French,
English and Heaven knows how many more;
Logic enough for a legal bench,
Any amount of mythical lore.

One a brunette, the others were fair—
All with such roguish and mirthful looks
That the query came, seeing them there,
What can those implings want with such books?

The stage was full, yet they never stopped
To ask "Is there room for any more?"
But, like little mischiefs, quickly popped
Over the steps and into the door.

And there they giggled and laughed and stood.
"Susie!" said one, "don't you push me so!"
"Oh!" said Susie, "I am sure you would Have nothing to say, were't Charley, your beau."

At that they giggled and laughed again;
The brunette said, "Why, Susie, my dear,
It's no such thing, as would be quite plain,
If only Charley himself were here!"

Just then a lady pulled on the strap,
And Susie taking the vacant place,
The brunette plumped right down in her lap,
Laughing till tears ran over her face.

The third one had her share of the fun,
In sooth was jolliest of the three,
While her tongue with witty speeches run
As glib and lively as well could be.

But little thought they, those lasses fair,
As the stage went rattling o'er the stones,
How the grey-haired man, beside them there,
Was drinking the music in of their tones.

I was the grey-beard watching their fun
And their merry, childish, prattling glee,
Thinking of years whose course had run,
Bearing my dear ones away from me.

Watching them there, to myself, said I,
"Each is her mother's pet lambkin now;
What will she be as the years go by?
What, but 'somebody's darling,' I trow!"

THE SYMBOLISM OF SACRED PLANTS.

As Developed in Freemasonry and the Kindred Institutions of the Ancient World.

BY ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D.

XXII.

SACRED GROVES.

If we have already seen, in the preceding papers of this series, that every religious cult of the ancient world was distinguished by some particular tree, which was held in veneration by its worshipers, we will not be surprised that groves which were simply collections of these trees became, in time, also objects of religious veneration. The reverence originally given to one tree was readily and naturally extended to many. If the Druid venerated the oak as a symbol to him of a deep religious sentiment, then it was easy for him to transfer that veneration to a grove of oaks. If the worshiper of Aphrodite saw in the myrtle an object of adoration, that adoration was not diminished when the sacred trees were collected together in a grove of myrtles. This was, perhaps, the first cause of the establishment of groves as places consecrated to the performance of sacred rites. And this custom of planting many trees of one particular kind around or in the vicinity of temples became so common among the ancient idolators, and the regulation was so well understood by the people, that every stranger who passed by a sacred grove was able to determine, by the kind of tree of which it was mainly composed, to what god the temple with which the grove was connected belonged. A grove of oaks would indicate the worship of Jupiter; one of laurel, that of Apollo; and one of olive or myrtle, that of Minerva or Venus. The groves were but the multiplication in numerous forms of the one symbolic idea of the single tree. Thus, the old Dodonion forest of oaks, in Chaonia, was consecrated to Jupiter, and sacrifices were offered to him in its dark recesses, because, long before, the oak had been deemed the sacred tree of that god.

Various reasons have been assigned, outside of the sacred character of their trees, for the first establishment of groves as places of worship.

First, in hot countries, it is supposed that the coolness, shade, and pleasantness of these sylvan retreats made them especially acceptable to the people for purposes of religious worship. Hence Potter says that these groves consisted rather of tall and beautiful trees which afforded power or the right to make these proposed alterations? On this point your committee cannot hesitate, for a single moment, to answer this question most decidedly in the negative.

We have received Freemasonry with its landmarks, from England. Among these is the "dedication to the holy Saints John." We have so received it, and we have so imparted it. Our Jewish brethren ask us to change this dedication, and to make such other alterations "as are consistent with their religious belief."

This Grand Lodge can do many things, but there are some things which it can not do, and to remove an "ancient landmark" is one of the things that it can not do. If it should pass a vote changing "the dedication," it would not only transcend its legitimate authority, but it would do an act which the obligations of the subordinate lodges would compel them to entirely discard. What they as lodges and as individuals have received, they must impart, and that, too, in the way in which they have received it, and in no other way. Without further discussion, we might rest the discussion here, as clearly made out on the ground that the Grand Lodge have no authority whatever to grant the request of the petitioners, and if they should do so, it would avail nothing, since the obligations of the members of the subordinate lodges would impel them to resist any such ordinance of the Grand Lodge.

But for the satisfaction of our Jewish brethren, whose petition is couched in the most respectful terms, we are willing to go a step behind this position, and briefly refer to the historical aspect of this question.

In reply to what we have already said, our brethren might inquire, if we should deem it our duty to adhere to our practice, if it could be shown that we had not received the correct work and lectures? In answer, we have only to say, that we know no other Masonry than that which we have received. And we have no reason to believe that what we received was any other than the true. So far as the subjects of the petition before us are particularly involved, we believe that the history of Masonry will clearly prove that our practice is strictly correct. The petitioners refer to the fact that, since 1813, when the grand lodges of Ancient York and England coalesced under the title of the "United Grand Lodge of England," the same practice which they petition for was adopted. With the present practice of the Grand Lodge of England, we have nothing to do. The question which mainly concerns us on this point is, what was the practice of those grand lodges from which we received Masonry, at the time that we received it?

In 1733, R. W. Henry Price, of Boston, received from England the first charter ever received for any Lodge whatever on this continent. This charter conferred grand lodge powers. In the year 1752, St. Andrew's Lodge received from Scotland a charter, which resulted in the establishment of another grand lodge, and so here we had two rival grand lodges. In the year 1792 they united, and formed what is now our Grand Lodge of Massachusetts.. These facts take us at once to England before 1733, and to Scotland before 1752. The practice which obtained at those periods, in those grand lodges, was the practice which we received, and which, of course, should constitute the "landmarks" at this day. What were these landmarks touching the points referred to by the petitioners? In answering this question we are very much indebted to the Rev. Dr. Oliver, of England, from whose work entitled "A Mirror for the Johannite Masons," we have made liberal extracts.

Dr. Anderson writes, under the date 1679, that many of the Fraternity's records of this and former reigns were burned in the revolution, and many of them were too hastily burned in his own time, for a fear of making discoveries; so that there is not so ample an account as could be wished of the grand lodge. When, in 1720, Dr. Anderson compiled a Book of Constitutions, by order of the grand lodge, he adds: "the Freemasons had always a book in manuscript, called the Book of Constitutions, containing not only their charges and regulations, but the history of architecture; but they had no book of constitutions in print until his Grace the present Duke of Montague, when Grand Master, ordered me to peruse the old manuscripts, and digest the constitutions with a just chronology."

Dr. Anderson, together with others who were constituted his associates, drew up a series of lectures for the use of the lodges. These were widely disseminated, and constituted an authentic digest of the pure and legitimate doctrines of Masonry. These lectures formed the basis of all succeeding ones; and, says Dr. Oliver, throughout the whole series the Saints John are named as the patrons of the Order. They accompanied all the warrants which were sent to foreign parts, and we accordingly find that at that early period, in every country of Europe where Masonry was planted under the authority of the Grand Lodge of England, the lodges were called by the name of St. John.

When Masonry was revived in 1717, and these lectures were authorized by the Grand Lodge of England, we have no reason to doubt that the landmarks were then pure and unchanged.

Says Dr. Oliver: "In the original lectures, compiled by Sayer, Payne, and Desaguliers, and improved by Anderson, Desaguliers, and Cowper; in the reviews of Dunckerley and Martin Clare, twice repeated; and in the extended rituals of Hutchinson, Preston, and others, which were in use down to the re-union in 1813, and by some lodges even to the present time, the Saints John occupy their place as the patrons of Masonry—no link in the chain of evidence is broken; for in no one ritual, whether ancient or modern, which was in use during the whole century, were they omitted."

It was a law of the English Grand Lodge, established in 1721, that the lodges in and about London and Westminster should hold an annual communication on St. John the Baptist's day, or else on St. John the Evangelist's.

But that this was no new custom, no innovation upon ancient usage, is evident from a historical fact. It is said that Queen Elizabeth sent an armed force to break up the annual grand lodge at York, which was always held on the day of St. John the Evangelist; when Sir Thomas Sackville, the Grand Master, induced the officers to be initiated, and their report to the Queen was so satisfactory that she gave them no further disturbance. Thus it appears that more than one hundred years before the revision of Masonry by the grand lodge in 1717, the Grand Lodge of York observed the festival of St. John the Evangelist.

This custom, it is said, has existed from time immemorial, in proof of which Dr. Oliver refers to a copy of the old Gothic constitutions, which was produced at a grand festival on St. John's day, in the year 1663, before Henry Jermyn, Earl of St. Albans, Grand Master.

Thus much we have deemed it proper to say upon the historical point involved in the matter under consideration, by which it appears, plainly enough, that the first we know, and all we know, of English Freemasonry up to the present century, recognizes the dedication of lodges to God and to the holy Saints John, as a part of the usages of the Order, and the observance of the days set apart for the commemoration of these two persons as Masonic festivals.

But we said we received a part of our Masonry from Scotland. It will be proper to advert, for a moment, to the decision of the Grand Lodge of Scotland touching this subject. "It is evident," says Dr. Oliver, "that the substitution of the Saints John for Moses and Solomon was an article of belief amongst the first Masons who introduced the Craft into this island. The Kilwinning system, which may be traced back to the 12th century, is called 'St. John's Masonry'; and in the present laws of the Grand Lodge of Scotland this principle is unreservedly maintained in the provision respecting 'private lodges,' where all lodges holding of the Grand Lodge of Scotland are strictly prohibited and discharged from holding any other meetings than those of the three orders of Apprentices, Fellow Craft, and Master Mason, denominated St. John's Masonry."

We have shown that in our own grand lodge those parts of the work and lectures which the petitioners desire to have expunged were received from England and Scotland, and that these two grand lodges held to them at the time they transmitted the Institution to us, and they had been, moreover, held by their predecessors from time immemorial.

When Masonry was in the custody of the Jews, there is no doubt that lodges were dedicated to Solomon. But after the destruction of the temple at Jerusalem and the dissolution of the Jewish polity, both civil and ecclesiastical, Masonry naturally fell into the hands of Christians. From that time to this, our tradition is that they were dedicated to the Saints John, and no historical facts have been or can be adduced to show that tradition, in this respect, is erroneous.

We have no evidence that there have been any lodges but Christian lodges since the destruction of Jerusalem. The Jews have not been in a situation to hold lodges. They have no country, no home, no nation, no government. They have been flying from one country to another, seeking to escape from the persecutions which everywhere pursued them. That they have maintained their existence as a race, dispersed as they have been over the earth, is a miracle, which proves, if nothing else did, that they are the ancient people of God, and that their condition for the last eighteen hundred years is a fulfillment of divine prophecy.

Freemasonry did for them what few if any other societies were willing to do. They were virtually outlawed in many countries, and in scarcely a single Christian nation were they permitted to the enjoyment of the full privileges of citizenship. Even in England, at this very day, they are debarred from holding a seat in Parliament. In some of our own States they are not eligible to hold any civil office, and yet nowhere on the face of the earth do they enjoy so much of privilege, or are they as well treated, as in England and in the United States. Under such circumstances, this Institution, true to its principles as a cosmopolite society, opens its doors to them and permits them to enter its pale, if they desire to do so, with the assurance, if they do, that they shall be hailed and treated as brethren—that there shall be one spot which they may call home, where they may dwell in safety and in peace, where they shall enjoy all its immunities and privileges, eligible to any office, entitled to all the benefits which the Fraternity have covenanted to extend to each other. This was a very great favor, and we have no doubt that our Israelitish brethren have esteemed it as such.

To the best of our information, it was not until about the middle of the last century that the Jews were admitted into Freemasonry, with the exception of their connection with spurious lodges on the Continent—as Masonry was then understood and practiced.

Up to about the year 1754, there was no authorized form of Masonic prayer in use in the lodges in England. The prayer-book was then a text-book of the lodge. The Master was left to his own discretion in this particular, although the general practice was to select an appropriate form from the liturgy. About this time the Jews were first admitted into the English lodges; they very naturally objected then, as they object now, to the use of the forms of Christian worship. These objections being yielded to by some of the Masters, led to irregularities in the devotional services of the lodge-room. But this did not meet the approbation of the old and eminent members of the Order, who were desirous of transmitting to their successors the forms and lessons of Masonry as they had learned them. In order to set this matter right by authority, Dr. Manningham, then Deputy Grand Master, in connection with Dr. Anderson, drew up the following prayer, to be used at the initiation of candidates, and laid it before the Grand Lodge at London for its sanction, by which it was immediately adopted. It was published in the "Freemason's Pocket Companion," in 1754:

"Most high and glorious Lord God, thou Architect of heaven and earth, who art the Giver of all good gifts and graces, and hath promised that where two or three are gathered together in thy name, thou wilt be in the midst of them; in thy name we assemble and meet together, must humbly beseeching thee to bless us in all our undertakings; to give us thy Holy Spirit, to enlighten our minds with wisdom and understanding; that we may know and serve thee aright, that all our doings may tend to thy glory and the salvation of our souls. And we beseech thee, O Lord God, to bless this thy undertaking, and to grant that this our brother may dedicate his life to thy service, and be a true and faithful brother amongst us. Endue him with divine wisdom, that he may, with the secrets of Masonry, be able to unfold the mysteries of godliness and Christianity. This we humbly beg, in the name and for the sake of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour. Amen."

This historical incident clearly proves two important facts—that previous to the year 1754 the English lodges had been accustomed to use prayers taken from the Christian liturgy; and secondly, that the admission of Jews into the Fraternity caused a discussion of the propriety of such prayers, which resulted in a decision of the Grand Lodge by which a Christian form of worship was adopted.

It is very evident, from what has been said, that all the Masonry which the world has known anything about, since the destruction of Jerusalem, up to about one hundred years ago, has been Christian Masonry—that is, Freemasonry in the hands of Christians, conducted by them after a manner which has recognized, in some form or other, the fact and authority of the Christian religion. Yet it does not exclude persons whe are not Christians. It requires belief in God as an indispensible qualification. Professing that, if there be no objection to the candidate as wanting in other qualification, he is admitted. In this sense, we have received no other kind of Masonry, and we can transmit no other. At the building of the Temple, the society was mainly in the hands of Jews; now it is mainly in Christian hands, but open for Jews as well as Gentiles. It is confined to no sect and to no nation. We trust that this grand lodge will be the last to do anything to change the ancient landmarks of the Order, to circumscribe its influence, to restrict its usefulness, to render it national or sectarian, or to commence, in any form or for any purpose, the mischievous work of innovation upon its well established principles. For these reasons, and for others which might be named, the committee recommend that the petitioners have leave to withdraw.

Masonry and Religion.

From the Western Musical Review.

The Rev. Charles G. Finney, of Oberlin, Ohio, has just rounded the last period, completing a tirade against Masonry, with which he has been afflicting the readers of the New York Independent for nearly three months. In this lengthy argument, he has made his main attacks against the religion of Masonry. And then he treats religion in the limited sense of a dogma—as a theological subtlety. Like a clerical bigot, as he is, a quiet and simple faith, a comfortable and abiding hope, a real but unobtrusive charity, mean nothing to him—rant and raving, posturing and shouting, blatter and self-adulation are his only pleasant and satisfactory ways and manners. The Pharisee who stood in the temple and prayed, saying within himself, "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are," is the grand ensample for such super-religionists as this boasting Boanerges.

We commend to the Professor and his ilk the following extract from the address of Dr. E. W. H. Ellis, delivered at the Masonic pic-nic in this city, last St. John's Day, and Noah Webster's definition of religion, which we copy from an "Unabridged."

Webster says that Religion is "the recognition of God as an object of worship, love, and obedience; right feelings towards God as rightly apprehended; piety."

"Religion, as distinguished from theology, is subjective, designating the feelings and acts of men which relate to God; while theology is objective, and denotes those ideas of God which man entertains respecting the God whom he worships, especially his scientific and systematic views of God. As distinguished from morality, religion denotes the influences and motives to human duty, which are found in the character and will of God, while morality describes the duties to man, to which true religion always influences."

One other definition of religion from the Book of Books:

"Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."—James i. 27.

Now for Dr. Ellis: "There are some things that Masonry is not. And, in the first place, it is not a political institution. This was fully demonstrated during the hot days of anti-Masonry, for among its devotees and adherents were men of every religious and political creed under heaven. That fierce band of self-constituted patriots, denominating themselves as anti-Masons, forming themselves into a political organization to wage infuriate warfare against the Institution of Masonry; but after a few years of prospective intolerance, and indifferent success, the party died of inanition, as men die for want of bread, or as the fire goes out for lack of fuel. There was no Masonic party to oppose, and, therefore, no warfare politically to be waged. During its brief career, it succeeded in foisting into power a few bad men and noisy demagogues, and even gave the electoral vote of a single State for a Presidential candidate; but its noisiest partisans, becoming disgusted with its own inherent rottenness, were among the first to bury it out of sight. But for the few mementoes of its violence, left here and there, like the ruins of some desolating conflagration, its existence would long since have passed from the memory of man. A search now for a political anti-Mason would be as vain and profitless as a search for the fountain of perpetual youth.

"Having survived this political warfare, and turned aside with its shield of truth the thousand missiles of its Quixotic assailants, the Order seems destined now to encounter another sort of warfare. Once the Inquisition, with the thumb-screw and wheel, the rack and the faggot, with the denunciation of the Pope and Cardinal, Priest and Jesuit, attempted the overthrow of Masonry—in these latter days a few zealots of the Potestant Church sound the alarm, and marshal the hosts for the attack.

"Conspicuous among the leaders is President Finney, of Oberlin; in his youth, as he professes, a Mason; a seceder when the simoon of anti-Masonry swept over the land; and now, in the days of his senility, feels called upon to head the cohorts of anti-Masonry.

"The burden of his complaint is that Masonry assumes to be religion—an institution promising the salvation of the soul. His accusation is contained in these words:

"'But an examination of Freemasonry shows that it promises salvation upon entirely other conditions than those revealed in the Gospel of Christ. The Gospel nowhere inculcates the idea that any one can be saved by obedience to the law of God. "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified," is the uniform teaching of the Bible. Much less can any one be saved by conformity to Masonic law, which requires only a partial, and therefore a spurious, morality. The Bible teaches that all unconverted persons are in a state of sin, of total moral depravity, and consequent condemnation by the law of God; and that the conditions of salvation are repentance and a total renunciation of all sin, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and sanctification by the Holy Spirit. Now, these are by no means the conditions upon which Freemasonry proposes to save its members. The teachings of Freemasonry upon this subject are summarily this: Obey Masonic law, and live; disobey Masonic law, and die.''

"It should be a sufficient answer to the minds of all candid men, as every enlightened man of his own knowledge can well and truly affirm, that Masonry makes no such assumption. Neither in ceremony nor ritual, in text-book nor monitor, is such a claim to be found. The Masonic lodge is not a church, nor is Masonry religion. Members of Christian churches, ministers of the Gospel, doctors of divinity, as zealous for the cause of religion, and as sternly orthodox as President Finney, are enrolled among the members of our Order, and assemble nightly around our altars, and yet fail to find any antagonism between Masonry and religion. On the contrary, they find in its ceremonies and rituals an affinity for every form of true religion, and a morality, at least in precept, not second to any.

"Again we quote from President Finney:

"'It nowhere recognizes men as being justified by faith in Christ, as being sanctified by faith in Christ, and as being saved as the Gospel recognizes men as being saved.

"'Indeed, it is salvation by Masonry, and not salvation by the Gospel, that Masonry insists upon. It is another gospel, or presents entirely another method of salvation than that presented in the Gospel.'

"To this we answer, that Masonry makes no attempt to deal with the subtleties of theology. It takes men as it finds them—pagan, Mohammedan, Jew, and Christian—without inquiry into the particulars of their religious belief, admitting them on equal terms to its fold. Its aim is not to assume the functions or prerogatives of a church, not to draw men from the church, but to familiarize them with the requirements of the law of God; to teach them, in ritual and symbol and ceremony, its sublime precepts; to exhort and allure to obedience; to make religion practical, and not alone ideal; to bind up the broken-hearted; to give the cup of water to him that is athirst; bread to the hungry, and clothes to the naked; to promote the brotherhood of man, and to make its members better sons, husbands, fathers, and citizens, by urging upon them the practice of every virtue, and the adoration of the supreme fountain of light and virtue.

"Properly viewed, there is no antagonism between Masonry and religion. Each seeks the highest good of man, in its own way, and hand in hand it woos him from the path of evil, and seeks to plant his feet in the highway that leads to happiness. The assemblage of good men at Pittsburg, intent on whetting their swords for the overthrow of Masonry, instead of finding an enemy bristling with arms and eager for the conflict, are only turning their arms against the most powerful ally of true religion now known to the world. We meet them, not as Greek meets Greek, steel to steel, but with the soft hand of forgiveness—in the faith of Jacob, in the spirit of charity and Christian resignation—when smitten upon one cheek turning the other, and pointing to the throne of love where reigns the God and Father of us all, who shall judge between us who better, in life and spirit, obeys His word and exemplifies His teachings. We may ward off their blows, but shall attempt no retaliation. Theirs be the glory of this unnatural strife—nay, theirs be all the strife, and ours the victory.

"Again, if we held Masonry to be the only true religion, then of all men are we the most selfish and unreasonable. For on what principle could we justify the exclusion from our mysteries of the blind, the halt, the deformed, the young man in his nonage, the youth on whom shall soon rest the cares and duties of the nation, who shall fill our vacant places and be all to the world that we are now? Or how could we banish from our halls the tender maiden in her blushing beauty and innocence, or the wife of our bosoms, cherished as the apple of our eye, or the mother who bore us and watched over our helpless infancy? Shall all these stretch their arms to us in vain, imploring us, as the custodians of the keys of St. Peter, to open to them also the gates of the Celestial City? It is too absurd for argument, but it shows how impossible it is that Masonry should for a moment be regarded as religion, or that an order presenting such high claims upon human consideration for its charity towards all mankind, its universal benevolence, shall assert for itself such exclusiveness.

"The duties of the Mason to his fellow-man are embodied in the Golden Rule—"All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." This rule, unequaled in terseness and sublimity, lived up to in its spirit, would usher in the dawn of the millenium. It is emphatically the rule of Masonry, and enjoins the exercise of every conceivable virtue. It requires us to seek the highest good of every member of the human family, enjoining it by that strongest of motives, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you." It grasps, at a single clutch, at the whole round of virtues, and strings them like pearls upon its diadem.

* * * * * *

"Masonry could not exist in barbarism, for its teachings are those of the highest civilization; it could not prosper in the haunts of vice, for it cultivates the noblest virtues; it could not thrive in heathenism, for it teaches the existence of the one only and true God.

"It is an institution of peace. It makes no war upon sects, interferes with no man's religious feelings or sentiments, tolerates all creeds and opinions, and is aggressive only against wrong and immorality. It illustrates the fact that men may differ and be friends, and enjoins that among its followers there shall be no strife save only as to who shall best work and best agree. Its mission is not to rule empires, or to involve itself in political strifes, but rather to pour oil upon the troubled waters, and rule in the hearts of men; to make them better, more charitable, more circumspect, more generous and forgiving, more loyal to their country, and more upright in word and deed, in thought, and emotion."

CONCLUSION OF A

MASTERLY ORATION

DELIVERED BY

GRAND MASTER VAUX,

At the Laying of the Corner-stone of the

NEW TEMPLE IN PHILADELPHIA,

ON ST. JOHN'S DAY.

Thus, at this time, the Masonic Fraternity is engaged publicly in a most interesting ceremony. Here, in your presence, my brethren, we have laid a corner-stone on which to build a temple, to be dedicated to its mysteries. Masonry has mysteries and rites which are secret from all who are not qualified to comprehend them. These it has preserved for ages. Is it forbidden to keep in silence that which is only to be made manifest in the all-knowing time? To "know thyself" has been a study of the human mind since man was made in the image of his Creator, and what yet is known? The soul, its nature, essence and origin, its present and its future, the relations it holds to will and consciousness, its moral attributes, the laws which it obeys, and its energies for good or evil, are secrets God has reserved, not here or now to be divulged. Man beholds the inscrutable, yet to be unsealed. God has not uttered all his knowledge, nor communicated to man all his wisdom. The world around us has its mysteries. From the highest order of created things, through all degrees of the divine workmanship, the unrevealed is found under the seal of secrecy. Behold the tiniest wild flower, hiding itself among the rocks on the hill-side, as the first rays of sunlight kiss its dew-wet petals and display its blushing beauties; are these all the secrets hidden in the calyx? It will emit its perfume as incense, wave its leaves in sign of worship, bow to the gentle wind in token of obedience, and at sunset, with head declining as if in posture of prayer for protection, will trustingly fold itself up under the canopy of the sky, and beneath the watchful stars, to await in faith the coming morrow; but it has not, the while, revealed those secrets God gave it to keep; and it will not!

Masonry has also secrets which are not to be made manifest till the time for declaring all things. For whatever cause attacked, by either the ignorant, the wicked, the scoffer, the faithless, or the false, the Brotherhood is pledged to maintain itself now and hereafter, as aforetime. We laugh to scorn the futile efforts of men either ignorant or mistaken, "deceitful above all things and desperately wicked," who seek notoriety by their otherwise resultless assaults on this Fraternity. Against all hostilities it is protected by a security, consecrated by the centuries.

We have laid this corner-stone. Our ceremonies are not novelties to dazzle or deceive. They are intended neither to gratify pride nor manifest power. We have not the right to change or alter them. As our Order originally received them, so they have remained unto this present, and so they must go forward into the hereafter. They are the expression of meanings and characteristics which custom, older than our language, permits us thus to communicate. The temple we propose to erect is to be devoted to our ceremonial and symbolic rites and mysteries. Guarded by the science of architecture, the wisdom of the ages, the virtue of purity in heart, the unselfishness of charity, the obedience of faith, the silence of reverence, the strength of unity, and the unbroken promises of God, it will stand, as a refuge and a fortress of the Craft, like a great rock in a weary land. In its hallowed enclosure the light of Masonry will ever illumine those who seek virtue and knowledge.

The profane, the schismatic, and the agitator, can never defile it, for to them, its doors are barred by those virtues they neither appreciate nor comprehend. Selfishness is so abashed by the sublime rebuke of an unostentatious benevolence, that it fails in the arrogance which else would nerve it, to seek an entrance through its guarded portals.

Within this temple our successors will assemble to work the same work we have performed, as our fathers before us have done in their day and generation. When this temple shall have been finished, those who gather together at its dedication will offer up to God the same prayer King Solomon did at Jerusalem, when he completed the work God first promised King David that he should undertake, but which afterwards he entrusted to King Solomon. On that day the Brotherhood of Freemasons, in the temple built on this corner-stone, will with one accord say:

"O Lord God of Israel, there is no God like Thee in the heavens nor in the earth.

"Yet have thou respect to the prayers of thy servant and to his supplication, O Lord my God, to hearken unto the cry and to the prayer which Thy servant prayeth before Thee to-day.

"That Thine eyes may be open toward this house day and night, even toward the place of which Thou hast said, My name shall be there; that Thou mayest hearken unto the prayer which Thy servant shall make toward this place.

"When the heaven is shut up, and there is no rain, because they have sinned against Thee; if they pray toward this place, and confess Thy name and turn from their sin, when Thou afflictest them:

"Then hear Thou in heaven, and forgive the sin of Thy servants, and of Thy people, Israel, that Thou teach them the good way wherein they should walk; and give rain upon Thy land, which Thou hast given to Thy people for an inheritance.

"If there be in the land famine, if there be pestilence, blasting, mildew, locusts, or if there be caterpillar; if their enemy besiege them in the land of their cities; whatsoever plague or whatsoever sickness there be:

"Then hear Thou in heaven, Thy dwelling-place, and forgive, and do and give to every man according to his ways, whose heart Thou knowest; for Thou, even Thou, only knowest the hearts of the children of men."

Well may the world wonder; well may the spirit of destruction, which assails the holy, the ancient and the established, falter and grow weary; well may the profane mock, while this great Brotherhood, defying all the enemies of human institutions, advances with time, leaving its frailties behind. Since Greece was the home of those mysteries which have made Eleusis immortal; and Jerusalem the holy repository of those more sublime, supernatural, divine and eternal, our rites and ceremonies have made indelible impressions on the mind of mankind.

Now, in our age of unrest and dissension, we in unity and harmony begin the foundation of a structure, dedicated to principles of amity and faith, everlasting in their nature, and in their origin ante-dating all modern institutions. Before the pyramids were built; before architecture and sculpture had crowned with their trophies the Acropolis of Athens; before the wolf-nursed twins had marked the earliest limits of imperial Rome; whilst Druidical rites were celebrated in the oaken groves of Britain, and the primeval inhabitants roamed over this undiscovered western word, Masonry existed, and taught its perpetual lessons of virtue, charity and fraternity.

With what austere assuredness Freemasons contemplate their history! With what unfaltering faith they foreknow their future! Science, in her explorations now, at Ninevah and Jerusalem, is revealing cumulative testimony, covered by the incrustations of ages, in corroboration of our Masonic teachings. Science is thus to Masonic truth a resurrection. The stone which time rolled over her sepulchre, to seal it, has crumbled into dust, and she reclaims her immortality.

Thus, brethren, we close the labors of to-day. Let the ceremonies we have performed serve to revive in us that faith, which our Order professes. Let us renew here, at the foundation of our temple, our devotion to the principles which bind the Brotherhood together. May our children's children, in the generations to come, as our fathers did in the generations that have passed, proclaim with triumphant praise, "In strength we establish our house!" Let us learn Masonic wisdom from the ages. Voiceful it calls from off the mountains, rising rugged and hoary out of the deepening darkness of the past till its echoes resound from the impenetrable vastness of the future. Let us listen, that we may understand what is comprehensible in the present. It is thus God uttereth speech and showeth knowledge.

The Assaults by Missouri Templars on the A. and A. Rite Refuted.

From the N. Y. Courier.

The following calm, dignified, and entirely Masonic extract, which we make from the report of the Committee on Foreign Correspondence of the Grand Commandery of Maine, is from the pen of M. E. Comp. Sir Knt. Josiah H. Drummond, 33°, and is in reply to ill-timed and unfounded assaults which have been made by M. E. Comp. Sir Knt. Geo. Frank Gouley, G. Commander of Templars in Missouri, both in his official capacity and in the columns of the Freemason. That we have regretted the course which one with so fair prospects of Masonic distinction possessed pursued, as did Sir Knt. Gouley, our columns have already given evidence of; and we do not now hesitate to say that, while the sentiments so well expressed by so eminent a Freemason as Sir Knt. Drummond will be found to be in entire accord with all we have written on the subject, less than two months will prove them to be those of the Knights Templar of the United States, as they have been and are now organized. We bespeak a careful perusal:

"MISSOURI.—Annual conclave Oct. 7, 1867; four subordinates represented; three charters granted; revised statutes adopted; a form of drill prescribed, and much local business transacted.

"This grand body, during its recess of eighteen months, had been severely afflicted. The cholera swept away in a few days the G. Captain General, the G. Recorder (the lamented O'Sullivan), a P. G. Generalissimo, and the G. Standard Bearer; and afterwards a P. D. G. Commander fell with his knightly armor on. We unite with Missouri in her lamentation. Her loss is a sad blow to the Order, wherever dispersed.

"We regret to find in the address of the G. Commander an attack upon the Scottish Rite. We more regret (and the regret is mingled with the utmost surprise) the spirit displayed in the attack and the manner in which the matter is discussed. In a Masonic discussion there should never be a strife for victory for victory's sake, or for the mere glory or notoriety of the advocate.

"The discussion commenced in a controversy with Bro. Albert Pike, the G. Commander of the Scottish Rite of the southern jurisdiction. With that controvery we have nothing to do; in it we shall take no part. If G. Commander Gouley had confined himself to his alleged improper designs of Bro. Pike, instead of attacking the rite itself, we should have no occasion for remark. In view of the relations of the writer hereof to the Scottish Rite, it is a matter of delicacy for him to discuss this matter; but as his silence would be construed into acquiescence, he can not do otherwise than notice it in the same manner he would if he was not a Mason of the Scottish Rite.

"One of the grounds of his attack is that the legends of the Scottish Rite are not accurately and historically true! His argument in this respect reminds us of that of a poor, ignorant disbeliever in the New Testament: 'The Parables,' said he, 'are not half of them true; such things never happened; more than half of them are made up of whole cloth.'

"To make the matter more ridiculous, if possible, Sir Knt. Gouley, in the same connection, seriously assumes that the present Masonic Order of the Temple, as practiced in this country, is the same as the old military Order of the Temple, and that we are the continuation of that order! As a legend, from which very impressive lessons are derived, this assumption is proper; but to go outside of the asylum and assert it as a historical fact, requires a greater amount of assurance than we supposed any intelligent Sir Knight possesses!

"In his zeal to make up a case, or his lack of knowledge upon the subject, he makes assertions in direct conflict with the facts. In 1761, Francken established a body of the Scottish Rite in Albany, in which the same ritual is now used as was used by Francken more than a hundred years ago. He says, however, 'it (the Scottish Rite) was manufactured in Charleston about 1803.'

"Again he says: 'The assertion that any portion of the York Rite, from the Entered Apprentice to the Order of the Temple, is taken from such a modern concern as the so-called "A. and A. S. Rite," is really too preposterous to demand intelligent discussion, and we will waste no time or space here to consider it.'

"And yet Sir Knt. Alfred Creigh, of Pennsylvania, has shown that the 'Order of the Red Cross' was taken bodily from the Scottish Rite, by Webb, 'about 1803.' Of Sir Knt. Creigh's discussion, Sir Knt. Gouley says: 'With Sir Knt. Creigh, we do not think that the degree of Red Cross should ever have been attached to the Order of the Temple.'

"Sir Knt. Creigh shows that our present system of Orders of Knighthood was arranged by Webb and his associates, and he therefore claims that the present system should be discarded, and the English system, which, he says, is the more ancient and lineal descendant of the ancient military order, should be adopted. In this country, before Webb's time, there had been no governing and supreme body. Webb (as Dr. Creigh says) manufactured our ritual, arranged the system, and organized a governing body.

"The degrees of the Scottish Rite existed long ago, and in their consolidation, and in the organization of a governing body, there was less of change and invention than was used by Webb and his associates in organizing our American system of knighthood.

"But the origin of Sir Knt. Gouley's troubles seems to be in the alleged discovery that in the Scottish Rite some of the signs, words, &c., &c., of the orders of knigthood are also used. We confess, after most earnest effort to view this matter seriously, we are unable to do so. He does not pretend that they are given as the signs, &c., of the orders of knighthood. The principle underlying this objection (if there is any principle) is that the words, &c., used in the ceremonies, &c., of the Order can not properly be used by Masons under any other circumstances! Sir Knt. Gouley completely ignores the distinction between the general use of a word and the peculiar Masonic use of that word. To reveal a countersign is one of the gravest military offenses; but the use of the word in ordinary conversation, or in any other way which does not indicate the peculiar use made of it, we never knew to be the violation of any law.

"But he says that the Knights of Kadosh also claim to be Knights Templar, and do not recognize the American Knights Templar as Templars. Does the Master Mason Masonically recognize the Templar as a Mason? Does the Master Mason have any Masonic knowledge even that persons not Masons may not be and are not Templars? Of course neither a Knight Templar nor a Knight of Kadosh can Masonically recognize the other as being a Knight Templar, or even a Mason. And there is no more inconsistency in the same person being a Knight Templar and a Knight of Kadosh than there is in his being a Mason of any other two degrees or rites. He holds that there is a mortal antagonism between the two rites, and yet he induced his grand commandery to pass a resolution, the effect of which was intended to be to limit the conferring of the consistory degrees upon Knights Templar only, and in the presence of Knights Templar only!

"But we can devote but little further space to this discussion. It is very remarkable that Sir Knt. Gouley has at this late day discovered the evil tendencies and designs of the Scottish Rite and its enmity to Templar Masonry. The Grand Master of the Grand Encampent of the U. S. is a 'thirty-third'; two-thirds, (if not more) of his predecessors were; two-thirds of the officers and members of the Grand Encampment, at its last session, were Masons of the Scottish Rite. The G. Commanders of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts &c., Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Wisconsin, and many other States, belong to the same rite. In Connecticut, every member of the rite is a Knight Templar. The G. Commander of Pennsylvania is at the head of the consistory, and is in the frequent habit of conferring (not communicating) the degrees. Sir Knt. Carter, the head of the consistory of Connecticut, has often conferred these degrees in the presence of clergymen and laymen. Sir Knt. Carson, of Ohio, has confered these degrees, probably, more frequently than any other person in the United States. We might mention many others, but we name these as illustrations. None of these have ever discovered any of the evils Sir Knt. Gouley THINKS HE has; and yet they have been as well acquainted with Templarism as he is, and more, infinitely more, with the Scottish Rite than he is, as he himself substantially admits.

"Our own Dunlap—'Clarum et venerabile nomen,'—the devoted Mason, the zealous knight, the true Christian in practice as well as by profession, was the second officer of the Supreme Council at the time of his death, and had often assisted in conferring the degrees. His example and name are, to us in Maine, a sufficient answer to any charges that any rite in which he took a deep interest is antagonistic to Templarism or hostile to Masonry or the Christian religion.

"We desire also to add our own testimony, as one not unfamiliar with the rituals and principles of knighthood, or of the Scottish Rite as practiced in the northern jurisdiction of the United States, that there is nothing in either to prevent the two rites being the closest allies of each other.

"We have already expressed our regrets at the manner in which our Missouri frater has conducted the discussion. In this respect he seems to be very unfortunate. We know him to be an earnest knight and Mason, and that he would scorn to do anything knowingly for mere personal or selfish ends. Yet his whole discussion would inevitably lead one not acquainted with him to believe that he is one of those demagogues in Masonry who, for the sake of notoriety, would undertake to attack any cause, however sacred, or maintain any position, however ridiculous. We trust that more reflection will convince him that this Quixotic undertaking should be abandoned, and, instead of using his eminent abilities in an effort to divide Masonry against itself, will direct his blows against the common enemy."

So Say We.

Nearly twenty-three years ago, on a chilly evening in the autumn, we rode out to Mt. Pleasant, a few miles from this city, to attend a meeting of McMakin Lodge. The candidate for the evening was E. T. CARSON, 33°, who has since become one of the most prominent Craftsmen—active and influential in whatever he undertakes—we have among us. He was a young man, tall, spare, erect, with a keen observant eye, and apparently anxious to learn whatever might be learned and was worth knowing. We assisted in the duties of the lodge, and formed the personal acquaintance of the candidate.

The next week he called at our office, subscribed for the Review (which he has continued to do annually ever since), and made some inquiries about Masonic books. There were few to be had at that day, but he purchased a copy of every old and of every new one, relating to Masonry, he could meet with. Finding some in the German, and also in the French, he mastered both languages, without a teacher, that he might be able to read them. Active and successful in business, he rapidly acquired wealth, and spent money freely in the indulgence of his literary tastes. His private library is now the finest in the city, and in it may be found the choicest copies of the best writers, ancient and modern, gathered without regard to cost, from Europe and America. His Masonic library is by far the best collection of Masonic books and manuscripts in this country, if not the world. His collection of manuscripts in French and German is very extensive, and he has obtained them at great cost.

Bro. Carson has taken all the degrees in the York Rite, as also in the A. and A. Rite. He was the first Master of Kilwinning Lodge of this city, and had previously served as Master in Cynthia Lodge. He was never a technical worker, contending for mere verbal accuracy. He looks to the spirit and intent of the ritualistic ceremonies, rather than to the mere phraseology; and his official duties have met with the warm approval of the members of his lodge. He has now resigned to younger hands the active duties of the lodge-room, but is regular in attendance, and takes a deep interest in the business and prosperity of his lodge.

In 1853 the A. and A. Rite was introduced here, and Bro. Carson was one of the original members He had thoroughly examined its claims to recognition, and became one of its warmest advocates. He procured everything that had been written in relation to that rite, and was satisfied that it was genuine. Of late years he has devoted a great deal of his attention in that direction, and is the presiding officer in the Grand Consistory of Ohio, and Deputy Inspector of the Supreme Council, 33°, for Ohio. He is 46 years of age, in the maturity of his strength; and we hope will yet have many years of usefulness and enjoyment.

We have not room for farther detail. Bro. Carson is a genuine Mason, and is more thoroughly informed in the general history, doctrines, usages, and peculiarities of Masonry than almost any one we know. He is a genial companion, of a generous nature, gives liberally where giving is proper, a firm and reliable friend, and one who honors Masonry and illustrates in his life the divine precepts he learns at its altar. He is now in Europe, with his family, for the restoration of his daughter's health, but in a few months his numerous friends expect to give him a cordial welcome to his home again.—Review.

First Half Century of Masonry in Ohio.

On the first Monday of January 1808—fifty years ago—a convention of Free and Accepted Masons of the State of Ohio—twelve representatives from six subordinate lodges—assembled at the old court-house in Chillicothe, when, on motion of Lewis Cass, then a delegate from Amity Lodge No. 105, Zanesville, it was resolved, "That it is expedient to form a Grand Lodge in this State."

On the 7th of January grand officers were elected; the distinguished Rufus Putnam, who attended American Union Lodge at Roxbury, Mass., where General Washington was present, and who had been one of the most useful of Revolutionary officers, was elected first Grand Master.

The convention closed on the 8th of January.

Gov. Huntington succeeded the venerable Putnam, who declined service on account of his advanced years. Lewis Cass was Grand Master for three years, during which time Judge Jacob Burnet, of Cincinnati, was Dep. G. Master. For ten years the annual meetings were held at Chillicothe, where the seat of government of the State continued to be.

In 1818 the grand lodge as well as the general assembly was held in the borough of Columbus.

Chester Griswold was re-elected Grand Master, and Lincoln Goodale, the proprietor of the Goodale House of Columbus, was elected Grand Treasurer, which office he held down to 1837. He looks as hearty and appears as active now as twenty-five years ago. It was in the room of the Goodale House, now occupied as the reception room, that the grand lodge first assembled in the new capital.

The Grand Masters of the grand lodge have been, Hon. Lewis Cass, 1810, Washington City; Chester Griswold, 1818, Virginia; Thomas Corwin, 1828, Lebanon; Wm. Fielding, 1830, Sidney; Charles Anthony, 1832, Springfield; Timothy Baker, 1833, Norwalk; Wm. J. Reese, 1834, Lancaster; Wm. B. Thrall, 1843, Columbus; Wm. B. Hubbard, 1850, Columbus; Lucius V. Bierce, 1853, Akron; Wm. B. Dodds, 1854, Cincinnati; Benj. F. Smith, 1856, Minnesota; present Grand Master, Horace M. Stokes, 1857, Lebanon.

The Order in the State is numerous, healthy and prospering. The number of working lodges is 260; the number of members, 11,000, only two other grand lodges of the United States exceeding that of Ohio in their membership, and none perhaps in their worth. It is well to put on record a reminiscence of those good old days. —Cincinnati Gazette.

Dedicated to Anti-Masons.

Strawberry Hill Lodge No. 946.—The installation meeting of this lodge was held on the 8th April, at Twickenham, when Bro. H. J. Smith was installed as W. M. At the banquet, after the usual loyal toasts were proposed and drunk, came one of the most pleasant episodes at which a brother can assist, viz.: the public recognition of a brother's services, who has nobly done his duty as a Freemason, a friend, and a man.

On the table, covered with a cloth, was placed an elegantly illuminated testimonial, framed and glazed, a silver cup, weighing eighteen ounces, with rural scenes and animals in bold relief, under a glass shade, and two exquisite brooches, set in gold; all of which had been subscribed for by brethren and others, for presentation to Bro. Bendy, Mrs. Bendy, and her sister, Mrs. Beasley.

The cup bore the following inscription:

"Presented to Bro. Thomas Bendy, in open lodge, by the brethren of Strawberry Hill Lodge No. 946, as a small tribute of admiration for his truly Masonic conduct towards the late Bro. John Gurton, his deceased wife, and surviving family; and to mark the esteem in which the brethren of his own and other lodges hold him.

"April 8th, 1868."

The testimonial, adorned with various Masonic emblems, and effectively colored, was as follows:

"'He that loveth his brother abideth in the light.'—John i., 2, 10.

"This testimonial, accompanied by a silver tankard, was presented by the brethren of the Strawberry Hill Lodge No. 946, to Bro. Thomas Bendy, as a mark of their esteem and admiration for his disinterested and fraternal good works, on behalf of the lamented Bro. John Gurton, founder of the lodge, his late widow, and surviving children. In this 'tribute to excellence,' the lodge would be not only unjust, but ungrateful, not to record its appreciation of the delicacy, tact, unremitting attention, and uniform kindness with which Mrs. Bendy and her sister, Mrs. Beasley, ministered to Bro. John Gurton, his wife, and family, whilst under Bro. Bendy's roof; and the lodge trusts those ladies will accept its warmest thanks and profound respect for the many kind and alleviating offices they rendered, and which none but women know so well how to discharge. May every blessing, both here and hereafter, rest on such true examples of 'worth and real merit.'

"Signed—on behalf of the lodge, April 8, 1868.
"William Smeed, W. M.
"Henry James Smith, W. M. elect.
"Edward Hopgood, J. W.
"Matthew John Stedwell, P. M. and Treas.
"William Platt, P. M. Hon. Sec."

The W. M., after prefacing his remarks by stating that however imperfectly he might perform the pleasing duty that fell to his lot, he was not prepared to delegate its performance to any one else however talented, called Bro. Bendy forward, and told him that from his great kindness in receiving their late Bro. Gurton, his deceased wife, and surviving family into his house, when Bro. Gurton's misfortunes deprived him of a home; from the care with which he had supported him through a painful illness which terminated in his death, by the manner in which he had succored Mrs. Gurton, and was then providing for the youngest of the family, he had won the gratitude, love, and respect of the lodge and of all true brethren. The W. M. next said that it was not to be supposed they could sit by quietly and see such fraternal acts done without, in some slight manner, testifying their warmest approval. Knowing that they could never repay Bro. Bendy—nor was their offering intended in any such manner—but, simply, as a tangible and enduring memorial of their warmest appreciation; he begged Bro. Bendy to accept the testimonial and cup before him, and that Mrs. Bendy and Mrs. Beasley would also accept the brooches, all of which the lodge kindly trusted would be welcome to him and the ladies, not for their intrinsic value, which was but small, but as an earnest pledge that the members held his generosity in great respect, and considered Mrs. Bendy and her sister as good Freemasons at heart as Bro. Bendy himself. With the best wishes for all three he had the pleasure to ask Bro. Bendy's acceptance of their present, feeling assured that not only here, on earth, but in the Grand Lodge above, his Masonic virtues would be justly appreciated. The W. M. then called upon all to drink "The health of Bro. Bendy, Mrs. Bendy, and her sister." The toast was enthusiastically received.

Bro. Bendy (who on rising was greeted with repeated rounds of applause), was quite unprepared to find such a handsome acknowledgment for having done what he considered to be his Masonic duty. Bro. Gurton was a stranger to him until he (Bro. Bendy) went to Twickenham. Then he first knew him and liked him, but because he liked a brother he did not think himself deserving of such tribute. Well, then, he supposed he had done something very wonderful, and was asked to accept of what they were pleased to call a small present of little value. If, however, they thought so, he did not. It might be, as far as money went, of comparatively small value, but for himself and wife, with her sister, they did not need money, but they must ever look upon and regard the gifts as invaluable and beyond the power of money to purchase. For their kindness and in the name of his wife and Mrs. Beasley, he thanked them deeply, and could assure them the presents given to them that day would be sacred in their eyes as long as they should live, and when they were gone, they would, he hoped, fall into other hands who would cherish and venerate them as he and his would do.

At this stage of the proceedings Bro. Bendy brought in Bro. John Gurton's youngest child, Robert Gurton, born on that day five years, the day upon which the lodge was consecrated; and Bro. Platt, Hon. Sec., stated they had founded what would be called the "Strawberry Hill Gurton Fund," for the purpose of making some provision for the child in after life, Bro. Bendy having undertaken the care of him until he is of age to be got into some school, and Bro. Bendy was also willing to apply any sums of money entrusted to him for the little "Strawberry Hill" boy, and had most handsomely headed the list with his own twenty pounds.

Bro. Platt said the amount they had collected was more than forty guineas, and he hoped they would be able to increase it from time to time.

Bro. George States, in the most creditable manner and without a single word, put a five-pound note into the child's hand, and it can not be doubted but that, as time goes on, a very handsome sum will be realized for the benefit of "the child of the lodge," who has no one else to look to but his kindly self-constituted guardians, Mr. and Mrs. Bendy, and the brethren of the lodge.—Freemason's Mag. (London.)

EXTRACTS

From an Address delivered by R. W. John Potter, Deputy Grand Master of Montana, at Helena, June 24, 1868.

In tracing the history of Freemasonry, we find its application two-fold, carrying within its broad scope a science based upon an operative art, and equally as applicable to a speculative science for the protection of both physical and moral dependencies. As an operative art it relates to the construction of material edifices, and commences with the first rude shelter made to shield the human family from the inclemency of the weather, and is called architecture. This is based upon geometry, and is the art from which Masonry derived its language of symbols or symbolic instructions. Ages elapsed before wisdom of design combined strength of material with beauty of execution. The first habitations of mankind were grottoes and caves. Virgil says that before Troy and Pergamean citadels existed, men dwelt in bottoms or valleys; some of these early cavern dwellings exist at Ispica, in Sicily, and are evidently of remote antiquity, and constructed by people in the rudest state of nature. Gallio, son of Calus, first invented mud buildings, conceiving the idea from the construction of a martin's nest. Plutarch mentions houses made of framework and mud. Before the invention of brick houses by Euryalus and Hiperbius, caves were used. The flat roofs of private buildings distinguished them from the public edifices; all the houses at Pompeii received light only from the doors. The only two-story house anciently known was found at Pompeii. The stories consisted in arches over each other. The roofs of houses were first made flat. The Greeks first gave them a small elevation in the center. The Romans increased it to the fifth of a span. The Germans and other northern nations made the roof of an equilateral triangle. Thus briefly alluding to the rude state of operative Masonry at its commencement, that we may more fully appreciate its rapid advancement when the combined action of inventive genius rose like the morning sun, and shed new and increasing light upon the art. Fresh lustre was constantly imparted to genius by science, until the orders of architecture were presented to the admiring world in the strength and beauty of the present proud era.

Space or time can not be spared here to trace the graduated scale of improvement in art, from its commencement up to its triumphant climax. A brief notice of some of the styles of architecture may not be uninteresting.

The Cyclopean style, from its extraordinary magnitude, is ascribed to the early Cyclop's men, who from their power are believed to have been the Giants and Titans of the version of Isaiah, and whose deceased monarchs subsequently became the sovereign gods of Greece and Rome. The general character of the Cyclopean style was immense block. Cyclopean masonry was not confined to Greece. Specimens are found at Saturnia in Italy. There are splendid remains of Cyclopean religious architecture at Salsett, Elephanta, Canora, and Illoura. They are caverns cut out in the body of a rocky hill and shaped into courts, supported by parts of the rock formed into columns with cushion-like capitals. The sides are filled with base reliefs so prominent that they are joined to the rocks only by the back. Many of these figures are collossal. The Cyclop's worship fire, Vulcan, and the sun.

Egyptian architecture astonishes us by its massive grandeur. It consists of massive blocks, thick columns, walls narrowing upward with immense impending cornices, but no pediments of roofs, because it seldom rains there. The earliest Egyptian columns were patterned after a stock or lotus topped by its calex. The lotus was the ornament that reigned everywhere.

All the ornaments in Egyptian architecture are heavy and afford no repose to the eye. The Egyptians worshiped every divinity but the graces. Everything was upon a grand scale, dedicated only to gods and kings. Hence their buildings exhibited forests of columns, large moles with colossal statues in front of them, obelisks, gateways, preceded by avenues and detached from the moles which flanked them. A short distance from the sublime Porte at Constantinople, stands the ancient christian church, built by Justiniar, and since the Mahometan conquest, used as an imperial mosque. It abounds in curiosities. Its length is 269 and its breadth 243 feet. Six of its pillars are of green Jasper, from the temple of Diana, at Ephesus, and eight of porphyry, from the Temple of the Sun, at Rome.

The Vatican at Rome is a magnificent structure, and is said to contain 7,000 rooms. It is advantageously situated on an eminence on one of the seven hills on which ancient Rome was built. The parts that are most admired are the grand staircase, the Pope's apartments, and above all, the Vatican library, and so beautiful a fabric that it is said it will admit of no improvement, and also the richest in the world, both in printed books, and manuscripts.

To fully trace the triumphant career of operative Masonry, from its infancy to the present state of beauty, strength, perfection, sublimity, and grandeur, would require the combined powers of the classic world, and would exhaust every fountain of imagination in the ethereal regions of romance.

Its vastness is beyond the power of human intellect. We can only wonder and admire, but never realize, its stupendous greatness, its gigantic dimensions, its boundless extent, its all-pervading power. Its monuments of triumph are spread over the four quarters of the globe. Its march is still upward and onward. We may look, see, and write upon its triumphant achievements, its magic wonders, its untiring perseverance, its burning zeal and its magnificent exploits, but can never measure its vast extent. Upon this bright picture every Mason must gaze with raptures of delight. It is faintly drawn, a mere outline of the reality, but these faint outlines or delineations are truthful, and are intended to quicken the Masonic pulsation of every brother, and impart to him fresh life and new vigor in the glorious cause we profess to honor. May our noble art still repose on the pure bosom of genius and continue to be the nursling of science, and may the moral lessons drawn from the working tools of operative Masonry enable us, as speculative Masons, to rear a super-structure that shall reach from earth to the Celestial Lodge above, composed of living stones duly fitted and prepared for that building not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

We may say of our glorious art as Virgil did of Fame:

> "Soon grows the pigmy to gigantic size—
> Her feet on earth, her forehead in the skies."

The origin of speculative Masonry, says the learned Dr. Oliver, was coeval with the creation of our globe, and that the mysteries of idolatry was subsequently founded on similar principles for the purpose of giving unity and strength to the false worship which, but for this, it would never have acquired. These mysteries he called spurious Freemasonry, and believes the legends and truths which were transmitted pure through the race of Seth, was altered and corrupted by that of Cain, and that much confusion arose in consequence of the frequent intercommunication of these two races before the deluge, the faithful still adhering to the truth. Of these were Noah, who out of all these deviations was enabled to distinguish truth from falsehood, and transmitted the former in a direct line through Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Joshua, the Elders, Prophets, and the wise men to Solomon. But Ham, adhering to the corrupt system of Cain, formed the institution know as spurious Freemasonry. This theory is approved by most Masonic writers. That eminent scholar, Bro. Albert G. Mackey, supposes that spurious Freemasonry descended through the Gymnosophists of India to Egypt and thence into Greece, and perhaps by a different route to Scandinavia and the northern nations of Europe. Among all these, it appeared in the form of initiations and mysteries whose legends bore just so much of the remains of truth as to evince their divine origin, and yet so much of falsehood as to demonstrate their human corruptions, that in after times there was a communication between one branch of spurious Freemasonry and the true system, that this took place at the Temple of Solomon, between the Jewish Masons and the Dyonysian Artificers, where true Freemasonry borrowed its present organization from the greater practical wisdom of the Dyonysian without surrendering any of its truth. The bond of this union between the two bodies was a widow's son, and by birth a Tyrean, who was a member of both systems, of the true system by birth from Jewish parents, of the spurious, by profession and residence as an artificer of Tyre.

From the building of the temple of Solomon to the time of Queen Anne of England, in 1702, speculative Masonry depended mostly upon operative Masonry, for its advancement. Up to that time, few except practical architects and mechanics and those men of great eminence were admitted into Masonic lodges. Their associations existed in Rome during the reign of the emperors, and ultimately spread over the continent of Europe. The priests of the Christian churches became their patrons, and devoted themselves to building churches and monasteries. They filled the continent with cathedrals, churches, and monasteries, and with a large accession to their numbers passed over into England, and there introduced their peculiar style of building. From thence they passed into Scotland, and have rendered their existence ever memorable by establishing in the parish of Kilwinning, where they erected an abbey, the gem of Scottish Freemasonry.

The cathedral of Strasburg on the Rhine, is one of the noblest specimens of Gothic architecture of the time; it contains a clock showing the motions of the constellations, the revolution of the sun and moon, the days of the week, the hours, minutes, and seconds of the day. The Fraternity at Strasburg became so celebrated, that their superiority was acknowledged by their kindred associates throughout Germany. Preston believed these traveling Masons entered Britain previous to the Roman invasion, as stupendous architectural structures still in existence, seem to indicate this fact. When Christianity was introduced, Masonry went hand in hand with her in promulgating and advancing the glorious cause. In 557, St. Austin, with forty of his co-workers, came into England, who propagated the principles of Christianity with so much zeal that all the kings of the heptarchy were converted. St. Austin then became the patron of Masons, who immediately introduced the Gothic style of architecture.

Austin appeared at the head of the Fraternity in founding the old cathedral of Canterbury, in 600, St. Pauls, at London, 604, and St. Peters, at Westminister, in 605. After these and others were complete, Masonry lost much of its interest and languished until 858. In 872, Alfred the Great came into power and brought Masonry into full and healthy action. From this time to the reign of Anne, in 1702, Masonry had its sunshine and its storms.

The first notice we have of Freemasonry in the United States, is in 1729, in which year, during the Grand Mastership of the Duke of Norfolk, Mr. Daniel Cox was appointed provincial Grand Master of the province of New Jersey. On the 29th of July, 1733, St. John's Lodge was opened at Boston, under a charter granted by Lord Viscount Mountacute, Grand Master of England, dated 30th of April, of that year. The R. W. Henry Price was appointed Grand Master in North America. The first charter granted by this body was to "St. John's Lodge in Boston," which continues to live and flourish. The next year a charter was granted for the organization of a lodge in Philadelphia, of which the renowned and illustrious Benjamin Franklin was the first Master. Solomon's Lodge No. 1, was organized at Charleston, S. C., in 1735, under a warrant from Lord Mountacute, then Grand Master of Masons of England. Three other lodges were soon after organized. On the 30th of March, 1754, the Marquis Carnavon, Grand Master of England, issued his warrant constituting a provincial Grand Lodge in the province, and appointed Chief Justice Leigh Provincial Grand Master. On the 24th of December, of the same year, the Grand Lodge was duly organized at Charleston. In 1787, a grand lodge of "Ancient York Masons" was also established at the same place. These two grand lodges maintained an antagonistic position until December, 1817, when they united, and a "Grand Lodge of Ancient Freemasons" was amicably organized. The Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania was established in 1764; that of North Carolina, in 1771; that of Virginia, in 1778; and that of New York, in 1781. After our independence was achieved, our Masonic allegiance was withdrawn from England and Scotland, but not our fraternal relations. We affectionately cherish their memory as the founders of Freemasonry in our beloved country, now blessed with grand lodges in every State of the Union and most of the Territories, Montana being the last one organized.

And here let us pause and briefly review the organization and progress of Masonry in Montana. In the year 1862, a sufficient number of Masons then residing at Grasshopper, and what is now known as Bannack, joined in a petition for the purpose of organizing and holding a lodge of Freemasons at that place, and that good man and zealous Mason, Bro. N. P. Langford was chosen the first Master. The year following, authority was obtained from the Grand Master of the State of Kansas, to organize a lodge at Virginia City; Bro. Paris S. Pfouts was recommended as Master. In 1864, permission was obtained to open a lodge at the same place, from the Grand Master of Colorado, and that learned and zealous Mason, Bro. Hezekiah L. Hosmer, was appointed Master. In 1865, authority was obtained from the same grand lodge jurisdiction, to form a lodge at Helena, and Bro. Cornelius Hedges, the father of Masonry in this city, was honored with the office of first Master. In the fall of that year, the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of Montana was organized, and Bro. John J. Hull, to whom Masonry in this Territory is largely indebted, too, was elected first Grand Master. Since that time other lodges have been formed, until at the present time we have, together with the blue lodges, two chapters, two councils, and a commandery of Knights Templar; making in all thirteen distinct and separate bodies of Freemasons. The enterprise for which the Institution of Masonry has ever been characterized, has to some degree been exhibited by the Fraternity in Montana, in erecting monuments, of architectural beauty, strength, and elegance combined. Among the many I will mention the temple at Virginia City, which for durability, workmanship, and magnificence, will compare favorably with the eastern world, and will be a monument of fitting legacy to bequeath to succeeding generations who shall come after us, to occupy the places and positions we now fill.

Hear what the immortal Washington says on the subject of Masonry, in answer to a complimentary address, when President of the United States, from the officers and members of King David's Lodge in Rhode Island. He said: "Being pursuaded that a just application of the principles on which the Masonic Fraternity is founded must be promotive of virtue and public prosperity, I shall always be happy to advance the interests of the Society, and to be considered by them a worthy brother." In 1762 the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts dedicated to him its Book of Constitutions, and, in replying to the communication of the fact, he still more distinctly announces his favorable opinion of Freemasonry in the following sentences: "Flattering as it may be to the human mind, and truly honorable as it is, to receive from our fellow-citizens testimonies of approbation for exertion to promote the public welfare, it is not less pleasing to know that the milder virtues of the heart are highly respected, by a society whose liberal principles are founded on the immutable laws of truth and justice. To enlarge the sphere of social happiness is worthy of the beautiful designs of a Masonic Institution, and it is most fervently to be wished that the conduct of every member of the Fraternity, as well as those publications that discover the principles which actuate them, may tend to convince mankind that the grand object of Masonry is to promote the happiness of the human race." Again, in reply to a letter written by the Grand Lodge of Maryland, on the occasion of presenting him with a copy of the constitutions of Masonry. It is dated 8th of November, 1798, only thirteen months before his death. "Gentlemen and brothers, your obliging and affectionate letter, together with a copy of the constitution of Masonry, has been put in my hands by your Grand Master, for which I pray you accept my thanks. So far as I am acquainted with the principles and doctrines of Freemasonry, I conceive them to be founded in benevolence, and to be exercised only for the good of mankind; I can not therefore draw my approbation from it." Washington was made a Mason at Fredericksburg, Va., on the 4th of November, 1752, and was Master of a lodge when he died.

Lafayette was made a Mason during the winter of 1777, at Camp Lodge of Washington, at Morristown, N. J. During his visit to this country in 1825, by special invitation, he visited Lafayette Lodge No. 81, in Cincinnati, and in response to the congratulatory address of the Worshipful Master, among many other things, he said: "To find a splendid and populous city in a place which, when I last quitted your shores, was exclusively the haunts of wild beasts and savages, presents a fact not less astonishing than it is pleasing to me, as one of the asserters of your independence. These emotions are much enhanced by meeting, in such a place, so many respectable members of that Order, whose leading star is philanthropy, and whose principles inculcate an unceasing devotion to the cause of virtue and morality."

In the Freemason s Quarterly Review for March, 1845, the following circumstance is recorded by Bro. Glen, a member of Phœnix Lodge, Sunderland, England. He was mate of a merchant vessel, with a valuable cargo bound to Cuba. When within three days sail of the destined port, a suspicious looking schooner was seen in their wake, under full press of canvass, and soon brought them to. They were boarded by twenty-five ferocious looking Spaniards, fully armed. A defenceless crew of only nine men were powerless. The pirate Captain could speak no English; his second officer but little. Being disappointed in the amount of specie on board, the pirates plundered the vessel of such articles as they fancied, when the one who spoke broken English, informed Bro. Glen, with the most awful imprecations, that himself, the Captain, and the crew, together with the vessel, should be committed to the flames. The Captain and Bro. Glen were tied to the pillars in the cabin, and the hands bound and secured in the forward part of the vessel. Tar barrels, gunpowder, and other combustibles were brought from the schooner and placed upon the fated vessel. The slow train was laid; the cries of the crew for mercy were unheeded. A horrid death seemed inevitable. The last prayer and the last silent farewell to loved ones was already upon their quivering lips. At this awful moment of heartrending agony, when the purple current was rushing back upon the aching heart, the Lieutenant again entered the cabin. On looking upon the Captain, the Masonic sign of distress met his astonished gaze. He had been made a Mason during his halcyon days, and pirate as he was, bowed submissively to the magic power of Masonry over the human mind—the latent spark of humanity was kindled to a flame, he interceded with the Captain for mercy; the officers and crew were released. Before leaving, the pirate left a note in Spanish on the table, which, being translated, read as follows: "Brother, having recognized you as a Mason, I have induced the Captain to spare your lives—but for this you would have all perished."

This is but one among the many instances which could be cited to prove the power of Masonry over the human heart.

In the month of December, 1812, during the war between England and France, the sloop Three Friends, Captain James Campbell, trading from Limerick, Ireland, was captured by the French privateer Juliett, commanded by Captain Louis Marencourt; Masonic greetings were exchanged between the two commanders, when Captain Marencourt immediately restored the ship and cargo, and released his prisoners. Thousands of similar instances have occurred. On the battle-fields of the American Revolution, of 1812, and with Mexico, the talismanic power of Masonry saved many from instant death. On his return from the Mexican campaign, General Quitman remarked, in a responsive speech at Charleston, that he had but a faint conception of the power of Masonry over the mind and passions of man, before he saw it demonstrated on the battle-fields of Mexico.

These are but striking evidences of its universal language. The orb of day in each revolving hour, reflects its refulgent light on the home of a Mason. As it leaves the ancient shores of Asia, India, Persia, and Turkey, it sheds its genial rays upon millions of the sons of light in Europe, Africa, and America. From east to west, from north to south, over the broad expanse of the inhabitable globe, the light of Masonry has been diffused. The lessons of brotherly love, relief, and truth, have reached the western wilderness, and the red man of the forest has shared in the mysteries of this universal, imperishable science, which alone could tame his ferocity and divest him of his native rudeness. Yet it meets with opposition, and is strongly combatted with. It is a secret society and admits none but its members. Secret societies have existed in every age and country. Churches do this—theological conventions do this—all institutions from the State Senate to the Senate of the United States, sometimes sit with closed doors. Every discreet and prudent family is a secret association of the most inviolable and sacred character. During the early ages of the church, its meetings were more secret than those of Masons at the present time.

The widow and orphan have knelt beside the sacred altar, and offered up their silent prayers, for the relief, sympathy, and assistance they have received from our charities; the weary pilgrim in a foreign land has bowed around the same altar, and renewed his devotions to the Great I Am for assistance at our hands. Masonry has no pride, no pomp, no ostentatious display. The monarch and the peasant meet alike upon the same level—act upon the same principle—worship at the same shrine—and acknowledge the same God. How ennobling, and yet how unassuming! Need we dwell longer upon the beautiful and impressive lessons which Freemasonry inculcates. Well has it been defined to be the science of morality veiled in allegory, and illustrated by symbols. A language so universal that Hindoo, Pagan, Turk, and Arab comprehend at once, must be conclusive of great results, and tend to elevate and enlighten the human mind. Its beautiful symbolisms are wisely planned to adorn and elevate the minds of men, and bring them forth to range in the large fields of matter and space, and teach us our duty to God and to man. It curbs ambition, moderates anger, encourages good dispositions,

"Which nothing earthly gives or can destroy,
The soul's calm sunshine, and the heartfelt joy."

It venerates the arts and sciences, and at one epoch of the world's history, was in possession of all the knowledge then in existence. Observation of the wondrous and marvelous works of nature, inspired men to search out its great truths—and being bounteously supplied with reason, he has made many important discoveries in truth and knowledge, and advanced the human family to a higher state of morality and happiness. To exhaust the various subjects of which Masonry treats, would transcend the brightest power of human intellect—it can only be understood by thorough investigation and deep research, and is a subject worthy of thought and consideration.

And now, my brethren, I have done, and if you have discovered but one idea in this oration that will benefit the human race, then I am well repaid.

May our noble Institution continue to flourish, and may prosperity attend the worthy Craftsman in all his labors; and when our labors on earth are complete, may they be such that they will stand the test of the Grand Master's square, and we can say of our temple as did our ancient brethren—

Bright was the hour when Israel's Princes in their Pride and power, knelt in her temple's
Court. The living flame, the accepted
Sacrifice to all proclaimed—brightly
The splendors of the God-Head shone
In awful glory, from his living throne.
Then bowed was every brow—no human
Power could brave the splendors of that flood
Of light—that veiled his presence—and
His awful form—whose path the whirlwind
Is—whose breath the storm.

THE MASONIC TROWEL,

IS PUBLISHED BY THE FIFTEENTH OF EVERY MONTH, BY

H. G. REYNOLDS & SON.

One copy, one year..$1 25

We will hereafter publish regular lists of our agents, so that the brethren may always know who are authorized to receive money for us for The Trowel.

The place of birth, age, name, time and place of death, and membership of deceased brethren, are solicited. Resolutions are declined.

We are responsible for our agents, and none others, but favors will be gratefully received from all who may send us subscribers, orders, or work.

Notice.—Remittances by Express and Registered Letters at our risk. Parties sending us money by mail must assume the risk.

So many letters have come to us from brethren entitled to credit and respect, requesting us to notice the doings, letters, and movements of one who has been in high Masonic position, and was the originator and chief patron of a fraud and innovation which convulsed the Grand Lodge of Illinois, and which has long since received righteous condemnation, that we are compelled to say a few words, not in self-vindication or defense, but as the shortest way of disposing of an unpleasant subject.

We do know that a very large majority of those who entered into the organization above alluded to, regret all connection with it, and when the matter was settled, as a peace measure, we resolved to let the chief and his adherents alone, as long as they let the Illinois jurisdiction alone. To this we have steadily adhered.

But it is said that the measure is revived, and that steps are now taking, by direct and indirect means, to get control of the Grand Lodge, and change its long-established work. That some have disobeyed, some have evaded, and some have protestingly conformed to Grand Lodge requirements, we do know, but all this, in comparison with the whole, is local and small.

Our means of information are quite as good as those of any one else, and we have no tangible evidence that any combination has been formed to re-instate or establish the individual above alluded to in power. We believe that he desires it, but that few or none desire him as a leader.

One letter says to us that great efforts are making to induce the belief that what was charged upon him is untrue. In answer, we aver that every word was true, and more, as we can show by documentary evidence both written and printed, over his written signatures now in our possession, from his commencement to the end. If that matter is pressed they will be published.

We are told that an organization is formed to place certain parties in power, and change our work, and that overtures have been made to certain brethren who have been regarded loyal to Grand Lodge authority, to co-operate and share in the offices. The same brethren have been toyed with before, and were true to the Grand Lodge, because it was their interest to be so. If they allow themselves to be cajoled now, they are bigger fools than we think they are, and deserve to be effectually sold out, as they will be.

Again, we are told that this measure is to be effected by means of discontents, rites, and factions. This is true, but will be unavailing. The Grand Lodge of Illinois is firm.

We are asked to notice the letters written from abroad by the person whose name needs no mention. We have no words to say. The occupation is legitimate, and those who employ and patronize him and his squire must judge for themselves. We have an opinion, but shall keep it to ourselves unless circumstances demand an expression.

This we know. The honest, upright, true-hearted Masons in Illinois, without regard to former differences, parties, or opinions, are determined that the judgment and fiat of the Grand Lodge in October, 1862, shall stand, and that the work so ably taught by Breth. Wade, Chamberlin, and Prickett shall be unchanged. Any movement to the contrary will be regarded as an unprincipled and factious declaration of hostilities, and all concerned in it will be consigned to contempt.

The attempt of any rites in this country, and especially in Illinois, to obtain possession of symbolic Masonry, will meet the fate of Judas. The Grand Lodge of Illinois will maintain its own dignity, and take care of its own honor.

Affiliation will be prohibited with any body of Masons which does not recognize expulsion or suspension by a lodge of Masons, anywhere, as an expulsion or suspension from all the rights and privileges of Masonry, of high or low degree, rite, or dignity.

Let the lodges see to it that they are represented, and that, too, by their ablest men. Let the stalwart sons of labor and toil who preside in the east, west, and south of our lodges, be in their places in Grand Lodge, and the same Providence which has presided over us so long, and brought us to such glory, will not allow us to be covered with shame, but will crown our honest efforts with abundant success. We despise the class of men who will barter their principles for pottage or silver. They will soon go to their "own place."

Congregationalism.

President Blanchard is the leader of the anti-Masonic movement, and is ambitious to be the exponent of orthodox Congregationalism.

We call his attention to a Congregational church in Chicago, where, out of two hundred voting members, from 125 to 150 are Freemasons. One of its members made a beautiful address at the open air meeting in Springfield, Sunday, August 9.

We also remember very well the dying remarks of Michael J. Noyes, when he called the members of the church to his bedside, with the lodge members, and told them that his hope was in Christ, and that there was no disagreement between Masonry and religion. So, too, the young and gifted A. K. Sawyer, of Bunker Hill, said, a few weeks ago, that he was ready. These are and were Congregationalists. More of this for Bro. Blanchard.

The Humboldt Medical Archives, is the title of a monthly journal of medical sciences, edited by A. Hammer, M. D., and J. C. Whitehill, M. D., and published by Levison & Blythe, 107, 109, and 111 Olive street, St. Louis, at $3.00 a year. The work is of the usual magazine form and size, and sixty pages per month. Both of the editors are connected with Humboldt Medical College, and we presume, so far as we are able to judge, being neither a physician nor surgeon, that the work is a meritorious one, and worthy of a generous support.

A Chicago Visitor.

We were very glad, last week, to greet Sir T. T. Gurney, of the house of Underwood & Co., General Commission Merchants, 168 Washington St., Chicago. Our brother was formerly W. M. of Cleveland Lodge No. 211, and is the present Commander of Apollo Commandery K. T. Lately he was grain inspector for the city, but is now dealing in produce as a business. He reports that extensive preparations are making for the visit to St. Louis, and expects to lead from 150 to 200 knights in full costume. Wines are no longer used in Apollo; let the example so wisely set by the leading commandery in the West be universally imitated.

Corner-Stone Visit.

The State House Commissioners have invited Grand Master Gorin to lay the corner-stone of the new State-House on the first Monday in October. Many of the arrangements are necessarily in the hands of the architect, J. C. Cochrane, Esq., of Oriental Lodge, Chicago, from whom, with his assistant, Bro. W. D. Clark, we received a pleasant call a few days since, to consult upon the proper programme, etc.

General Grand Chapter.

On page 123 is a notice that the General Grand Chapter will meet September 8. It will meet on September 15. Our error arose from observing the constitution as published, not as it was amended.

Removal.

As will be seen by their advertisement on the last page, Messrs. Pollard & Leighton, of Boston, have changed their place of business from No. 6 Court Street, to No. 104 Tremont street, corner of Bromfield.

Lodge Returns.

The returns and dues of Nos. 152, 157, 193, 197, and 382, and returns from Nos. 352, 521, and 558, have been received.

From Brooklyn, N. Y.

Brooklyn, N. Y., July 27, 1868.

Bro. H. G. Reynolds, Editor Trowel, Springfield:

I take the liberty of saying to you how glad I felt as I read your article, in The Trowel of 15th ult., on anti-Masonry—glad at the tone in which it was written, denouncing the thing itself as opposition to that which is good, and yet using no harsh words in reference to the men in whom this opposition is developed. For I imagine that the President Blanchard whose name you mention is not at heart a bad man; on the contrary, one who in his earlier years, under some influence unknown perhaps by himself, has been warped and biased into a train of thinking which has grown with his growth, until it has led him to his present position, from which all that he sees of Masonry being seen through a distorted medium, he can not possibly form a correct judgment of it, or appreciate it at its proper value.

I remember having heard a story of a truckman who, being too poor to buy fodder for his horse, resorted to the expedient of furnishing him with a pair of green goggles, and turning him loose near a carpenter's shop, whereupon the horse devoured the shavings with avidity, under the impression that they were "green grass;" I have also read the confession of a celebrated preacher of the truth, in which he speaks of a time when he "verily thought he ought to do many things contrary" to that religion of which he afterward became so famous an expositor; and is it to be supposed that the apostle was the only man in the world's history whose opinions were erroneous, or that the truckman's horse was the only nag that ever wore colored goggles? The light which broke upon the vision of St. Paul, and the scales which fell from his eyes, we have all read of; and of the horse it is related that, having by accident dissolved the connection between himself and the deceiving lens, he ever after refused to be cajoled by the knavery of his avaricious master. Let us hope that President Blanchard will yet be equally fortunate, and equally wise.

I notice that Dr. Finney, of Oberlin, is giving, in the columns of the Independent, his views of Masonry, and the editor generously offers to give the Fraternity room for a reply (when the Dr. has finished his essays), through some one who may fairly be considered a representative of the Institution. For various reasons, I trust that no one will be found ready to enter the lists with the Dr. If he has a notion for a tilt at a windmill, let him indulge himself to his heart's content. If the windmill can not stand it, so much the worse for the windmill. But the great fact remains, that all that is visible of Masonry to Dr. Finney and President Blanchard, is open and uncovered to the rest of the world, and the day has passed away (in this country) when doctors and priests lead the multitude unthinkingly into the grooves and channels of their creeds and theories. They may, by a vicious system of education, have been led into a routine which cramps the intellect and clips the wings of free thought; but the common sense of the American people has been subjected to no such restraining process, nor can it be. "By their fruits ye shall know them," is as true to-day as when the words fell from the lips of Him who spake as never man spake; and by its fruits Masonry will be judged. If they are good, the verdict of common sense will be that the tree on which they grow is good; and all the anti-Masonic prating of sacrilegious oaths and midnight orgies, etc., ad infinitum, will be only as lasting as the early cloud and the morning dew, and as effective as the moonbeam on the rock. If, on the other hand, the fruit of Masonry is bad—if its effects upon a man as a citizen, as a husband, father, brother, son, or friend, are bad—the world will know it, and all who love goodness and truth will frown upon it, and it will go down—as it ought—amid the execrations of the friends of humanity.

Will it go down? Are there any symptoms of decline—any indications of its fall? We answer such queries with a triumphant negative. Whether it professes the antiquity which its ardent friends claim for it, or is our Institution of more recent origin, are questions not worthy of consideration here. We know it as a society which has lived for centuries, and we who know its interior more fully and intimately than anti-Masons know its exterior, predict for it an existence which shall cease only when nature ceases, and for the principles on which it rests as a foundation-stone, a continuance throughout the boundless ages of eternity. We build our faith upon the idea that it is a good institution—that it made our fathers better men than they would have been without it—that it is a blessing to the present generation—and that its fruits will continue to refresh and benefit mankind to the remotest periods of time. Let it be our business to perpetuate what we have received, and, without making innovations in the body of Masonry, to extend and enlarge, as much as in us lies, its sphere of usefulness.

And let anti-Masons write and preach and denounce as to them seems good: every thing has its uses; and if their preaching shall lead one honest inquirer to seek and find the light, their labors will not have been utterly in vain.

Yours, fraternally,

J. W. P.

Letter From Honduras.

We give below a very interesting letter from Bro. E. F. Hatch, containing a very fine description of Belize, a British colony in the southeast part of Honduras, on the south side of the Gulf of Mexico. As all those countries will sooner or later become a part of the United States, this article will be specially interesting to our readers:

"TROPIC HOME,"
BRITISH HONDURAS, July 20, 1868.

Messrs. H. G. Reynolds & Son, Springfield, Ill.:

DEAR SIRS AND BRETH.—As a few lines from a foreign land may prove of interest to some of the many readers of your valuable paper, I avail myself of this opportunity to send you this

SKETCH OF BRITISH HONDURAS.

As you are aware, it is located in Central America, between 16 and 19 degrees north latitude, and bounded on the north and west by Yucatan, on the east by the Carribean Sea, on the south and west by Gautemala. It is about 900 miles from New Orleans and 700 from Havana. Its area is about 200 miles frontage on the sea, and from 25 to 65 miles in width.

It is a colony of Great Britain; has a Lieutenant Governor, appointed by the Crown, and a House of Assembly, which, with the Judiciary, form the government. Belize, the principal town, and situated on the Bay of Honduras, is the capital of the country, as there reside the Lieutenant Governor, custom-house and other government officials. It is located at the mouth of Belize River, and contains about 7,000 inhabitants, two Episcopal, two Baptist, one Presbyterian, one Methodist, and one Catholic church.

The surface of the country is varied. North of Belize River, which divides the colony equally, it is generally level, with good drainage, but not subject to overflow. South of the Belize the surface is more diversified in character, with mountains, valleys, and plains. There are sixteen rivers coursing through the colony from west to east, a number of which are navigable for light-draught steamers, and of all, the water is pure and sweet.

The seasons are divided into wet and dry, the wet season lasting from early in June to the last of February, the heaviest rains usually falling in September, October, and November; the dry season lasting during March, April, and May. The climate is mild and salubrious, the thermometer ranging from 65 to 90 degrees ("Fah."), though it seldom reaches either extreme. From 7 to 9 A. M. is usually the most oppressive part of the day, a good breeze usually rising from 9 to 10 A. M., making it pleasant the rest of the day. The nights are cool and pleasant.

Of the soil, as a country, I can not speak too highly; any kind almost may be had—low, flat, dark, and rich, or high, rolling, chocolate lands, but all being strong and good. The growth of the country furnishes sufficient proof of the fertility of the soil. Logwood, rosewood, mahogany, pine, cedar, fustick, India rubber, cocoa-nut, and many species of the palm, together with many other varieties of tropical growth, being found very numerous and of good size.

The productions of the country are sugar cane, which rattoons from 15 to 20 years without cultivation, yielding from one and a half to three tons of sugar to the acre; rice, yielding two crops a year, on high or low land; corn, two crops a year; tobacco, coffee, allspice, chocolate, ginger, arrow-root, henniken plant, sweet potatoes, yams, yampas, plantains, bananas, pineapples, oranges, lemons, limes, citron, cassava, bread fruit, and a great variety of tropical fruits unknown in the United States. The usual time for planting the crops is at the commencement of the wet season, though most of the productions of the country may be planted at any time during the wet season.

The health of the country may truly be said to be most excellent. As a proof of it, I would state that there are but few physicians in the country; I suppose twelve or fifteen will include them all. There seems to be nothing to cause sickness, the atmosphere and water being pure and refreshing. The natives all look healthy, and the Americans here all fatten and appear to enjoy most excellent health. The population is about 30,000, of which only some 1,200 or 1,500 are whites; by far the larger part of the population are blacks, descendants of the Africans, and Carib and Mosquito Indians, and some Spaniards. I think the Caribs, as a people, do not like the Americans, but the Spaniards are better disposed; both may be had as laborers, but of the two, I think the latter preferable. Neither of them more than earn the ration issued them (which is four pounds of pork and seven quarts of flour per week), to say nothing of their wages, which are from $7 to $8 per month. Custom has established the working-hours of the day from 6 to 9 A. M. and from 10 A. M. to 4 P. M.; but they all prefer to be tasked. They can certainly work slower when working the regular work-hours of the day, and faster when tasked, than any people I ever saw.

The Assembly, during its recent session, passed a bill to encourage foreign emigrants as laborers. Coolies may be had for a term of three or five years, and some are soon to be imported for service on one of the large sugar farms in the country. There is some game to be found in the country. We have the American tapir, or mountain cow it is called here; deer, antelope, tiger cats, warree and peccavy (both species of the hog), babboons, armadillos, monkeys, wild turkeys, partridges (a bird here as large as a chicken hen), curasoe (a bird nearly the size of a turkey), toucan, or bill bird, macaws, parrots, paroquites, &c. Poultry thrive here, and fish are very abundant. There are but few snakes in the country, but the most that are found are very large. The waller, as it is called here, is a large snake and a species of the boa constrictor; the rattlesnake is here, but is seldom ever seen. The two former are venomous, as well as the tomagoff, of which there are two or more species. Tarantulas and centipedes are but seldom met with. House flies are very scarce, but we have an abundance of substitutes in the sand-flies, bottle-flies, doctor-flies, and mosquitoes, though these flies, &c., only prevail at times. We have an abundance of ants, the we-we, a red ant—there are both large and small of this species; they are sometimes very destructive to vegetables. The army or marching ant—a black ant; they march usually from 20 to 70 abreast, making a clean road as they go from 3 to 8 inches wide. Should your house be in their line of march they will go into and through every part of it, and destroy every bug and insect of every description. You can not manage them in any way, so when they come in your house you had better move out; they will hurt nothing but bugs and such vermin, and will not remain longer than two or three hours. There are some other species of ants, but they are not troublesome. We have one consolation living here—that all the flies and ants may be gotten rid of, most of them simply by clearing off the lands.

Messrs. Young, Toledo & Co., are large land owners in this country, owning upwards of 2,000,000 acres. They are having their lands surveyed, and are offering them to emigrants at from $1.25 to $1.50 per acre. There are already a number of settlements in the country, the largest being here, between the Moho and Rio Grande Rivers, others located on Lake Mannatee, Belize River, Middle River, and South Stann Creek.

Emigrants coming into the country are allowed to bring in one year's supply of provisions and their goods and effects free from duty. The proper way to come is through New Orleans.

The steamer "Trade Wind" leaves that city on the fourth Wednesday in each month, bringing the mails and all passengers and freight for Belize. I should think December, January, and February the best time to come, and all parties coming had better bring with them at least one year's supply of provisions and all their household effects and conveniences, as they can not be readily obtained here. Let none come but those who are able to hire their work done, or are able and willing to do it themselves. I think an industrious man here can be entirely independent, and on the road to a fine fortune, in a few years.

Very respectfully and Fraternally yours, &c.,

E. FRANK HATCH.

Camp Douglas, U. T., July 14, 1868.

Editor Trowel:

Your readers are doubtless aware that Salt Lake City is the headquarters and residence of the officials of the church of Jesus Christ of latter-day saints. It can truthfully be called a model city. It is situated in a beautiful, fertile valley, watered by the river Jordan, a stream which empties into the Great Salt Lake.

Salt Lake Valley is closed in by two ranges of mountains about twenty-five miles apart, the summits of which are continually covered with snow. The soil is very productive, yielding all the common necessaries of life. However, the farmers have to resort to irrigation as a means of watering their lands. The climate is delightful, very little sickness prevailing at any time during the year.

Salt Lake City is said to contain about eighteen thousand inhabitants, four thousand of whom are Gentiles.

The principal buildings are the city hall, court-house, theater, and tabernacle. The tabernacle is an immense structure, but recently completed, and is capable of comfortably seating about 5,000 persons. In this building the people assemble every Sabbath, for the purpose of listening to discourses from Brigham Young and other dignitaries of the Mormon church. The Salt Lake theater is considered as being second to none west of the Missouri River.

The saints have recently suffered a great loss in the death of President Heber C. Kimball, who died June 22, 1868. In consequence of his death, business was suspended for a time, flags were displayed at half-mast, and the principal buildings were draped in mourning.

The Masonic Order is represented in the city by two lodges—Wasatch and Mt. Moriah—both of which are in a flourishing condition, occupying a hall on Main street, in conjunction with a lodge of the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows.

Camp Douglas, a military post, is situated about three miles east of the city, on an elevation of seven hundred feet, at the base of a range of mountains which completely shuts in the valley on the east side. It was built in 1863, by the California and Nevada volunteers under Gen. Connor, and occupied by them until July, 1866, when they were relieved by four companies of the 18th U. S. Infantry, under command of brevet Lieut. Col. W. H. Lewis, Major 18th U. S. Infantry (now 36th Infantry).

Camp Douglas contains quarters sufficient for the accommodation of twelve companies, and is at present occupied by companies C, G, and K, of the 36th Infantry.

Having promised to make my letters short, I will conclude for the present.

The New Postal Law.

This law, as adopted by both houses of Congress, is an important measure in twenty sections. It provides for the return of all letters on which the name of the sender is endorsed, if not called for in thirty days; returns the fees on money orders; doubles the compensation of postmasters for the payment of money orders; allows weekly newspapers sent to regular subscribers in the county where published to be delivered free of postage from the postoffice nearest the place of publication; authorizes the issue of duplicate money orders for such as have been lost; makes it felony to counterfeit money orders; authorizes the Postmaster General to appoint a route agent, with a salary of $1,000, on the line from San Francisco to Japan, and another, with the same salary, on the line from San Francisco to Honolulu; directs him to establish at a reasonable compensation a general postal agency at Shanghai, with branch agencies at other posts in said country; gives him power to create in his own department a foreign mail service bureau, at a yearly expense of $8,000; gives him another chief of division at a salary of $2,500; makes it a felony of a high character to use postage stamps a second time, knowingly; declares it shall be unlawful to circulate through the postoffice any letters or circulars advertising lotteries or gift enterprises of any kind on any pretext whatever; establishes a blank agency in the Postoffice Department, at an expense of nine thousand five hundred dollars annually, and abolishes all other blank agencies; empowers the Postmaster General to negotiate and conclude an international money order arrangement; provides that the sureties on bonds of defaulting postmasters shall not be liable unless the government institutes suit within three years after the final settlement of accounts; allows certified copies of postmasters' returns to be used as evidence in court in criminal prosecutions; authorizes the Postmaster General to prescribe a uniform for letter-carriers, and makes it a misdemeanor for anyone else to wear the same.

General Grand Chapter.

The triennial meeting of the General Grand Chapter, M. E. John L. Lewis Gen. Grand High Priest, will be held at St. Louis, on Tuesday, the 8th day of September next. It is expected that a large representation will be present from every portion of the Union, and perhaps from its subordinates in South America, Italy, and other foreign parts.

Dedication in St. Louis.

Office Grand Secretary
Grand Lodge of Missouri, A., F. & A. M.,
St. Louis, August 1, 1868.

To the M. W. Grand Master of the M. W. Grand Lodge of Illinois, A., F. and A. Masons:

Wm. E. Dunscomb, Esq., the M. W. Grand Master of Masons of Missouri, sends to you his compliments, greeting, and takes pleasure in announcing that, on Wednesday, the 14th day of October next, he designs dedicating the new "Freemason's Hall" of St. Louis, at which time and place the M. W. Grand Lodge of Missouri will be assembled.

Furthermore, he desires herewith to extend to you, and through you to the R. W. elective grand officers of your grand jurisdiction, a most fraternal invitation to be present on that occasion and assist in the ceremonies.

It will be his pleasure to hear from you previous to that date.

By order of the Grand Master.

Attest: Geo. Frank Gouley,
Grand Secretary.

The Evergreen--Mr. Lincoln.

We had missed the familiar and welcome face of the Evergreen for some time, but were greeted with a sight of the June and July numbers, August 1. They were very kindly discussed, without adjournment. In answer to a query in the July number in regard to Mr. Lincoln, we would state: About 1838 or 9, Mr. Lincoln and James H. Matheny concluded to "join the Masons;" Matheny did, and has been Deputy Grand Master, and standing Orator ever since.

Before starting for Washington, the matter was broached by Judge Dubois and Grand Master Buck. He declined then, upon the ground that his motives would be liable to misconstruction. Much conversation was had between him and the present Grand Master French, and he was somewhat inclined to petition, but did not. He was friendly to the Institution.

Fires.

We learn that our brethren at Monmouth have suffered the loss of the property and fittings in the interior of their hall, said to be one of the finest out of Chicago. What the loss is, we are unable to learn, only that it is discouragingly heavy.

From Bro. Trevett, Secretary of the lodge at Champaign, we learn that their records have been burned; how much greater their loss may be we are not informed.

Gift Enterprises.

Bement, Piatt Co., Ill., July 24, 1868.

Dear Sir and Bro.—You will please publish the within "card," as it is of great importance to the "Craft," and more particularly to myself. It will explain itself, and then the brethren can draw their own conclusion.

Fraternally yours,
Ed. Weinstein.

To the Brethren of the "Mystic Tie," Greeting:

No doubt some of you have seen my name on paper before, and therefore do I publish this card explanatory of the same.

Some weeks ago Mr. D. Turnbolt, the proprietor of the hotel at Pana, came to me and requested me to take charge of the few remaining tickets unsold (I suppose 10,000 or 12,000), and distribute them through the State to the best advantage, at the same giving to me a guaranty that all should be conducted honorably and fair. I accepted the proposition, and immediately, as some of you are well aware, sent them strictly to the Secretaries of the A., F. and A. M., and Secretaries of the I. O. O. F., but I am sure, by a careful perusal of the letter accompanying the certificates, you can not surely make a lodge matter out of the same. Some Secretaries returned the certificates with insulting, sarcastic utterances, while some more calm, and coolly studying the import of the letter, did not carry the letter and tickets into the lodge, but merely, and in fact as was intended, either accepted the agency of the same or refused. Now, I will explain why I did send the certificates in the manner here set forth.

Because I did not know any certain individual in every town or city in the State or out of it. Therefore, by sending to the Secretaries and asking them (not the lodge), to assist in selling them, I was certain that I should either receive a reply or the tickets, as I am responsible for every one of them. Now, brethren, I ask you in the name of the Great Jehovah, am I responsible to the lodge? because I wish to appoint an agent and that agent their Secretary? Another thing I vouched to them, that the drawing should be done fair and square. Why? because I would not deliver to the association one dollar of the money received from my agents until I was thoroughly convinced the thing was square. And now, to close, my brethren, let me tell you, one and all, that, as the drawing did not come off on the day mentioned, I will return to you, one and all, your money for tickets you purchased in the scheme. If my agents have sold you tickets make them refund the same, as I have written to them, and will by the 29th return what few dollars I received from them. As I vouched in the Alpha, I so close by vouching I have Masonically kept my word in Omega.

Fraternally,
E. Weinstein.

We are glad to know that Congress has made it a penal offense to circulate gift enterprise and lottery tickets through the mails.—Ed. Trowel.

Impostors.

At a regular convocation of Topeka Chapter No. 5, on the 18th day of May, A. D. 1865, the following preamble and resolution were, on motion of Comp. H. S. Greeno, adopted:

Whereas, one Julius Hermon, of this city, has imposed upon this chapter by passing himself as a R. A. Mason in good standing; and,

Whereas, it having been satisfactorily ascertained that said Julius Hermon is an impostor, and by his conduct has forfeited the respect and confidence of all good Masons; therefore be it

Resolved, That the said Julius Hermon be considered and treated as an impostor by all Royal Arch Masons within this jurisdiction, and that the Secretary be instructed to furnish a copy of these resolutions to each chapter in this State, the Secretary of the Grand Chapter, and the Masonic Trowel, with a request on behalf of this chapter that the same be published.

M. H. Case, Sec.

Pana, Ill., July 16, 1868.

H. G. Reynolds, G. Sec. A., F. and A. M., Springfield, Ill.:

Dear Sir and Bro.—Inclosed please find a letter which I received in answer to an inquiry which I made regarding one Charles E. St. Clair, who was here last June, and, proving himself to be a Mason pretty well posted, and representing himself in destitute circumstances, obtained money from our lodge, Pana Lodge No. 226. The inclosed letter is the first and only knowledge I have of him since he was here; that you can read for yourself. In justice to the Fraternity, it is my desire that you publish him through The Masonic Trowel, requesting your exchanges to do the same. You can judge for yourself of the nature of the case and act accordingly

Fraternally yours,
W. H. Topping, Sec.

Cato Lodge No. 141, F. & A. M.,
Cato, July 6, 1868.

W. H. Topping, Sec., &c.:

Dear Sir and Bro.—I have received several letters from the western States of the same import as yours. There is not now and never was such a man as Charles E. St. Clair belonging to this lodge. He is an impostor, and this lodge can not be responsible for his impositions on other lodges. The last I heard of him was from a lodge in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, from which he had gouged $5.00. I wish you would communicate with your Grand Master as to this case. I would do so myself if I knew his address, &c. It may save some other lodge from being swindled.

Yours, fraternally,
James D. Benton, Sec.

TRIENNIAL CONCLAVE

OF THE

GRAND ENCAMPMENT K. T.,

OF THE

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

At St. Louis, on Tuesday, the 15th day of September next.

From the St. Louis Times.

The Order of Knights Templar, which is now attracting considerable attention in the West, on account of their triennial meeting in this city in September next, is several hundred years old, and has ranked among its members the brightest chivalry of the world.

As its history is comparatively unknown among our citizens, we propose to give a brief outline of the order, that they may the better appreciate the assembly to be held in September.

The order originated among those heroic spirits who volunteered to rescue the sepulcher from the Moslem power. They derived their name from being the guardians of the temple, and have been known in different centuries by various titles, such as "Knights of St. John of Jerusalem," "Knights Hospitalers," "Knights of Malta," &c., according to their locality and services. In 1099 they captured Jerusalem, and from that period for over one hundred years they fought such battles and performed such deeds of valor as astonished the civilized world, and were never before equaled and have never since been surpassed.

Under the Popes and Peter the Hermit, the Christian sentiment of all Europe was aroused in the struggle, until the plains of Asia trembled beneath the tread of millions of Templars during that fearful struggle. The fierce hordes of Arabian warriors, the sterile nature of the line of march, and the burning suns of Palestine, decimated their legions and bleached the sandy deserts with the bones of the bravest men who ever set a lance or drew a sword.

They failed to completely hold the city of Jerusalem and the country around, but succeeded in establishing such a treaty as has secured to posterity a free travel to the sacred city. When the long contest was over, the knights who returned to their homes rebuilt their consistories and asylums, and established their commanderies, wherein to keep alive the proud spirit of chivalry and Christian knighthood.

Ambitious monarchs and prelates now became their enemies, and combined to confiscate their vast estates, and destroy the order. They succeeded in the former purpose to a great extent; but in the latter they failed, notwithstanding they burnt the Grand Master, De Molay, at the stake, as well as destroying other chief officers. The commanderies still maintained surreptitiously their existence until a brighter day of civilization dawned in Europe.

From this order sprung that noble spirit of chivalry which elevated woman to her proper sphere, defended virtue, and stood like a wall of steel around helpless innocence.

Within its asylums gathered the good and the great, carving upon its rolls the noblest titled names of Europe.

In our republican country, where all titles are dispensed with, the asylums are open to all Royal Arch Masons capable of passing a unanimous ballot.

The following are the present officers of the Grand Encampment of the United States, elected at the last meeting in Columbus, Ohio, September, 1865:

M. E. Sir Henry L. Palmer, of Wisconsin, Grand Master.
V. E. Sir Wm. S. Gardner, of Massachusetts, Dep. G. Master.
V. E Sir John Q. A. Fellows, of Louisiana, G. Gen.
V. E. Sir Kent Jarvis, of Ohio, G. C. G.
V. E. Sir Geo. W. Belt, of Missouri, S. G. W.
V. E. Sir Henry C. Ranney, of Illinois, J. G. W.
V. E. Sir John W. Simons, of New York, G. Treas.
V. E. Sir John D. Caldwell, of Ohio, G. Rec.
V. E. Sir W. C. Munger, of Kentucky, G. St. B.
V. E. Sir E. L. Stevens, of District of Columbia, G. Sw. B.
V. E. Sir G. W. Prescott, of Minnesota, G. W.

The successors of the above officers will be elected in September.

The following is the list of officers of the Grand Commandery of Missouri:

R. E. Geo. Frank Gouley, G. Com.
V. E. Lewis V. Weimer, D. C. G.
E. James F. Aglar, G. G.
E. James Carr, G. C. G.
E. Rev. P. M. Pickard, G. P.
E. —— Hardwick, S. G. W.
E. B. F. Newhouse, J. G. W.
E. Wm. N. Loker, G. T.
E. A. B. M. Thompson, G. R.
E. R. B. Graht, G. S. B.
E. W. Bosbyshell, G. S. B.
E. Wm. H. Stone, G. W.

The following is the general committee of arrangements to act in conjunction with those appointed by other jurisdictions to make arrangements for the general assembly in September:

St. Louis Commandery No. 1, Sir Wm. H. Stone; Weston Commandery No. 2, Sir James M. Burnes; Hugh de Payens Commandery No. 4, Sir Lewis F. Weimer, D. G. C.; Ivanhoe Commandery No. 8, Sir Wm. K. Spinney; Belt Commandery U. D., Sir Geo. W. Belt, P. G. C.; Excalibar Commandery No. 5, Sir James Carr, G. C. G.; Liberty Commandery No. 6, Sir Samuel Hardwick, P. G. C. G.; Emanuel Commandery No. 7, Sir Jno. D. Vincil, P. G. P.; Lexington Commandery U. D., Sir John E. Ryland; Kansas City Commandery U. D., Sir Joel J. Morris. At large, R. E. Sir Thomas M. Wanhall, P. G. C. Grand Generalissimo, E. Sir James F. Aglar, chairman of the committee.

We understand that quite extensive arrangements are being made by the Knights Templar all over the country to attend the grand convention to be held in this city. The Apollo Commandery, of Chicago, have already engaged 150 rooms at the Southern Hotel for their use, and intend to leave Chicago with the Chicago Light Guard Band on a special train via the Chicago, Alton & St. Louis Railroad. It is also the intention of all the Templars in the northwestern States to concentrate at Chicago, arriving here in a body. The Chicago & Alton and Illinois Central and Terre Haute & St. Louis Railroads have agreed to carry them, on that occasion, to and from St. Louis at half fare. In addition to the commanderies already mentioned, the general committee have received advices that the commanderies from the following places have signified their intention of being here: Providence, R. I.; Lowell, Mass.; Cincinnati, Louisville, Memphis, Keokuk, Quincy, Springfield, and Richmond, Va.

This will undoubtedly be the largest assemblage of the Knights Templar ever held in this country, and our citizens should feel highly gratified that so large and influential a body of men as compose this order should decide to hold their triennial meeting here. We take pleasure in publishing the following circular, and we hope our merchants and business men will respond liberally when called upon by the members of the committee, and that the Board of Trade and Merchants' Exchange will also take hold of it and see that the visitors are well entertained on that occasion:

Office of Grand Commandery
Knights Templar of Missouri,
St. Louis, July 31, 1868.

At a meeting of the general committee of arrangements, for the reception and entertainment of the Knights Templar of the United States, held this day, the following Sir Knights were appointed on the committee to solicit subscriptions to defray the expense of the same:

Merchants' Committee.—Thos. Richeson, E. G. Obear, P. G. Gerhart, L. Bierman, Benj. A. Dozier, Wilbur F. Tuttle, J. C. Bloomfield, W. K. Spinney, John D. Daggett, J. B. Maude, Norman J. Coleman, Henry M. Rhodus, A. J. Dreas, John Antrim, J. Frank Parsons, Martin Collins.

Hotel Committee.—W. H. Stone, Isaac M. Mason, W. W. Ehninger, Wm. Bosbyshell, C. H. Thorn, C. M. Caswell.

Knights Templar Committee.—Jas. O. Alter, J. H. Tolman, W. P. Mellen, W. N. Loker, L. Bierman, J. H. McLaren, R. H. Huzza, L. H. Garnett.

We feel proud of Apollo—our original Templar home. The following circular, from the oldest commandery in the West, speaks for itself:

Asylum of Apollo Commandery No. 1,
Knights Templar,
Chicago, July 28, A. D. 1868, A. O. 750.

Sir Knight—At a stated conclave of Apollo Commandery No. 1, K. T., Tuesday, July 21st inst., by resolution, the commandery tendered to the Right Eminent Grand Commander of the State of Illinois, Sir Vincent Lumbard Hurlbut, an escort to St. Louis on the occasion of the Triennial Conclave of the Grand Encampment Knights Templar of the United States, to be held at St. Louis, Mo., on the third Tuesday—being the 15th day of September, next.

The Right Eminent Grand Commander of the State of Illinois acknowledged and accepted the courtesy extended to him, leaving the details of arrangements with Apollo Commandery, for transportation and accommodation of the Sir Knights intending to unite in the proposed journey to St. Louis. He has also presented to the commandery for its guidance, a circular from the Grand Commandery of the State of Missouri.

Apollo Commandery appointed a Committee of Arrangements to take such action in the premises as they deem best, to accomplish the object and desire of the commandery, in extending the escort to the Grand Commander.

The committee would therefore state that arrangements have been perfected with the Chicago & St. Louis Railroad, and Pullman's Palace Sleeping Car Co., whereby a special train has been placed at the disposal of the Sir Knights, to and from St. Louis, at half fare. (They would also state to Sir Knights from eastern jurisdictions, intending to visit St. Louis, that arrangements have been made for them to come via Chicago, at the same reduced rate, and it would afford the committee pleasure to have them unite with us here on Monday, September 14th, next). The Grand Master of Knights Templar of the United States—M. E. Sir Henry L. Palmer—escorted by Wisconsin Commandery No. 1, of Milwaukee, arrive here on the morning of that day, uniting with us and leaving that afternoon at five o'clock.

The committee anticipate that many commanderies and individual Sir Knights will take the opportunity afforded them to visit the Triennial Conclave of the Grand Encampment, and it is desired that those intending to unite with us should inform the committee as soon as possible of the probable number from each section, so that suitable arrangements can be made.

Sir William Henry Gale, Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, No. 202 Randolph street, Chicago, to whom all communications should be addressed.

The headquarters of Knights Templar, while in Chicago, will be at the Tremont House, where the committee can be found.

William Henry Gale,
Charles Homan Brower,
Frank Hervey Nichols,
Committee.

And when Wisconsin Commandery appears with its perfect drill, splendid uniform, and complete order, all will admire it, and will say, that the talented Grand Master of Templars and his commandery are worthy of each other.

Jurisprudence.

To the law and the testimony.—Isa. 8, 20.

☞ We shall endeavor to answer questions of a legal character under the laws and usages of this and adjoining States under the head of States; other matter of a judicial character will be given under the head of "General." Our comments on law are not binding as such; those who desire decisions must get them from the Grand Master; we give opinions only. Questions will be omitted, unless they are necessary to elucidate the point at issue. Decisions and opinions will be regularly numbered through the volume, and will not be repeated, but reference will be made to them.

ILLINOIS.

No. 53—The name and style of the Grand Lodge is "The Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Illinois, of Ancient, Free, and Accepted Masons"; a lodge is described as follows: "Worshipful Springfield Lodge No. 4, A. F. & A. M." The Grand Master is addressed "Most Worshipful"; the Deputy, Grand Wardens, Grand Treasurer, and Grand Secretary are addressed "Right Worshipful"; all the appointed officers are styled "Worshipful," except the Grand Tyler.

No. 54.—In the absence of the first four grand officers, the Grand Lodge can be opened by the past or present Master of the oldest lodge represented.

No. 55.—In voting in Grand Lodge, the Grand Master, Deputy, and Past Grand Masters are entitled to one vote each; the Grand Wardens are entitled to one vote, jointly, and all Past Masters (not otherwise entitled to vote) cast one vote only, collectively. Each lodge represented is entitled to three votes; if the Master and both Wardens are present, each one casts one vote; if the Master and a Warden be present, the Master casts two votes and the Warden one; if the Master be absent and both Wardens be present, the S. W. casts two votes and the J. W. one; if but one representative be present, whether Master, Warden, or proxy, he casts three votes.

No. 56.—The proxy stands in the shoes and has the powers of his principal and enjoys all his privileges, and draws his pay, if there be any.

No. 57.—No brother has a right to vacate his seat in Grand Lodge without leave of the Grand Master.

GENERAL.

No. 27.—There is no such a thing as the right of visitation; it is the right of every Mason to ask the privilege of visiting, and it is the inalienable right of any member to refuse it.

Reminiscences of Anti-Masonic Times

BY REV. DR. GIGER.

I am aware that great prejudices have existed in regard to the true character and tendency of the Masonic Order. These prejudices were originated and spread by political demagogues for selfish and ambitious purposes, and many well-disposed persons were thus deceived, and their zeal to destroy Masonry rose above all other subjects of public concern. Strange that intelligent men could have ever persuaded themslves that anti-Masonry had a base broad enough upon which to build up party; that "the manifold interests of a great country, its trade, commerce, and general industry; its finance, its development through the thousand channels of public administration, its party alliances, its ambitious strifes and its multiform pursuits, could all be reduced into subordination to the purpose of extirpating Masonry by political action." The incidents are so well known that we will only briefly allude to them.

The opponents of Andrew Jackson, who was a Royal Arch Mason, found themselves in a dilemma. For Henry Clay, the idol of the Whig party, was a Mason, and, wishing "to be right rather than to be President," would not sacrifice his principles nor violate his solemn obligation. William Wirt was, therefore, selected as the standard bearer. And yet he, in his letter of acceptance, pays a high tribute to the cause so unjustly assailed. Says he: "I was myself initiated into the mysteries of Freemasonry. I never took the Master's degree, but it proceeded from no suspicion on my part that there was anything criminal in the Institution, or anything that placed its members in the slightest degree in collision with their allegiance to their country and its laws. I have thought and repeatedly said that I considered Masonry as having nothing to do with politics, and nothing has surprised me more than to see it blown into consequence in the northern and eastern States as a political engine, and the whole community excited against it." As the day of election drew near, wishing to be relieved from the position into which he had been reluctantly forced, he writes: "To persist in the nomination will only expose their weakness. They can not carry a single State, except, perhaps, one. They can not even organize an electoral ticket to the south of New York, except, perhaps, in Pennsylvania. It will annihilate them, and me too, by the mere force of ridicule." The result of the election proved the truth of his prophecy, for out of 286 electoral votes Gen. Jackson received 219, Mr. Clay 49, Mr. Floyd 11, and Mr. Wirt seven—these seven being the votes of the State of Vermont. Thus the fanatical spirit which enkindled the flame of persecution and spread over the face of one section of our land with the wild fury of a mighty conflagration was quenched. It was short lived, and its few paroxysms in subsequent years were followed by utter dissolution. Like Hudibras' musket, which missed the mark it aimed at,

> "And, though well aimed at duck or plover, > Recoiled and knocked its owner over."

The attempted assassination of Masonry turned out, as with other assassinations, only to confirm her power and to hasten her coming apotheosis. Antæus-like, she reached that point of extreme depression where, by touching the ground, she touched also the giant spring of that power in which she rose and now triumphantly reigns.

Hon. Jacob Collamer, LL. D.

Bro. Collamer was a native of Troy, N. Y.; his father was a soldier in the War for Independence. Our late brother graduated at the university of Vermont, 1810, and was admitted to the bar in St. Albans in 1812.

He was Lieutenant of artillery in the War of 1812, a member of the Vermont Legislature for four terms, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of Vermont, elected nine successive times, for six years a representative in Congress, Postmaster General under President Taylor, Judge of the Supreme Court of Vermont for four terms, and 12 years U. S. Senator. He owed nothing to factitious aids, to fortune or family patronage.

Bro. Collamer was an upright Mason, in all his relations, civil or political, and a sincere Christian; his life was devoted to the cause of truth and justice. He kept himself "unspotted from the world." Senator Foote said, in the Senate of the U. S.:

"No man ever ventured to approach him with the offer of a price for his honor. Jobbers in iniquity came not into his presence. Purity of motive and integrity of purpose, unsullied and unassailed, were alike the law and rule of his life, in public or in private action. All of us who have known him longest and known him best will, with one accord, concede to him the possession, in an eminent degree, of what Cicero commends as the boni Senatoris prudentia—the 'wisdom of a good Senator.'"

Mr. Sumner said: "Mr. President, since Henry Clay [also a brother] left this chamber by the gate of death, no Senator has passed that way crowned with the same honorable years as Mr. Collamer, nor has any Senator passed that way whose departure created such a blank in the public councils, unless we except Mr. Douglas [a brother]."

Senator Harris said: "Judge Collamer was happy in the circumstances of his death. Of him it may be said, as it was of John Quincy Adams, that 'no excesses of a profligate youth, no vices of middle life, had shattered and hurried to a premature dissolution the body in which his incorruptible spirit resided. Nothing in his habits of life interfered with nature, to whose gentle influences it was left to destroy gradually, and to restore in a good old age to its parent dust, the perishable part of our friend. The law of mortality, which knows no exception among the passing generations of our race, was executed in his case with as much tenderness and reserve, so to speak, as is ever permitted by Providence.'"

The following illustrates the Judge's Masonic integrity and incorruptibility:

Soon after receiving his comission as judge, one of the leading railroad corporations in the State sent to him a free pass for a year over their road. This was done undoubtedly as a mere compliment and in no other view. Shortly after receiving it the Judge was holding a term of one of the courts in his judicial district, and almost one of the first cases for trial was a case wherein the same railroad corporation was a party. It was in the forenoon session; the case was called up and commenced; as the Judge said to the writer of this article, 'I felt as though I was sitting there with a bribe in my pocket." Says he, "I adjourned the court early for dinner, went home and enclosed the ticket in an envelope to the company, and deposited it in the postoffice before I again went into court; and that," said he, "was the last and only free pass on any railroad I ever held while on the bench."—National & Freemason.

Book of the Law.—The Holy Bible, which is always spread open upon the altar, during lodge hours, at some important passage, during the continuance of the solemn ministrations of the lodge. In the first degree it is usually unfolded at Ruth ii. 7; in the second degree, at Judges xxii. 6; and in the third degree at 1 Kings vii. 13, 14. These usages, however, are not arbitrary, for we find at different periods during the last century that Genesis xxii. and xxviii. were indifferently used for the first degree; 1 Kings vi. 7, and 2 Chronicles iii. 17, for the second; and Amos x. 25, 26, and 2 Chron. vi. for the third. In the United States, the practice has usually been to open the Bible in the first degree, at Psalm cxxxiii; in the second, at Amos vii.; and in the third, at Ecclesiastes xii.

Arithmetic.—That science which is engaged in considering the properties and powers of numbers, and which, from its manifest necessity in all the operations of weighing, numbering, and measuring, must have had its origin in the remotest ages of the world.

In the lecture of the degree of "Grand Master Architect," the application of this science to Freemasonry is made to consist in its reminding the Mason that he is continually to add to his knowledge, never to subtract anything from the character of his neighbor, to multiply his benevolence to his fellow creatures, and to divide his means with a suffering brother.

Two Grand Masters.

BY GEN. JAMES SHIELDS.

We extract the following sketches of two of the most eminent men of their day, from a recent lecture by Gen. Shields. One of these distinguished men was at one time Grand Master of Masons in Tennessee, and the other held the same position in Kentucky. They were as unlike in political affinities as in their personal peculiarities; but both were equally eminent.

Andrew Jackson was, in my opinion, the most remarkable man, take him all in all, of his time. In personal appearance he was tall, slender, and muscular. There was not an ounce of surplus flesh upon his whole body. He possessed more than ordinary physical strength, but it consisted more in activity and endurance, and in prompt, resolute and fearless energy, than in what we are accustomed to call brute strength. It was not the strength of the giant, but that of a high-souled, fearless hero, who would confront a legion of giants, if necessary, to defend the weak or to succor the oppressed. He had a lofty commanding head, and a highly intellectual forehead. But the whole soul of Andrew Jackson was visible in his dark grey eye.

I never saw such an eye in any other human head. It was kind and gentle, resolute and intellectual. It was as tender at times as the eye of an eagle—and there were times in Andrew Jackson's life, when the dark grey eye was as terrible as the eye of a roused lion. No danger, moral or physical, could make it quail. Then it was a thoroughly honest eye. It loved and respected truth and justice, and hated and despised fraud and falsehood and every kind of dishonorable action. Andrew Jackson was a born hero, and every man who approached him had to recognize him as such, that is, as a man, formed by nature to be the leader of his fellowmen, in any great human emergency.

I will give a few particulars of General Jackson, which I get from his favorite aide-de-camp, Gen. William O. Butler, of Kentucky.

The massacre of Fort Moins, as you all know, called him into military service to put down the Indians, and he did so effectually. He fell upon them like a thunderbolt. He struck them down in their strongholds, and the Indian power in the Mississippi valley fell forever. This Indian war at an end, a British expedition appeared on the Gulf of Mexico, the most formidable hostile expedition that had ever approached this continent, and it became evident to all that the object of attack was the city of New Orleans; and unfortunately New Orleans at that moment was more utterly defenceless than any other point in the United States. Gen. Jackson was ordered to New Orleans, and he arrived in that city on the evening of the 1st of December, 1814, and took up his quarters at the house of one of his old friends named Clark. The next day the authorities of the city, with the Mayor at their head, called upon him at his quarters. One of the most eloquent men of the day welcomed him in an able address. He took occasion in his remarks to point out the defenceless condition of the city.

He stated, what was too true, that it had no troops, no arms, no munitions of war, and no defensive works. He then dwelt upon the formidable character of the expedition coming against it, and the horrors that would ensue to life and property, and what men value more than life, if the city should be carried by assault and given up to the license of a brutal soldiery. Having done all this with the most consummate tact, he hinted delicately that to escape these horrors there was but one alternative, an arrangement with the enemy to surrender the city. During the delivery of this address, Gen. Jackson stood bolt upright, as motionless as a bronze statue. Not a muscle of his cast iron countenance was seen to move or betray the feeling with which he was animated. There he stood in his well-worn grey overcoat and his high rough military boots, the impersonation of inflexibility and fearlessness. All were now anxiously awaiting his reply. The reply came. The bronze lips opened, and out came these words, pronounced with the firmness of unflinching resolution: "Gentlemen, the British army shall never enter New Orleans; we must prepare to fight."

"But if we fail, General," said one of the authorities, "what then?"

"Fail!" exclaimed Jackson, as if scorning the very word, "Why, if we fail, we'll burn down the city. Good morning, gentlemen," dismissing the municipals with a polite bow, and turning to give some orders to his officers.

In all modern history there is not a single scene more romantic and interesting than this interview. Considering the circumstances, the approach of a powerful enemy and the defenseless condition of the city, the conduct of Andrew Jackson on that occasion was not only heroic but sublime.

Henry Clay was a man of entirely different type. He was a thorough western man; tall and slender, with a frank, careless, genial, fearless manner. He had a large manly head, and a lofty intellectual forehead. He had fair hair, fair complexion, and blue eyes. His eye was bright, frank, open, intellectual, and fearless. It was an eminently practical eye. It just saw the world as it was, and understood it perfectly, and knew how to make the best of it on all occasions. The other features of his face were wanting in regularity, and might be called remarkably plain but for the glow of generous feeling and intelligence that overspread his whole countenance. And when animated in debate, that frank, open, manly countenance underwent a transfiguration that made it appear positively handsome—and the ladies, who ought to be the best of judges in such cases—esteemed Henry Clay at all times the most captivating man of the age.

But the principle charm of Henry Clay was his incomparable voice. That marvelous voice was capable of unlimited modulation, and of expressing with the highest possible perfection every passion and emotion of the human soul. When he rose in his place in the Senate to make one of those inimitable speeches which, for the time being, swept everything before them, it was interesting to notice the effect of his voice and manner upon the audience. Before he had uttered half a dozen sentences you would hear a rustling of silk dresses, as if a breeze of autumn wind swept through the galleries, from the commotion and excitement among the ladies. And as he proceeded with his discourse this excitement would increase and communicate itself to the whole audience—Senate and all. The effect for the time being would be utterly irresistible, and is therefore indescribable. When he raised his powerful voice and denounced the Democratic administration, you had only to glance up to the galleries to see all those lovely heads drooping, the face pale and wearing a look of distress, as if they were the principal sufferers in the general calamity. I can not to this day explain the mystery of the magnetism which that singular man exercised upon his audience. But for the time being it was omnipotent and overpowering. And, as his power came from nature and not from culture, he could exercise it over any audience—over backwoodsman or statesman, over fishwomen or fine ladies. He could control and sway and magnetize them all. Such was Henry Clay, of Kentucky, the leader of the grand old Whig party, and the greatest natural orator and popular leader that has yet appeared in this country.—Review.

The Three Crimes.

AN EASTERN TALE.

Hamet Abdallah was an inhabitant of a grotto on one of the slopes of Mount Olympus. When he stood at the entrance of his humble dwelling, he could embrace at one glance all the territory originally possessed by Osman, the founder of the Ottoman Empire; and, as he five times a day offered up his prayers to Allah, he invoked blessings upon the head of Solyman the Magnificent, the reigning Sultan in whose time he lived. Indeed, Abdallah was renowned for his sanctity; and the inhabitants of the vicinity of his dwelling treated him with the most marked respect.

He was not, however, entitled to this excessive veneration by his age, for he had scarcely attained his fortieth year when the incident of this tale took place. His venerable father, who was himself a dervise of great sanctity, and whose years amounted to fourscore, resided with him in the same grotto; and fortunate was deemed the individual who, on his way along the slopes of Olympus, was allowed to join in the prayers of the two dervises, kneeling upon the ground at the entrance of the cave, and turning their countenance toward the holy cities of Mecca and Medina.

Hamet Abdallah was one morning roving amidst the groves and woods, which extended up the mountain far above his grotto, and pondering upon the passage in the Koran which he had been perusing but a short time previously, when his foot suddenly struck against something hard upon the ground. He looked downward, and saw an iron ring fastened to a small brass plate which was let into a square of stonework, and seemed to cover a hollow place or well. Obeying a sudden impulse of curiosity, Hamet applied his hand to the ring, and pulled it with all his force. After many vain exertions, the brass plate yielded to his exertions, and he fell backward with the sudden shock.

Before he had time to rise and examine the aperture thus laid bare, a dense volume of smoke issued from the hole, and ascended in the air to the height of several thousand feet.

Hamet gazed with astonishment upon this strange apparition: but how much more was his wonder excited when he saw the smoke gradually becoming more and more palpable and shapely, and at length assume the form of an immense giant, with a long flowing white beard, and a tremendous pine tree in his right hand.

Hamet fell upon his knees, and was about to put up a prayer to heaven, when the terrible apparition addressed him in a voice of thunder:

"Nay, mention not the name of the Deity, or I will cut thee into ten thousand pieces!"

"Who art thou?" demanded Hamet, rising from his suppliant posture.

"I am Kara, an evil genie, whom a victorious power shut up in that cursed hole, where I have languished for two thousand years. It is an evil day for thee that brought thee hither."

"And wherefore, proud genie?" demanded Hamet.

"Because I am about to kill thee, in order to avenge myself upon some one for this long captivity," replied the giant. At these words, Hamet trembled very much, and besought the genie to spare his life. For a long time the genie was inexorable, and ordered him to prepare for immediate death; but at length he suffered himself to be moved by the prayers and entreaties of the virtuous dervise.

"Hark ye," said the genie; "I am willing to spare your life upon one condition."

"Name it," said Hamet, his heart leaping with joy.

"I will grant your request, I say," proceeded the genie, "on condition that you perpetrate some crime which may diminish your overweening pride of conscious virtue. Do not interrupt me, or I shall kill you upon the spot: but listen. I give you your choice of three of the most heinous crimes which I can imagine. You shall either violate the law of the prophet, and drink your fill of good wine; or you shall murder your venerable old father; or you shall curse the name of that Deity whom you worship. Choose between these three crimes."

Then Hamet was very sorrowful, and he endeavored to melt the heart of the evil genie, but all his prayers and entreaties were unavailing. He accordingly began to reason within himself.

"If," said he, "I assassinate my father, no contrition can wipe away my crime, and moreover the law will overtake me with its vengeance. If I curse the name of the great Allah, I may sigh in vain for future happiness in the gardens of paradise. But if I become inebriate with the juice of the grape, I can expiate that fault by severe mortification, penitence, and renewed prayer."

Then, turning his countenance upward toward the genie, he said, "O fountain of all evil! I have made my choice, since thou art determined upon this injury."

"Name the object of that choice," said the genie.

"I will get drunk with wine as the least of the crimes which you propose," answered the dervise.

"Be it so," cried the genie; "this evening, after the hour of prayer, thou wilt find a jar of Cyprus wine upon thy table, when thy father has retired to rest in his own cell. Thou mayest fulfil thy promise then; but woe unto thee if thou deceivest me!"

The genie gradually became less palpable as he spoke these words; and, by the time the concluding menace issued from his lips, he had vanished altogether. Hamet retraced his steps toward the grotto, with a sorrowful heart; but he would not confide his anticipated disgrace to the affectionate parent who welcomed his return.

The day passed rapidly away; and in the evening Hamet and his sire knelt down as usual at the door of the grotto, with their faces toward the south, to raise their voices in prayer. When their vespers were concluded, the old man embraced his son tenderly, and retired to the inner part of the grotto.

As soon as Hamet knew that his father slept, he lighted a lamp; and, as the genie had told him, he saw a large measure of wine standing upon the table. The unhappy dervise raised it to his lips, and drank deeply of the intoxicating draught. A glow of fire seemed to electrify his frame, and he laughed as he set the vessel down upon the table. Again he drank, and he felt reckless and careless of the consequences. He drank a third time: and, when he had emptied the measure, he ran out to the door of the grotto, and threw it down the slope of mountain; then, as he heard it bounding along, he laughed with indescribable mirth. As he turned to enter the grotto, he saw his father standing behind him.

"Son," said the old man, "the noise of revelry awoke me from my slumbers and I rise to find my well beloved Hamet drunk with wine! Alas! Is this merely one of many nights' orgies; and have I now awakened to the dread truth of thine impiety for the first time? Alas! thou hast cast ashes upon the grey head of thy father!"

Hamet could not brook this accusation, as it implied suspicion that he was accustomed to indulge in wine whilst his father slept. He felt suddenly indignant at the language of his sire, and cried: "Return to thy couch, old dotard! Thou knowest not what thou sayest."

And, as he uttered these words, he pushed his father violently into the grotto. The old man resisted, and again remonstrated with Hamet. The brain of the son was confused with liquor, and a sudden dread of exposure to the world entered his mind. With the rage of a demon he rushed upon his hoary headed sire, and dashed him furiously against the stone walls of the grotto. The old man fell with his temple against a sharp flint—one groan emanated from his bosom—and his spirit fled forever.

Suddenly conscious of the horrid crime of which he had been guilty, Hamet tore his hair, beat his breast, and raved like a maniac. And, in the midst of his ravings, he lifted up his voice against the majesty of heaven, and cursed the Deity whom he had so long and fervently worshiped!

At that instant a terrible din echoed round about—the thunder rolled—the tall trees shook with an earthquake—and, amidst the roar of the conflicting elements, were heard shouts of infernal laughter. All hell seemed to rejoice at the fall of a good man, whom no other vice had ever tempted away from the paths of virtue, until drunkenness presented itself. The rage of the storm increased—the trees were torn up by their roots—and fragments of the rocky parts of Olympus rolled down the hill with the fury of an Alpine avalanche. Then suddenly the genie appeared before the wretched Hamet, and exclaimed, "Fool! by choosing to commit the crime which seemed to thee least, thou hast committed the other two likewise! For there is more danger in the wine cup than in any other means of temptation presented by Satan to mankind!"

And the last words of the genie mingled with the redoubled howling of the storm, as Hamet was borne down the slope of the mountain by the falling masses, and dashed to pieces at the bottom.

The Greece of To-day and the Greece of the Future.—It would be easy to sketch a sentimental picture of Greece as it ought to be, and indicate some traces that it is striving to attain moral perfection as well as Hellenic greatness in an imaginary future. But the progress of the Greek nation must be worked out by increased production and by an augmentation in the numbers of the population. Greece is now in a condition to become the fountain-head of an increasing population, but this can only be effected by material progress. Better plows are more wanted than better speeches. The subject is not entirely overlooked by the Greek press, though it receives little attention from the literary classes and the politicians who pretend to represent Hellenism. There are men who see with regret that a cart can not pass along the road from Pylos to Sparta where a carriage could travel in the days of Homer, and that a mule climbs with difficulty over rocks through which Pyrrhus led a train of elephants. The Greeks of to-day think more of blockade-running than of road-making, but the day is approaching when blockade-running will be useless, and road-making will be useful. An intelligent and commercial people can not fail to become sensible of the great addition made to the profits of production by the diminution of the expense of transport. The Greeks of to-day ought to compare their Greece with the Greece of the classic ages in its material and physical aspect. Even vegetation has withered and decayed. Mountains once covered with thick forests are now bare rocks. Water is sought for vainly in channels of "streams immortalized in song." The cork tree has disappeared, and the forests of oak and chestnut are yearly diminishing in extent. The quantity of valonia is decreasing, and the fruit of the chesnut trees has already degenerated to such a degree as to be a mere ball of fibre. The apples of Lombotina, once an article of export, are now almost unfit for sale in the domestic markets. The best land remains uncultivated, because it requires an expenditure of capital to drain it in winter, to irrigate it in summer, and to clear it from weeds and grasses, the roots of which form Gordian knots three feet below the surface of the soil. The vegetable earth that enabled ancient Greece to support millions in abundance, from the produce of districts where thousands now laboriously obtain a hard subsistence, has been washed into the sea or into pestiferous marshes since the terraces that supported it on the sides of the mountains have been destroyed. These things must be taken into serious consideration, for the future greatness of the country will be better assured by attention to the internal affairs of Greece than by trusting to the generosity of Russia or the diplomacy of France.—Correspondence of the London Times.

The Wonders of Ancient Rome.—The art of working metals and cutting precious stones, surpassed anything known at the present day. In the decoration of houses, in social entertainments, in cookery, the Romans were remarkable. The mosaics, signet-rings, cameos, bracelets, bronzes, chains, vases, couches, banqueting tables, lamps, chariots, colored glass, gildings, mirrors, mattresses, cosmetics, perfumes, hair-dyes, silk robes, potteries, attest great elegance and beauty. The tables of thuga root and delian bronze were as expensive as the sideboards of Spanish walnut, so much admired in the great exhibition at London. Wood and ivory were carved as exquisitely as in Japan and China. Mirrors were made of polished silver. Glass cutters could imitate the color of precious stones so well that the Portland vase, from the tomb of Alexander Serverus, was long considered a pure sardonix. The palace of Nero glittered with gold and jewels. Perfumes and flowers were showered from ivory ceilings. The halls of Heliogabulus were hung with cloth of gold, enriched with jewels. His beds were silver, and his tables of gold. Tiberius gave a million of Sesterces for a picture for his bedroom. A banquet dish of Drusillus weighed five hundred pounds of silver. The cups of Drusus were of gold. Tunics were embroidered with the figures of various animals. Sandals were garnished with precious stones. Paulina wore jewels, when she paid visits, valued at $800,000. Drinking cups were engraved with scenes from the poets. Libraries were adorned with busts, and presses of rare woods. Sofas were inlaid with tortoise shell, and covered with gorgeous purple. The Roman grandees rode in gilded chariots, bathed in marble baths, dined from golden plate, drank from crystal cups, slept in beds of down, reclined on luxurious couches, wore embroidered robes, and were adorned with precious stones. They ransacked the earth and seas for rare dishes for their banquets, and ornamented their houses with carpets from Babylon, onyx cups from Bythinia, marbles from Numidia, bronzes from Corinth, statues from Athens—whatever, in short, was precious, or rare, or curious in the most distant countries.

Nebuchadnezzar's Hanging Gardens.

Jacob Abbott contributes an interesting memoir of Babylon to Harper's. Nebuchadnezzar, the ruler of that famous city, had a wife who came from a mountainous district, and who was dissatisfied with the level prospect everywhere about her, as she looked forth from the palace of her husband, when in order to gratify her he reared the garden that is described below:

The vast structure built by Nebuchadnezzar, which has been celebrated in all ages as one of the wonders of the world, under the name of the hanging gardens of Babylon, was really an artificial mountain, or meant to be such. It was built to gratify the desire of a wife of Nebuchadnezzar, named Amyds, who having been a native of a mountainous country toward the north, soon grew tired, when she came to Babylon, of the level monotony of the country there, and, as young brides on the western prairies of America often do at the present day, when they remember the declivities and summits, and the secluded and romantic dells of their native New England, she said to her husband that she longed for the sight of a hill. Her husband, therefore, undertook to build her one.

The structure consisted of a series of platforms or terraces, supported on arches of masonry, placed one above the other, and raised so high that the upper one was above the walls of the city, so that the spectator, standing upon it, could not only look down upon all the streets and squares of the town, but could also extend his view beyond the walls, and survey the whole surrounding country. The several terraces were supported on immense arches of masonry. The lateral thrust of these arches was resisted by a solid wall 22 feet thick, which bounded and closed the structure on every side. The platforms covering the arches and constructing the terraces, were formed of immense flat blocks of stone, cemented at the joints with bitumen. Above this pavement was a layer of reeds, then another of bitumen, upon which, at the top of all, was a flooring of brick which formed the upper surface of the platform. On this foundation was laid a thick stratum of garden mould, deep enough to afford support and nourishment for the largest trees. The gardens made upon these terraces were laid out in the most costly and elegant manner, and were provided with statues and fountains, and with the choicest fruits, and the rarest and most beautiful shrubs and trees, and parterres of brilliant flowers, and seats, and bowers and ornamental arbors—with everything, in short, which the horticulturists of the day could devise to complete the attractiveness of the scene. The ascent from each of these terraces to the one above it was by a broad and beautiful flight of steps, and visitors who ascended from one to the other saw on each successive platform new and everchanging beauties in the varied arrangements of walks and trees and beds of flowers, and in new views of the surrounding country, which became, of course, wider and more commanding the higher they ascended.

There were spacious and airy apartments built among the arches below, which opened out upon the successive terraces. These apartments commanded very beautiful views, both of the gardens before them and of the country beyond. The interior of them was splendidly decorated, and they were fitted with all necessary conveniences for serving refreshments to guests, and for furnishing them with amusements and entertainments of every kind. On the upper platform was a reservoir of water, supplied by vast engines concealed within the structure. Pipes and other hydraulic machinery conducted this water to all the lower terraces, in order to supply the various fountains and to irrigate the ground. In fact, so vast was the extent, and so magnificent the decorations of this artificial hill, that so long as it endured it was considered, by common consent, as one of the wonders of the world.

DECKER & CO.'S
IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

PIANO FORTES!

Warerooms: No. 2 Union Square, corner Fourteenth St. and Fourth avenue,

NEW YORK.

These Instruments are celebrated throughout the country, and are distinguished for

THEIR SINGING QUALITY,
VOLUME and PURITY OF TONE,
SYMPATHETIC, ELASTIC, EVEN TOUCH,
DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION,
and BEAUTY OF FINISH.

Decker & Company's Pianos have always received the First Premiums, whenever and wherever they have competed with the most celebrated makers in this country.

OUR IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

Is an invention beautiful in its simplicity and wonderful in its practical effects. It is the most compact Agraffe ever invented, and its influence upon the tone is to render it mellower, rounder, and more clearly brilliant, while it utterly overcomes that sharp, metalic quality which disfigures the instruments of all other makers.

WHY WE EXCEL.

While other Pianos are rarely in tune,

THE DECKER & CO.'S PIANOS invariably retain their Pitch and Tone.

While other Pianos are made of poor or unseasoned materials,

THE DECKER PIANOS combine the Best Materials, Skillful Workmanship, and Scientific Construction.

While other Pianos are deficient in the great requisites of a good touch,

THE DECKER & CO. PIANOS have a flexibility under skillful manipulation, which not only adapts them to the style of every performer, but which causes the player to feel en rapport with the Instrument, and affords his taste and fancy free expression.

IT IS A FACT—That philosophy of construction is not less important than fitness of material.

IT IS A FACT—That various minute, unobserved appliances, adaptations, and improvements have an influence in the tone, durability and manipulative character of a Piano, in no degree inferior to the more ostensible modifications.

IT IS A FACT—Therefore, that science, as well as experience; artistic discrimination, as well as methodic care; capital, as well as conscientiousness, are requisite in the production of a GOOD PIANO-FORTE. In our

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte

is exhibited the result of an uninterrupted, persevering regard for these facts and principles; and purchasers who have so often spoken of the uniformity of excellence in our Instruments will be led to understand how this superiority and uniformity has been attained—a result which is apparent to even ordinary judges, in the volume and richness of tone, the sustained and human character of their singing quality, while connoiseurs and critics fully indorse all that we have adverted to.

The unanimous opinion of the best artists and the most reliable critics is, that

THE DECKER & COMPANY'S

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte is the only Square Piano-Forte, which, in Voluminous Sonority, and Positive Solidity of Tone,

Can stand comparison with the

BEST GRAND PIANO-FORTES MADE.

*The Lute of Israefel.

BY H. P. H. BROMWELL.

PHILHARMON.

O! the wond'rous things they tell
Of the Angel Israefel;
He whose heart-strings are a lute,
At whose voice the heavens are mute;
Singer who, as Angels tell,
Doth all sons of God excel.
Would that could these ears of mine
Catch but once his strain divine;
All my soul would melt in bliss,
All my life be charmed from this;
Blessed are their ears who dwell
Near the lips of Israefel.

ISRAEFEL.

Who is this would hear my voice?
Let his soul henceforth rejoice.
Hail, O! son of mortal birth,
Thou shalt hear my voice on earth—
Thou shalt feel the holy spell,
Of the notes of Israefel.

PHILHARMON.

Hark! a rushing sound I hear,
Music fills th' etherial sphere—
List! what notes unheard before,
Through my inmost being pour:
In the rapture of their thrill
Breath departs, and heart is still.
'Twas the sound of Angel wings!
Hail! tis Israefel who sings.
O! the rapture of delight;
Who can speak its wond'rous hight?
Angel, whence such marv'lous tones?
Wherefore from thy lips alone?
Tell me why such transports dwell
In the tones of Israefel?

ISRAEFEL.

Know thou, mortal, that the thrill
Which doth so thy spirit fill,
Cometh not from lips or tongue,
'Tis the lute within me strung.
Lute, with strings of sweet accord,
By the finger of the Lord
Touched with three, and five, and seven,
Cardiac symphonies of Heaven:
This hath wrought the wond'rous spell
In the tones of Israefel.

PHILHARMON.

Would such extacy might flow,
From the voice of man below!
Would that Heaven would grant to me,
Such a lute as dwells in thee.
Round the earth my feet would haste,
Vale and forest, field and waste,
Isles and mountains, seas and plains,
Live enchanted by my strains—
Human melodies grow tame,
Syrens' songs be put to shame—
Voices of all winds should be
Tuned to flutes of Heaven by me—
Sounds of waters, all excel—
Concords of the Naiads' shell—
Echoes of the glen and hill,
In seraphic rondeaus trill;
Trees should be with passions fired,
Birds and beasts with souls inspired,
Human heart delirious leap,
Angel eyes with rapture weep—
Grant me, Heaven, this wond'rous spell,
Grant this lute of Israefel!

ISRAEFEL.

Hold! thy heart is in the wrong;
Not for this is Heavenly song.
Selfish rapture thou wouldst gain,
Triumph to the soul obtain.
Know, that who this lute would bear,
First, with all, the joy would share—
Know, this wondrous gift of mine,
Is naught else than love divine;
This alone hath wrought the spell
In the notes of Israefel.

PHILHARMON.

Woe is me this voice to hear,
Fettered in this human sphere;
Woe is me, to thus have known
Gifts which ne'er can be my own—
What is life, henceforth forlorn?
Better had I ne'er been born!
Would that God my ears had cursed
Unto deafness from the first,
Ere I felt the marv'lous spell,
Of the voice of Israefel.
Wherefore should such gift be given
Unto him alone by Heaven?
Why should Heaven and Earth be dumb
If but Israefel doth come—
Instruments be put to scorn,
Birds and beasts be left forlorn,
Voice of man, as mine, in shame,
Echo but his worship'd name,
All, as one, condemned to swell
Triumph of this Israefel?

ISRAEFEL.

Nay, 'tis well that thou didst hear;
For thy sake I now am here.
Didst thou crave to hear my strain,
Wherefore dost thou now complain?
Know'st thou why thy heart is mute?
Who forbids to thee a lute?
Know thou, that the Lord in me
Wrought but that he would for thee.
Every heart his hands have made
Hath a lute with strings arrayed—
Hath a lute whose strings are seven,
Answering to the chords of Heaven.
Yet, to place that harp in tune,
Thou with Heaven must first commune;
'Tis but love divine which brings
Music from those hidden strings—
Love divine, whose sweet control
Tunes the harp of every soul.
This the Angel's song inspires,
Wakes the Seraphs' holy fires;
This about thy heart hath run,
Since its pulse of life begun;
Holy currents to and fro
With its throbbings ebb and flow,
But for this, thy selfish sin,
Filling every cell within.
Then would mystic cords full strung
Fill with melodies thy tongue—
Love and wisdom, in degree,
Even as thy state may be.
If with love thy soul abound,
String'd with three thy lute will sound;
If in wisdom thou excel,
Five the cords that then will swell;
If thou art both good and wise,
Sevenfold melodies will rise,
Such as those whose charms excel
In the notes of Israefel.

Music.—MIDDLETON.

HIGH PRIEST.

Throned and jeweled in the East,
See, companions, our High Priest,
Faithful to your will expressed—
Names of nations on his breast.
While we his commands obey,
Truth shall here have rightful sway—
Love and Charity prevail:
Teacher, head, and ruler, Hail!

KING.

On the right our King elect,
View, and mark with due respect.
Rich in worth—with joy we greet
Him who fills great Hiram's seat.
To his glory, let our song
Loudly, clearly, roll along;
Let us make the conclave ring,
Chanting praises to our King.

SCRIBE.

On the left our Scribe we see:
This completes the chosen Three,
By whose efforts light divine
Through the fog and cloud shall shine.
While they o'er our acts preside,
Prompt to order, aid, and guide,
Nothing from the law shall fail:
Sovereign Council—Hail! all Hail!

ANCIENT AND MODERN RITES

Worked Under the General Denomination of Freemasonry.

BY TYRIAN.

NO. II.

ANDROGYNOUS RITES, OR FEMALE MASONRY.

Dr. Mackey defines these rites to be "Degrees imitative of Masonry, which have been instituted for the initiation of males and females, so called from two Greek words, signifying man and woman."

He also informs us that mushroom institutions of this character grew up so rapidly, and to such an extent, in France (where they originated), that the Grand Orient was, in 1774, compelled to take the matter in hand in hand, and established a legitimate rite, which was called the Rite of Adoption.

In reference to the origin of Adoptive Masonry, Dr. Oliver says: "These sources of amusement excited the curiosity of the female portion of the community on the continent; and their influence proved so effectual, that the brethren found it necessary to admit them to a participation in some of the secrets of Masonry. Accordingly, in 1730 (upon which date all authorities agree), female lodges were instituted; and in 1743 the order of Perfect Happiness, to which ladies were admitted, made its appearance. This led to other androgynous institutions, until at length female Freemasonry flourished abundantly under royal and noble patronage."

*"The Angel Israefel, whose heart-strings are a lute; the sweetest singer of all the works of God."—Koran.

The learned doctor also records an anecdote by Clavel, relating to the origin of female lodges, "which," as he says, "is difficult to credit." "He (Clavel) says, that in the year 1741, a burgomaster of Holland, having heard of some grotesque exhibition, which professed to be an exposition of Masonic secrets, caused himself to be proposed for admission, that he might judge of the correctness of what he had seen; and that he secretly placed his daughter at a window, to be a witness to his initiation. The plan succeeded, and led to the establishment of female Freemasonry."

We are also informed, from the same source, that "The greater the obscurity of these new degrees, the more curiosity was attracted to them, and none were more eager than the fair sex. Their dressing-rooms were metamorphosed into secret schools, where the interpreting adept developed the mysteries, and the novice in ecstacy applauded the mystery which was hidden from the vulgar."

Says the doctor, in another place: "The ladies of this age appear to have been extremely zealous in the cause of Masonry. We have already seen that they had their lodges, in which certain degrees were conferred. In 1776, an institution of this kind was founded, called the Mopses, which included both male and female. It derived its name from the figure of a mastiff (Mops) which was to them an emblem of fidelity."

ACADEMY OF THE ILLUMINATI OF AVIGNON.

This was established at Avignon in 1785. Admitted both sexes to membership. The teachings of its ritual were a mixture of Hermetic Philosophy and Swedenborgian ideas.—Macoy.

Dr. Oliver does not, for a wonder, mention this rite—that is, if he does we can not find it.

AMAZONS.

"A system of androgyne Masonry which for a time excited some interest in South America during the last century."—Macoy.

This order is mentioned by Oliver, but no explanation given.

ARGONAUTS.

"An androgyne Masonic society founded in Germany, in 1775, by some members of the Strict Observance. Its chief officer was called Grand Admiral, the place of meeting was called a ship, and all the appointments were named from various parts of a vessel. Their motto was: 'Es lebe die Freude,' a vessel. They live to promote happiness. The seal was a silver anchor, inlaid with green."—Macoy.

Not mentioned by Dr. Oliver.

EASTERN STAR.

"An androgynous or adoptive system of Freemasonry. It was introduced into this country in 1778, and since that time thousands of persons have participated in its ceremonies. Those who are entitled to receive the degrees are Master Masons, their wives, widows, sisters, and daughters. The theory of the order is founded upon five celebrated female characters, illustrated in the Holy Writings."—Macoy.

Bro. Macoy, in speaking of the French Rite of Adoption, says that the American Adoptive Rite is better adapted to the United States, and has excited considerable interest, and found many powerful advocates in this country. This rite or order consists of five degrees, viz: 1, Jephthah's Daughter; 2, Ruth, or the Mason's Widow; 3, Esther, or the Mason's Wife; 4, Martha, or the Mason's Sister; 5, Electa.

It is claimed that they are useful, inasmuch as ladies in possession of these degrees have ready and efficient means of commanding the services of Freemasons whenever and wherever they may need them. This is a broad assertion, and should have been qualified by adding, provided the said Freemasons are in possession of the same rite. These degrees, when well conferred, are elegant and impressive. Bunglingly conferred, they are worse than nothing.

Bro. Macoy states that "Masons can not find a surer safeguard and protection for their wives, sisters, and daughters, than is furnished by the American Adoptive Rite." To this we dissent. Surer safeguards than are now thrown around our wives, sisters, and daughters can never be, if they possessed five thousand adoptive degrees.

Bro. Macoy further says: "To the objection that the degrees are not Masonic, it may be replied that they are as much so as any degree outside of the symbolic lodge."

There lies the fatal error of Adoptive Masonry. There is the secret of the opposition to its spread which it has met with from influential Masons. The ladies are taught or led to believe that they are receiving Masonic degrees. This may be denied, but it is so, and can be readily proven. I say to such, that you are not in any way, shape, or form, receiving anything that appertains to Freemasonry; you are simply receiving degrees, tolerated and worked under the sanction, because nothing to the contrary has been expressed by competent authority, of Masonry. You should be taught that you are not receiving anything Masonic. At the risk of being called ungallant, we would say that you never can.

Neither Dr. Mackey or Dr. Oliver mention the Eastern Star, and the reason why so much space is assigned to it, and every conceivable opportunity seized in which to mention it, by Bro. Macoy, is due to the fact that he is largely interested in its spread.

It is unfortunate in having at its head the person it has, and while he there continues, the rite will languish and not spread materially in the West. If the patrons of the rite and those interested in its growth wish it to succeed, they must rid themselves of the incubus laid upon it in the person of its present head. Under the reign of Bro. Gould, it prospered; and why he was dropped and a Masonic charlatan elevated in his stead, we do not understand. The elevation of the present Grand Patron is doubtless owing to his taking ways.

ESPERANCE, OR LODGES OF HOPE.

"Under the name of Knights and Ladies of Hope, an order was organized in France early in the last century, and established lodges bearing this title. This was the commencement of the system now known as Adoptive Masonry."—Macoy.

This order is mentioned by Dr. Oliver, but no explanation given.

FELICITIE.

An order bearing this name was established at Paris in 1742, by some naval officers, and to which both sexes were admitted. The titles of its officers and the names of its degrees were taken from the nomenclature of the sea. The initiation represented a voyage in search of the Island of Happiness. The jewel of the order was a golden anchor suspended from a silken cord. According to Bro. Macoy, its ritual contained four degrees—Cabin Boy, Patron, Commander, and Vice Admiral. Bro. M. also states that in 1748 it was merged in a new order called the Knights and Ladies of the Anchor; but in this he is mistaken.

This is the same organization alluded to by Dr. Oliver who, after stating the causes which led to the formation of adoptive or androgynous rites, informs us that it was formed in 1742, and we would gather from his remarks that it was the first order of the kind that completed a regular organization and formed lodges.

The initiation, as stated above, was a representation of a voyage to discover the Island of Felicity or happiness. Dr. Oliver's nomenclature of the degrees differs from that of Bro. Macoy. He gives Cabin Boy, Master of the Vessel, the Chief of the Squadron, and Vice Admiral. The supreme head was styled Admiral. Dr. Oliver mentions another Order of Felicity, the emblem of which was a golden trowel. This last order was totally different from the former, not partaking of the naval idea suggested by the initiation of the order first treated of.

FIDELITY.

According to Bro. Macoy, one of the many forms of Adoptive Masonry, which appeared in France during the last century. It was instituted at Paris in 1740, and was, when organized, styled the "Order of Knights and Ladies of Fidelity." It flourished for a long period, and was much sought after in Germany. This order is not mentioned by Dr. Oliver.

FENDEURS.

From Dr. Oliver I learn that the Chevalier Beauchain established in Paris, in 1743, an androgynous degree entitled the "Order of Fendeurs." The lodge represented a forest, and its assemblies were held in an extensive garden in the suburbs of Paris. It was for a while extremely popular.

HEROINE OF JERICHO.

This degree (purely American) is conferred on the wives and widows of Royal Arch Masons. It was once very popular, Bro. Macoy to the contrary notwithstanding, but owing to the restrictions imposed upon the conferring of the same, it was not widely propagated.

Dr. Oliver mentions it simply as an American degree. Its name indicates the nature of its ritualistic workings.

KNIGHTS AND LADIES OF THE DOVE.

From Bro. Macoy I learn that this order was established in 1784, framed on the model of Freemasonry, to which both sexes were admitted under the style of "Chevaliers et Chevalieres de la Colombe." It was of but brief duration.

KNIGHTS AND NYMPHS OF THE ROSE.

From Dr. Oliver's "Historical Landmarks," I extract the following: "A very pleasing specimen of the ritual of one of these female lodges, called the Nymphs and Knights of the Rose, is given by M. Clavel. It was established in 1778, and was under the protection of the Duke de Chartres. The lodge-room was termed the Temple of Love, the walls decorated with garlands of flowers, intermixed with escutcheons charged with the peculiar symbols of the order."

He further informs us that the meetings were presided over by the presiding officer of either sex. The man was denominated Hierophant, and initiated the males; the woman, Grand Priestess, who initiated the females. The conductors were two, the man being called Sentiment, the woman, Discretion. The decorations were, for the males, a crown of myrtle, the females, a crown of roses. When a meeting was held for initiation, the room was lighted by one taper; at the close of the ceremonies the hall was lighted by numerous wax candles. When a candidate presented himself or herself, questions as to name, country, condition in society, etc., were asked, which being answered the question was asked, "What are you now seeking?" The answer was, "Happiness." The question was then asked, "What is your age?" The answer was, if a male, "The age to love," if a female, "The age to please and to be loved." They were then divested of the chains with which they had been loaded, and entwined with garlands of flowers, which were denominated "chains of love." After the various ceremonies were concluded, incense was offered to the goddess of love, and "Dan Cupid," and the rest of the evening spent in social converse. The whole thing was, to our opinion, decidedly Frenchy. It enjoyed but a brief lease of life.

MOUNT TABOR.

This system is not noticed by Bro. Macoy, but Dr. Oliver descants upon it at some length. This order had nine degrees, as follows: 1, Novice Ecossais, or Scotch Novice; 2, Novice Mason; 3, Novice Mythologist; 4, Discreet Fellow Craft; 5, Biblical Fellow Craft; 6, Mistress Adonhiramite; 7, Historical Mistress; 8, Moral Mistress; 9, Grand Philosophical Mistress. Of these numbers, 2, 4, 6, and 8, were termed moral, the rest historical degrees. The emblems, rites, etc., relate to the fall of our first parents, the deluge, confusion of tongues, &c. The officers were, Madam, the Great Mistress, Master of the Grand Sphynx, and Dame of Eloquence.

The head of the order was a male, and enjoyed the title of Commander-in-Chief.

MASON'S DAUGHTER, OR MASTER'S DAUGHTER.

Bro. Macoy states that this degree in some respects resembles the "Martha" degree of the Eastern Star. We strongly suspect the Martha degree was stolen from the Master's Daughter. Among all the androgynous degrees conferred in America, there is but one finer than the Master's Daughter. That one is the Good Samaritan, which is to our mind the finest degree of the kind we ever saw conferred, and inculcates its lessons in a most striking, elegant, and forcible manner. Of the degree of Good Samaritan we will not treat, as its name indicates its character, and the restrictions placed upon its growth, in allowing it to be conferred upon female relatives of Royal Arch Masons only, prevents its spread throughout the whole United States. Were it not for this restriction, the rite of the Eastern Star would grow pale before its triumphant onward march.

The Master's Daughter is a beautiful degree, infinitely more so than any of the Eastern Star degrees. It is a great favorite in the South, and it is difficult to find a female, who is entitled to it, who has not received it. It is destined to spread far and wide. The ceremonies of initiation refer to the xi. and xii. chapters of St. John. As Dr. Mackey has, in a far more able manner than I can possibly do, presented the merits of this degree in a former number of THE TROWEL, I will not consume time in remarks concerning it.

ORDER OF ST. JOACHIM.

An order established at Bamberg in 1804, composed of Knights and Ladies. Its ritual required the members to abstain from waltzing, and inculcated a belief in the Trinity.

ORDER OF PALLADIUM.

The date of the organization of this society is a matter of doubt. It first appeared at Douay, in France, and was, we believe, instituted by the impostor St. Germain. Both sexes were admitted to membership. Its professed aim was spiritual and moral improvement, but under that cloak were concealed acts of the grossest licentiousness. The male members were denominated "Companions of Ulysses," the females, "Sisters of Penelope." The members of this order also called themselves "Adamites."

In my next I will present the Rite of Adoption, or the legitimate French rite of androgynous Masonry.

The Corner-Stone.

Monday, the 5th of October, will long be remembered by the citizens of Springfield, and all who were permitted to participate in the ceremonies of laying the corner-stone of the new State-House.

At an early hour the city was full. The Grand Lodge convened and opened at nine o'clock at the State-House, the Templars at Elwood Hall, and the Craft in general at Masonic hall. Chicago Commandery was received and entertained by Elwood Commandery, and the Ellsworth Zouaves, of Chicago, by the Springfield Zouaves, at their respective halls.

At twelve o'clock the procession began to form, consisting of the Grand Lodge, about four hundred strong, and the Grand Chapter, under the charge of Wiley M. Egan, Grand Marshal.

The escort duty was performed by Chicago and Elwood Commanderies, with delegations from several others. Their beautiful regalia and costume elicited universal admiration, and they were full two hundred in number. The Master Masons formed with Springfield Lodge No. 4, in the usual dress, and were estimated at over one thousand. Gen. Cook had charge of the Masonic Fraternity, while Capt. John S. Bradford, in beautiful uniform, commanded the line as Chief Marshal. Having arrived at the stand, the Grand Marshal proclaimed silence, the Grand Master briefly addressed the audience, prayer was offered by the Grand Chaplain, and the band discoursed good music. The Grand Treasurer announced that he had made a deposit in the stone, and the list of articles was read by the Grand Secretary.

The Grand Master then announced that it was his will and pleasure that the corner-stone be now laid, which was proclaimed to the Masons.

The Grand Master then said;

"R. W. Breth. Deputy Grand Master, Senior and Junior Grand Wardens, you will proceed with me to the stone and assist in laying the same."

They descended, the Grand Sword Bearer and Grand Marshal preceding; following them, the Deputy Grand Master, Senior and Junior Grand Wardens, then the Grand Master, followed by the Grand Senior and Junior Deacons.

The Deputy Grand Master bore the square, the Senior Grand Warden the level, the Junior Grand Warden the plumb, the Senior Grand Deacon the trowel, and the Junior Grand Deacon the gavel.

The Grand Master then spread the cement, and the stone was lowered to its bed.

The corner-stone is an immense block from the Hamilton quarries, eight feet long, four feet wide, and three thick, very handsomely dressed, and bearing the following inscriptions:

Erected under an act of the General Assembly, approved February 25, 1867.

JOHN C. COCHRANE,
Architect and Superintendent.

WILLIAM D. CLARK,
Assistant Superintendent.

STATE OFFICERS.

RICHARD J. OGLESBY, Governor,
WILLIAM BROSS, Lieutenant Governor,
SHARON TYNDALE, Secretary of State,
ORLIN H. MINER, Auditor,
GEORGE W. SMITH, Treasurer,
ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, Attorney General,
NEWTON BATEMAN, Supt. Public Instruction.

Laid by the Masonic Fraternity, A. D. 1868, A. L. 5868, Jerome R. Gorin, M. W. G. M.

The time of lowering the stone was divided into three parts, representing the three degrees of Masonry; the first announced by one gun from the artillery, second by two guns, third by three guns; the band meanwhile playing "Auld Lang Syne."

The stone having reached its proper position, it was, by order of the Grand Master, tried with the plumb, the level, and the square, and the Grand Master then said:

"This corner-stone has been tested by the proper implements of Masonry; I find that the craftsmen have skillfully and faithfully performed their duty; therefore, I pronounce this, the corner-stone of the new State-House, tried, true, and trusty, plumb, level, and square, and as such it is approved; the craftsmen have faithfully performed the duties assigned them."

Then, the officers resuming their proper positions, the Grand Master proclaimed as follows:

"I, Jerome R. Gorin, Grand Master of Masons of the State of Illinois, declare this stone plumb, level, and square, and, being so, duly laid according to the ancient usages, customs, and landmarks of Freemasonry; and may the Grand Architect of Heaven and Earth bless the work here begun, and make it memorable to the last generations."

After music, the Grand Master then proceeded, according to the ancient usages of Masonry, to pour the vessels of corn and wine and oil, emblems each respectively of plenty, refreshment, and joy, upon the stone, and concluded by saying:

"May the All-bounteous Author of Nature, the Supreme and ever-living God, bless the inhabitants of this place with all the necessaries, comforts, and conveniences of life, assist in the erection and completion of this building, protect the workmen against every accident, and long preserve from decay the structure which will here arise. And may He grant to us, in needful supply, the corn of nourishment, the wine of refreshment, and the oil of joy."

The Grand Master then presented Mr. J. C. Cochrane, the architect, and W. D. Clark, the superintendent of the work, with the designs upon the trestle-board and the tools of the workmen.

The Grand Marshal then faced the audience and said:

"Take notice, that the M. W. Bro. Jerome R. Gorin, Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Illinois, has this day, at this place, laid the corner-stone of the new State-House. 'Wisdom, Strength, Beauty, and Fraternity.'"

The procession then proceeded to the Springfield Skating Rink, corner of Walnut and Market streets, where a magnificent banquet had been arranged by the Messrs. Leland.

THE BANQUET.

The large rink was beautifully decorated with flags, all of them having been carried by Illinois regiments, and baptized amid the carnage and smoke of battle. These flags, which added so much to the attractions of the place and occasion, called up reminiscences of the thousands of brave hearts who had perished in the defense of the liberties of the country.

The tables were placed in six rows, five in each row, running the entire length of the building, besides two tables placed at the end of the building, making in all thirty-two tables, set for ten hundred and forty-four guests. The collation consisted of almost every variety of cold meats, chickens, lobsters, salads, oysters, etc., etc., including the various delicacies of the season, too numerous to mention in this connection. About two hundred accomplished and intelligent ladies of the city, who had volunteered their services to attend upon the tables, were present, and, on the arrival of the guests, occupied seats around the vast room.

After the guests had taken their seats at the tables, the ladies marched in couples to the respective tables, and were greeted by the greatest demonstrations of applause from all parts of the assembly. David P. Bunn, Esq., Grand Chaplain, then offered an appropriate prayer, at the conclusion of which the large number of guests paid a high compliment to the rich repast before them, not forgetting the palatable wines furnished in abundance on the occasion. Previous to commencing the repast, the Great Western Light Guard Band of Chicago discoursed some most excellent music in a highly artistic manner.

At the conclusion of the repast, Gen. John A. McClernand, who presided with dignity on the occasion, called the meeting to order, and read several of the regular toasts. The first was

The New State House.—This was responded to by Scott White, Esq., of Pike county. In the course of his remarks, he briefly spoke of the grand structure, the corner-stone of which had just been laid, and then in an eloquent and interesting manner spoke of the rapid growth of Illinois in population and material wealth. His remarks were received with the greatest applause.

The State of Illinois.—Lieut. Gov. Bross being loudly called for, came forward and responded in some well-timed and eloquent remarks, in the course of which he said, as second officer of the State government, he was proud of Illinois, of her people, and her agricultural wealth and progress in all that constitutes a great people. He was in favor of building a State House here from the beginning, and the present edifice, when completed, would be an honor to the State and people. He was proud of Illinois. He next referred to the vast commerce of the State; and he believed she would go on until, from being the fourth, she would be the first State in the Union. He had traveled in the far northwest, but he preferred Illinois for her lands and beautiful women to all others. He was frequently interrupted during his remarks with the greatest demonstrations of applause. The next toast in order was

The Judiciary of the United States.—Judge William Brown, of Jacksonville, responded in a most interesting speech. His allusion to the judiciary of the country was eloquent and high-toned. He believed that all should bow with deference to the laws of the land. In concluding, he paid a high compliment to Judge Caton, the orator of the day, and also to other distinguished men who had filled important positions in the judiciary of the country. His remarks were received with great favor.

Agriculture and Trade.—Capt. James N. Brown came forward, and commenced by saying he was proud of the subject of the toast, and of his adopted State. He was an agriculturist, and was proud of Kentucky, his native State, but still prouder of Illinois, and yet still prouder of the beautiful capital of the State. He spoke in the most eloquent terms of agriculture, and its great and good influence upon the country. He referred to Illinois as being the fourth State in population, yet in agriculture she was the first. He closed by paying a glowing tribute to the soldiers and what they had done in the great work of saving the country.

At this stage of the proceedings, the band commenced playing Auld Lang Syne, and the vast assembly joined in singing the pleasant old tune.

The president of the meeting then read the following toast:

The Laborers of Illinois.—John Henchcliffe, Esq., responded in one of the most eloquent and able speeches of the evening, and his remarks were received with the greatest applause.

E. L. Baker, Mayor of Rockford, came forward and said he thought this large assemblage should not separate without an expression of thanks to the beautiful ladies of Springfield. He then said, in behalf of the Masonic Fraternity, I hereby tender their thanks to the ladies of Springfield, for the pleasures received at their hands at the present banquet. The sentiment was received with rounds of applause.

The name of Gen. McClernand was proposed, and he came forward and made an appropriate and pleasant speech, a synopsis of which we are obliged to omit.

The Press of Illinois.—J. W. Merritt, Esq., responded to this toast in some well timed and pleasant remarks, which were received with great favor.

State Sovereignty and National Union.—Responded to by Hon. A. L. Knapp.

The following are the remaining regular toasts:

Pioneers of Illinois.
Executive of Illinois.
General Assembly of Illinois.
Resources and Destiny of Illinois.
Horticulture and Trade.
Mechanics and Artisans.
Laborers of Illinois.
Soldiers and Sailors.
The Union, one and inseparable, now and forever.
The President.
Congress.
The Army and Navy.
Masonic Fraternity.
The New Masonic Temple.

The reading of the toasts being concluded, the meeting adjourned.

The banquet was one of the most pleasant affairs which ever came off in this city. The arrangements were perfect, the entertainment sumptuous, and highly creditable to the Messrs. Leland Bros., of the Leland Hotel, of this city, who furnished the entertainment. The entire affair was a grand success in all respects, and will long be remembered with pleasure by all who were present.

EXTRACTS FROM THE

Address of M. W. Bro. J. R. Gorin,

GRAND MASTER.

Brethren of the Grand Lodge:—Masonry teaches us that, "before entering upon any great or important undertaking, it is necessary to invoke the blessing of God." When we reflect that, in answer to our prayers at the close of the last communication of this grand body, we have been abundantly blessed through another Masonic year with health and peace throughout our borders—with a bountiful supply of everything necessary to our earthly comfort—with rich and superabundant harvests, the reward of honest labor, insomuch that under their weight the earth fairly groans—ought not our hearts swell with emotions of gratitude to the Giver of all good gifts, and our souls break forth in praise to Him for His watchful care over us.

We have met again in Annual Grand Communication, without any conflicting interests to disturb the harmony of our deliberations. We meet, I trust, "in the unity of the spirit and the bond of peace." In view of these facts, and in harmony with my own feelings, and, I have no doubt, with yours also, I deem it highly appropriate to repeat in your hearing that good old psalm, so familiar to you all: "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity; it is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard, that went down to the skirts of his garments. As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion, for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life forevermore." This psalm seems to me more beautiful than it ever did before, and in repeating it, the tender chords of the heart are moved, and vibrate as they are touched by the beauteous sentiment; and the swelling breezes from heaven, as they glide gently along, catch the inspiration, and the soul is filled with sweet music, rich with melodious sounds, causing our entire emotional nature to be moved while contemplating that God is Love.

In conformity to the instructions of this grand body at its last session, I divided the State into twelve districts, and appointed a District Deputy Grand Master in each. The counties composing each of said districts, and the brethren appointed as Deputies, may be seen by reference to the proceedings of the Grand Lodge, 1867. These brethren have rendered valuable service, and have relieved me very much in the discharge of my official duties. My anticipations as to the benefits which would result to Masonry in this State from districting and the appointment of District Deputies in each district, have been more than realized. In a jurisdiction as large as this, with nearly six hundred lodges and over 25,000 Masons, and the number increasing every year, some system must be adopted to relieve the Grand Master of the great burden imposed upon him; and I know of no plan that will accomplish this better than that of appointing District Deputies. The correspondence, alone, of the Grand Master, nearly equals that of the Governor of the State. I again urge upon you the necessity of adopting permanently this or some other plan, by which the Grand Master may be relieved of the immense labor which he would otherwise have to perform, and the wants of the Craft be more promptly attended to. I would recommend that, by resolution or otherwise, the districting of the State and the appointment of Deputies in each district be made a permanent part of our organization, and that the powers and duties of the Deputies be well defined by the Grand Lodge.

Bro. John C. Reynolds, who was appointed for the purpose, has done much towards rescuing the history of the old Grand Lodge of Illinois, and the Lodges subordinate to it and other grand jurisdictions, "from oblivion"—his able report, which will be placed in your hands, will be, I have no doubt, read with much interest. Bro. Reynolds is entitled to the grateful thanks of the Fraternity for his indefatigable and successful labors, in bringing to light much of the history of the old Grand Lodge of Illinois, which has been covered over with the accumulated rubbish of many years.

The committee appointed by the Grand Lodge, and who were authorized to receive bids from the several cities desiring the permanent location of the Grand Lodge, report that they advertised for bids in papers published in Chicago, Quincy, and Springfield. The bids which were received are in the hands of the Grand Secretary.

I urgently recommend that some action be taken during the present communication which will secure the building of a Grand Lodge Hall, which the Craft can call their own, and which shall be sufficiently commodious to accommodate them when they come up to Grand Lodge. If I should be called on to devise a plan by which the necessary means could be raised to build a grand lodge hall, I would suggest that each Lodge in the State, or the members thereof, be called upon to contribute or subscribe, in the way of stock, on an average, three hundred dollars. Assuming that there are six hundred lodges under our jurisdiction, this would give us the sum of one hundred and eighty thousand dollars. I feel confident that this average could be maintained. While there may be, and doubtless are, a considerable number of Lodges that could not take stock to this amount, yet a large majority of them could—and quite a number of the older and wealthier ones would—more than make up the deficit created by the Lodges which fell below it. The members of the Grand Lodge have been at the mercy of others long enough, and have been compelled to meet in places wholly unsuited for a Lodge meeting, where the Grand Lodge could not be opened in due form, nor order preserved when it was opened. Brethren, it is high time we had a hall of our own—one worthy of the Craft of this grand jurisdiction. Shall we have it? The Craft are ready, and only await the action of this grand body. If I have trespassed upon the duties assigned the Grand Lodge Hall Committee in saying what I have above, I beg pardon.

Our R. W. Grand Secretary, after a zealous and faithful service of eighteen years, has decided to retire from the office he has graced and the position he has so ably filled. When he took possession of the office from the hands of our lamented Past Grand Master Warren, in 1851, he found but a few remnants which had escaped the explosion and conflagration at Peoria in 1850, while the office was in the possession of Past Grand Master Pickett. That was at a singular point in our history. Bro. Wm. Mitchell was re-elected Grand Secretary in 1849, at Chicago. He died immediately thereafter, and M. W. Thos. J. Pickett was appointed. In the winter following, Bro. Pickett had the archives in his printing office, beneath which was a drug store. An explosion was followed by a fire; his brother was killed, the printing office consumed, and our archives destroyed. A Grand Lodge of Recovery was held in this city in April, when Past Grand Master Warren was called to a second service, which he discharged until October, 1851, when he declined a re-election, and the present incumbent was elected. One small trunk then held all the archives of this Grand Lodge, and such as were necessary were transported to and from this city until 1858, when they amounted to a wagon-load.

Bro. Reynolds found many Lodges dormant; many more in arrears for dues, and much confusion existed in regard to many matters. The dues were soon paid, and several lodges revived and resumed work. After an existence of eleven years, in a population of over 800,000, there were less than two thousand affiliated members. It was mainly through his efforts, persistent and determined, that non-affiliated Masons were induced to affiliate or assist in forming new Lodges; and that voluntary non-affiliation was declared unlawful and unmasonic. By means of this, more than any other thing, are our Lodges now so prosperous in numbers, and our Grand Lodge so majestic and imposing, with its 30,000 affiliated members.

The extraordinary condition of the Craft, so gratifying to every Freemason, is largely the result of the close and ready contact of our R. W. brother with the brethren and Lodges, in all matters of correspondence, information, and counsel. The Grand Lodge could never have succeeded in paying mileage and per diem, and the ordinary and contingent expenses of the Grand Lodge, upon the rate now paid, but for his suggestion to do the committee work beforehand, and thus shorten the session two or three days. By this means, we have carried several heavy burthens, and without any visible embarrassment. This Grand Lodge is now in a position to acquire a steady and rapidly accumulating income from its surplus means, without in any manner increasing the taxation. All his labors have been directed to building up the Fraternity and promoting the honor of this Grand Lodge. It has been a mistaken idea that his heaviest labors were during our sessions. They have, instead, been unintermitted, by night and by day, throughout the whole year, especially since his residence in Springfield, until he has earned, among all the Grand Secretaries in the United States, the hihgest place for industry, records, proceedings, statistics, and reports. During the first years of his service, he was scantily paid, as well as during the term of the late war. His reputation, fame, and character belong to us, and some fitting and substantial testimonial should be given him by this grand body.

Brethren, before retiring from the office of Grand Master of Masons, permit me to again return you my sincere thanks for the partiality shown me in elevating me to this high position one year ago, and for the uniform kindness which I have received at the hands of the Craft during the past Masonic year. I can truly say, that I retire without the least feeling of enmity against any member of the Craft. My endeavors have been to keep peace among the brethren; how far I have succeeded in doing this, is for you to determine.

EXTRACTS FROM THE

Address of M. E. Geo. W. Lininger,

GRAND HIGH PRIEST.

Companions:—Another Masonic year is gone, and the record is in the hands of the Supreme Recorder above. By will of Divine Providence, we are again permitted to hold our annual meeting around the altar of Masonry. It behooves us as men, and especially as Masons, to reflect with untiring care upon the past; for by its light alone and the blessings of the Supreme High Priest of the Universe shall we be enabled to do work good, true, and square, such work as is wanted for the building of that temple that is to be tried by the Grand Overseer's square.

Many questions of Masonic law have been asked and answered during the year, few of which are important enough to detail. Copies of all questions and answers are in the hands of the Grand Secretary, where they may remain, or if you see proper, they can be referred to the Committee on Jurisprudence.

It is proper—nay, it is duty—that every Grand Chapter legislate for the benefit of the Craft, prescribe rules for their government, decide what are offenses against Masonic law, and determine the mode and degree of punishment for the same. Companions, though this our Mystic Temple may be prosperous in its outward appearances, though it may, and, without doubt, does have the manifestations of unwonted growth, yet, I fear that within its organism are being deposited seeds of evil, which, if allowed to remain, develop, and produce fruit, will sap the virtue of our beloved structure, leaving a dry and lifeless shell, or, what is more to be feared, a mis-named covering for evil deeds and wrong living. Its very prosperity gives the more cause for solicitude. In the natural world rapidity of growth is accompanied by a delicacy of structure and an acute susceptibility. This is true with political growth, and also with the growth of civic organizations. The wise man will see the forecast shadow of evil, and guard against its approach. Companions, let me say that it will be too late to legislate when the world reads corruption upon our very banners. There is merit in the tenets of our Order, and by the help of all true Masons and the Supreme Architect and Workman above, they shall prevail. At this time, particularly, while mad croakers and fanatical moral tyrants assail us with a display of platitudes old, yet new whenever Masonry is the theme, should we be diligent in guarding our courts, that no faults are presented as targets for continued aim, and holding aloft our principles, firmly adhered to. If we do this with fidelity, we have now the assurance that our Order will ever prosper to bless mankind.

Now, we have solemnly promised that we would redouble our endeavors to correct the vices, purify the morals, and promote the happiness of our companions. We have promised to be good men and true, and strictly to obey the moral law. We have all promised to guard against intemperance and excess, and it is the especial duty of some of us to see that the Craft do not convert the means of refreshment into intemperance and excess. Notwithstanding these solemn pledges, it is a lamentable fact that the intemperate use of alcholic drinks is the cause of more trouble to the Fraternity than all others combined. Now, while we may not dictate what a Mason shall eat, drink, or wear, we may insist that he be temperate in all things or cease to be a Mason. Are we not early and constantly taught to make a proper division of our time and talents, and use all temperately. A case for my official decision was presented during the past year upon this same subject, the facts of which are, briefly, as follows: A railroad company (all honor to her managers) enjoined temperance on the part of her employees. An engineer, a Royal Arch Mason, was discharged for drunkenness by the foreman, a Mark Master, after repeatedly warning him that it must in duty be done if the drunkenness was not stopped. When the foreman asked promotion in the chapter, the discharged engineer objected. I advised that charges be preferred against the Royal Arch Mason, and that if there were no other objections made, the Mark Master be advanced. Now, was this right? Are railroad companies to lead in moral questions, or will social and religious organizations stand up to their duty and exalted privilege in these matters.

Profanity is a growing vice in the land, against which all true Masons will guard with persistent effort. The good name of a brother is too often assailed by the tongue of a Mason. These things ought not so to be, companions, and I most earnestly urge upon you at this time to take some decisive action, to the end that we do not retrograde, that we may show to the world without, that while we are willing to throw about the foibles of a brother the broad mantle of charity, yet are we so governed by immutable principles that wickedness and excess will ever receive our hearty rebuke.

At our last annual convocation you instructed me to appoint a committee of five, whose duty it should be to determine upon and present Chapter work for the consideration of this Grand Chapter. I accordingly appointed M. E. Comps. H. W. Hubbard, W. M. Egan, L. L. Munn, O. H. Miner, and John M. Pearson. Too much praise can not be given this committee for the manner in which they have performed their duty. They had in their possession nearly, if not all, of the different kinds of work now in use, and discussed with much care and deliberation each and every sentence. After laboring for more than two weeks, with that zeal and fidelity for which those men are noted in their Masonic history, they decided on what I believe to be good work—as good, perhaps, as we shall get, though years be spent upon it. It is high time that the Grand Chapter of the State of Illinois stand alone in this matter. We have drawn our information from so many different sources, that the committee found it impossible to determine what the work of the State now is, scarcely two Chapters working alike. The work is not new, but, if adopted by this Grand Chapter, will insure uniformity throughout the State—a desideratum worthy of much effort.

I would recommend, should the work presented by the committee, and which I hope will be fully exemplified before we separate, meet your approval, that it be put in such form as to dispense with lecturers upon work, a matter which can be easily and safely done. I would not discontinue the lecturers; but, on the contrary, keep a full corps in the field, and instead of lecturing upon work, have them devote their energies to the moral and social welfare of the Craft.

I would recommend that you declare, by resolution, or otherwise, your understanding of Sec. 7, Art. 3, of the Constitution, so as to make it obligatory upon Chapters to give notice of rejections, expulsions, and suspensions, as is now done by the Blue Lodge. Some trouble has already been caused, and much more will be, if you remain silent on the subject.

It is believed that proficiency should be a condition of promotion. Would it not be better, then, to examine candidates in open Chapter in degrees already received, before being advanced?

I wish to call your attention to the fact that we have no laws for the government of trials. This has been a source of annoyance to me during the past year. You may see proper to relieve my successor from the necessity of arbitrary decisions.

The pending amendments to the Constitution should, in my judgment, be adopted. We ought to have more time at our annual meeting for deliberation, and our outer door should be more carefully guarded.

On the 15th day of September, in company with Comps. Miner, Gorin, and our Grand Secretary, I attended the triennial meeting of the General Grand Chapter of the United States, at St. Louis. Of the proceedings and interesting details of the occasion, I need not inform you—the press has deprived me of that privilege. Permit me to say, however, that in hospitality, cordial generosity, and magnificence of entertainment, St. Louis has out-masoned Masons.

Although previously of a different opinion, I am prepared now to say that the fraternal bonds made and strengthened by these General Grand Convocations, are reason sufficient why they should be continued. True Masons will not lose the opportunity of developing that embryo in every human breast, which, by the greed of the world, is held latent to a deplorable degree, and which, when developed and exercised, causes the spontaneous exclamation from wondering tongues, "Behold how these men love one another."

And now, companions, after thanking you most heartily for the honor conferred by electing me to the highest office in your gift, let me congratulate you on the general prosperity of our Order, and while I invoke the blessing of Almighty God for the noble work which you have accomplished in this broad State, I also implore for you His Divine assistance in the maintainance of your present integrity, and in the discharge of your increasing and arduous duties. I retire from this office with the consciousness that less has been done, and that not so well done, as might have been had you chosen from your number some one more skilled and less engrossed in business. He who passes this chair, and learns not the lesson that earnest labor is one of the great requirements of our Order, and fails to impress that lesson upon the minds of the listening representatives of the Craft, discharges not his whole duty. Labor, then, for by labor alone can we expect the harvest.

And now, that I am about to withdraw from you companionship, to seek the companionship of Masons in another State, I carry with me a full and grateful heart.

A German Masonic Movement in New York.

One of the most indefensible and radical revolutionary movements affecting the status and government of Freemasonry in this country, that has for many years come to our knowledge, has recently transpired in the city of New York. The authors and directors of it are reported to be the two German lodges holding under the authority of the Grand Lodge of Holland, but which have been declared to be, as they unquestionably are, under the American law and practice, irregular bodies. The members of these lodges, aided probably by unaffiliated brethren of the same nationality, have organized themselves into what they denominate the "Society of German-American Freemasons." The particular purpose of their association will best appear from the annexed list of articles or propositions prepared and submitted for the consideration of the society, in a convention held in that city on the 14th and 15th of last month. Of the result of their deliberations, we are not at present informed, and it will be time enough to speak of them when we are. The league is a baseless one, and can result only to the prejudice, if not in the Masonic ruin, of all parties interested in it. How wide spread it is, and what other lodges in other parts of the country are associated with it, we have no means of knowing. We infer, however, from the fourth and sixth articles, that its membership is not confined to the two lodges in the city of New York. It is probable that they will hereafter publish the doings of the convention, or take some other means to make their purpose more generally known than it is at present; in which case we may have occasion to refer to the subject again. We give the articles for the information of our readers.

1. Each society, based upon the old constitutions and organized by seven Freemasons, is a Masonic lodge. No payment of a fee is required, nor a charter.

2. Every man admitted to the lodge is a Freemason.

3. There shall be formed an Independent League (Unaphaengiger Bund) of Masonic lodges in the United States.

4. Each lodge is entitled to join the League if it declares adhesion to its laws and acknowledges only the three St. John's degrees; any lodge may leave the League at any time.

5. Each lodge is sovereign in itself.

6. The League holds meetings from time to time, to which each lodge belonging to it sends delegates. At these meetings, matters of interest to the Masonic Fraternity and to the League shall be discussed.

7. The place of these meetings shall change; each naming it for the next meeting by a majority vote of the delegates.

8. The number of delegates will be fixed by the League; the mode of their election is to be determined by each lodge for itself.

9. The League has legislative power only in so far as the laws passed refer to the inner administration of the League itself. It has not to interfere with the government and administration of the local lodges.

10. On general matters relating to Masonry the League may make proposals, upon which the local lodges, in the interval from one meeting of the League to the next, shall vote and instruct their delegates accordingly, a majority of the voting lodges to decide the question.

11. At the head ef the Leagne there shall be a committee elected by it, to execute the resolutions of the League, to facilitate the intercourse between the local lodges, and between them and others outside of the organization. They serve without pay.

12. Each lodge must defray the expenses of its delegates attending the League.

13. The amount of necessary expenses for the administration of the League shall be fixed by a majority vote at each meeting of the League, and they shall be apportioned among the several lodges belonging to the league according to the number of members in each at the time.—Freemason's Magazine.

Masonic Catechism.

What is a chapter?

A convocation of Royal Arch Masons.

What is the chisel?

One of the working-tools of a Mark Master, and symbolizes the power of education in the mind. The mind in its natural state is a rough ashlar, when educated it is the smooth ashlar—which has been smoothed and squared under the skillful hands of the workmen.

What is a clandestine lodge?

An illegal one. A lodge working without warrant or charter. Regular Masons are forbidden to affiliate with clandestine Masons.

When is a Mason properly clothed?

When he wears white leather gloves, a white apron, and the jewel of his office.

Who is a companion?

A Royal Arch Mason.

What do the compasses symbolize?

The measure of a Mason's life and conduct.

What is a consistory?

A meeting of the members of the 32d degree, or Sublime Princes of the Royal Secret.

What is a capestone?

The topmost stone in the building.

What is a cornucopia?

The horn of plenty. The jewel of Stewards of a lodge, to remind them to furnish an abundant supply for the refreshment of the Craftsmen.

What is a cowan?

A profane. Derived from the Greek word kuon, a day.

What is the Craft?

The whole body of Masons everywhere.

Who are the Masonic Deacons?

Two officers of a lodge—respectively designated as Senior and Junior, upon whom devolves the introduction of visitors and a general watchfulness over the security of the lodge. The former is appointed by the Master, and the latter by the Senior Warden—of which officers they are proxies.

What is a demit?

The withdrawal of a Mason from the Order. Such withdrawal does not exempt him from his Masonic obligations.

What is an eaves-dropper?

A listener. Oliver says the name is derived from a punishment formerly inflicted on a Paul-Pry, which was—"To be placed under the eaves of the house in rainy weather, till the water runs in at his shoulders and out at his heels."

What is an encampment?

A regular assembly of Knights Templar, and Knights of Malta.

What is a gavel?

One of the working tools of an Entered Apprentice. Its true form is that of a stone-mason's hammer.

What does Giblem signify?

A stone-squarer. Sir Wm. Drummond asserts that the "Gibalem were Master Masons, who put the finishing hand to Solomon's Temple."

What is it to "heal" a Mason?

When a clandestine Mason, or one who has received the degrees in an irregular manner, has passed through the ceremonies in a regularly constituted lodge—he is said to be healed, or relieved from the disabilities incident to a clandestine Mason.

What is the Heroine of Jericho?

A side degree, which none but Royal Arch Masons, their wives and widows, are allowed to receive. It is seldom conferred in the West.

What is a High Priest?

The presiding officer of a chapter of Royal Arch Masons.

Of what is the hour-glass an emblem?

Of the fleeting nature of human life.

What are the immovable jewels of a lodge?

The square, level, and plumb.

What is the indented tessel?

The ornamented border of the Mosaic pavement.

Of what is the key an emblem?

Of security. It is the jewel of the Treasurer.

What is the keystone?

The center-stone of an arch, neither oblong nor square, upon which both the wings of Masonry rest. It is the symbol of Royal Arch Masons.—Kentucky Freemason.

Death of the Oldest Mason in Massachusetts.

Mr. Thomas Hooper was the oldest Mason in Massachusetts, and is thought to be the oldest Past Master in the United States. He was Master of King Solomon Lodge, in 1812. He was a public spirited and enterprising man, and took great interest in the prosperity of his native city. He was one of the Selectmen of the town long before Charleston was a city, and was elected to the Board of Aldermen in 1847 and 1848, the first two years of the city government. His funeral took place on Sunday, July 26th, at the Unitarian Church, and was largely attended by the Order and citizens generally.—Boston Post.

Laws for Masons.

Thou shalt neither vex a stranger nor oppress him; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt.

Ye shall not afflict any widow or fatherless child. If you afflict them in anywise, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; and my wrath will wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword, and your wives shall be widows and your children fatherless.

If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him a usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury.

Thou shalt not raise a false report; put not thine hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witness.

Thou shalt not follow a multitude to do evil; neither shalt thou speak in a cause to decline after many to wrest judgment.

If thou meet thine enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again.

Keep thee far from a false matter; and the innocent and righteous slay thou not, for I will not justify the wicked.

Thou shalt not oppress a hired servant that is poor and needy, whether he be of thy brethren or of thy strangers that are in thy land within thy gates; at this day thou shalt give him his hire; neither shall the sun go down upon it, for he is poor and setteth his heart upon it.—Great Light.

Knight Templary.

Seven hundred and forty-nine years ago, in the early morning of an autumnal day, two warriors clad in armor of rusty steel, mounted upon a single horse, might be seen passing through the eastern postern of the enclosure originally occupied by the Temple of Solomon, and descending into the valley of Jehosaphat. The horse upon which they rode, besides their armor, the good swords at their sides, the battle-axes at their saddle-bow, and the spears poised defiantly from either stirrup, comprised their only wealth. Qualified, by long and active service in the crusades, for toil, exposure and gallantry, zealous in the cause of their Lord and Master, the high emprise they now contemplated was all the more cheerfully undertaken, because of its overwhelming difficulties and doubtful consummation. Before the simple dictates of duty, all obstacles dwindled into seeming insignificance.

Leaving them to pursue their adventure, let us change the scene to the coast of the Mediterranean, forty miles distant from Jerusalem. One of those grotesque looking vessels, which we only know by the resmblances met in old pictures, has just drawn up on the beach, fronting the time-honored city of Joppa. Fifty or sixty men, venerable in appearance, each "dressed in pilgrim's weeds, with sandals, staff and scrip," have disembarked and are forming in procession on the sand. They unfurl a white cross. Crucifixes are suspended from ther necks. Their heads and faces are covered with sable cowls. Their voices break into a dirge-like and sepulchral chant. They are pilgrims. Could we gaze under those monkish hoods, the stern features of many a warrior, nobleman, and perhaps monarch, would be revealed. Could we cast up the sum of their history, it would unfold an hundred deeds of lofty daring; tell of fields lost and won; of cities sacked; of castles demolished, and of nations overthrown. All the renown gained by these enterprises, subdued by the austerity and asceticism of a religious era, has yielded to the power of faith, and they are now making the pilgrimage of humiliation, that they may propitiate the favor and avert the wrath of that Great Being in whom they have reposed their highest trust.

A long and dangerous voyage has tamed the war spirit of this little band. Their escape from the perils of the sea has made them almost oblivious of the perils of the land. Unarmed, unaccoutred, each one with the crucifix in close grasp, they commence their toilsome journey over the mountains and through the defiles which lie between them and the Holy City. Inspired by the hope of a safe and speedy arrival, their faith renewed, and their sense of danger weakened, as the consciousness gradually steals over them that they are approaching the end of their pilgrimage, they journey onward, alike regardless of fatigue or exposure. With strained eyes toward Jerusalem, they ascend each hill, eager to catch the first glance of the stately towers of St. Helena, whose walls enclose the Holy Shrine. Their journey is lightened by the constant reflection that they are treading the soil trod by the Redeemer, gazing upon the mountains and valleys on which he gazed, and slaking their noon-day thirst from the streams of which he drank. Soon indeed—oh! ravishing thought!—will they press the hill pressed by his bleeding feet, and made sacred by his atoning sacrifice.

Suddenly, and while in the enjoyment of consolation drawn from so many satisfying sources, while passing through a gloomy defile, their path is beset, and they are attacked by an ambushed foe. Spears and arrows fly thick and fast, and with terrible execution among them. Many fall to rise no more. The infidels, taking advantage of their consternation, rush into their midst, rifle their persons of all that is valuable, and kill those who offer the slightest resistance. Paralyzed with terror, the distressed company are about to give up all for lost; but, hark! a battle cry, sharp, resonant, and decisive, rings through the defile. Aid is at hand. The Pilgrims take heart, and the faces of the Musselmen are now blanched with fear. Into the very midst of the melee thunders the horse with its double rider, and dealing their blows with an activity, power, and precision known only to the warriors of the middle ages, the armed men soon drive the attackers to their coverts, and escort the surviving pilgrims in safety to the tomb of the Savior.

This history, paraphrased from the history of the times to which it refers, and as simple in character as an ordinary foray with the Indians who roam our mountains, will enable us to comprehend the objects in which the order of Knights Templar originated. Hugh d'Payens and Godfrey St. Uldemar, soldiers who had distinguished themselves on many a well fought field, exasperated at the treatment which Pilgrims at the sepulchre received at the hand of the infidels, first conceived and put in practice a plan for their defence. Poor in everything but faith and courage, they styled themselves "The Poor Fellow Soldiers of Jesus Christ." So successful were they in their efforts, that their number soon increased to nine. Placing themselves in favorable positions along the road from Joppa to Jerusalem, this number alone, for a long time, afforded protection to the numerous companies of pilgrims which at this period flocked to Palestine. The success of the enterprise won the favor of the noblemen living in Jerusalem, who generously contributed to its support, and Baldwin II., King of Jerusalem, assigned quarters to the soldiers within the temple enclosure, from which circumstance they received the name of Templars.

Information reaching Europe of the beneficial services rendered by these men, occasioned an excitement which speedily filled their ranks with the most renowned warriors of the age, and inspired afresh the old military spirit of the first crusades. Organizations followed. From the position of a "Poor Fellow Soldier of Jesus Christ," Hugh d'Payens was chosen first Grand Master of the Order of Templars, and sent to Europe to obtain for it the recognition, protection, and favor of the Pope, and encouragement from the crowned heads in the inception and prosecution of a new crusade. His mission gave to the order an importance infinitely greater than had ever before been bestowed upon knighthood. Templarism was at once adopted as the noblest element of chivalry; an austere ritual was prescribed for its government, of which Christianity was the basis, and a system of military and temporal discipline imposed, more rigid in its exactions, and more practical in its objects, than any until then known to the world. Popularized by the insignificance of its origin and the greatness of its achievements, Templarism overshadowed every other form of organization among the nations, whether religious, military or civil. The Grand Master ranked in power next to the Pope, and all Christian nations regarded the order as the sure conservator of a pure Christian faith. The Knights took their vows of chastity, obedience, and devotion with every possible solemnity, and from the moment of their dedication of themselves to the service of the Redeemer, they were regarded by the people with an awe and reverence amounting almost to worship. Power thus obtained necessarily accumulated as the order increased. Jealous lest their influence should diminish, as that of the Templars augmented, the mightiest monarchs of Europe united with the order, and engaged actively in its leading objects. Early in the brief reign of Richard the Lion, in 1191, long after d'Payens and St. Uldemar had been consigned to honorable tombs, the spirit of the Templars found a glorious illustration in the victories over the renowned Saladin, by which Acre, Joppa, and Ascalon severally surrendered to the Christians, and paved the way to an eternal indemnity of the lives of the innumerable pilgrims who thronged the avenues to the Holy Shrine.

These achievements secured for the Templars the confidence of Europe. Other orders of knighthood, which had controlled the military enterprises of the age, were abandoned by all except subordinate officers. The revenues of the order, derivable from a variety of sources, exceeded those of any single nation. The Grand Master was invested with the power of a temporal prince, and the Pope sanctioned, by a bull, the independence of the organization. The different classes were knights, squiers, and servitors, to which were added some spiritual members, who officiated as priests, chaplains, and clerks. A girdle of linen thread to denote their vows of chastity, was worn as a badge of Templarism. Over their armor, the knights wore plain white cloaks adorned with octangular blood-red crosses, to signify that they would shed their blood in the service of the church. They were required to be of approved nobility. The lords of the possessions of the order were elected by the chapters. They comprised marshals and bannerets as leaders in war; drapiers as inspectors of the wardrobe; priors and superiors of single preceptories; abbots commanders and grand priors as rulers over provinces; and the Grand Master as chief of the whole order. The Pope was acknowledged as the only protector. Occupants of estates and vassals were charged with tithes. Uniting the privileges of a religious order with great military power, and always prepared for service by sea and land, the Templars could use their possessions to greater advantage than other corporations; make conquests on their own account, and judiciously appropriate the rich donations and bequests which ;they received from the superstition of the age. All property was owned in common. The order supported all its members.

The arrogance attributed to Knight Templarism is readily accounted for by its power and wealth. In 1244 it possessed nine thousand bailiwicks, commanderies, priories, and preceptories, independent of the jurisdiction of the monarchs of the countries in which it existed. The members embraced the leading nobles and warriors of every nation in Europe, and some of the sovereigns. Erom 1119 until 1306, a period of nearly two centuries, the knights led the chivalry of Europe in all great military enterprises, and exercised a temporal power over the world, second only to that of Rome.

It has been charged that, in the midst of their prosperity, the Templars became venal and mercenary, violated their vows, practiced idolatry, and made the higher objects of their association subservient to the grosser passions. This charge, false in every particular, grew out of the envy, enkindled by their various successes, in the malignant minds of Philip the Fair, King of France, and Clement V., Pope of Rome.

James Bernard D'Molay, of Burgundy, was, at this time, the Grand Master, and held his court at the Island of Cyprus. Under the pretence of initiating a new crusade, Philip invited D'Molay to remove the seat of his government to Paris. Unsuspicious of treachery, the Grand Master, accompanied by his subordinate officers, and fifty-four chosen warriors of the order, entered Paris early in October, 1307. On the thirteenth day of the same month, the entire company was suddenly arrested by the King's soldiers, and thrown into prison. William of Paris, Inquisitor, and Archbishop of Sens, ordered their trial to be commenced immediately, which arbitrary measure he attempted to justify by publishing the horrible crimes and heresies of which the order had been accused. The accusers are represented to have been some expelled Templars, who calumniated their companions at the instigation of the French monarch. The knights were charged with apostacy from the Catholic faith; worshiping the devil; practicing sorcery; adoring an idol called Baphomet; contemning the sacrament; neglecting confession, and indulging in universal vices; all of which, according to the general opinion of historians, down to the present day, were malicious misrepresentations of absurd calumnies. A gold box of relics, which the Templars used to kiss, according to the custom of the church, was what gave origin to the theory of the Baphomet. Celebrating the mass, without the elevation of the host, was called contempt of the sacrament. Confession to their own clerical members was the ground of the charge that they received absolution from their temporal superiors, and the friendship by which they were united, orginated the imputation of unnatural practices. Determined to destroy the order, for whose wealth he thirsted, Philip charged the prisoners with heresy; employed inquisitors who were devoted to his service to try them, and published their alleged recusancy far and wide, to excite public indignation against them. Overcome by long captivity, and the most exquisite tortures, confession of crimes which had never been committed, was extorted from them. Clement V. was prevailed upon to join in this treatment, and sent two Cardinals to Paris to take part in the examination, and impart a legal appearance to the procedure. Little in fact was proved against the Templars, but by a decree of the Archbishop of Sens, fifty-four knights were burned alive, in 1310, who had denied every crime of which they were accused. In other dioceses of France, those victims of tyranny and avarice were treated in a similar manner. The Pope exhorted other Princes of Europe to continue the persecution. Charles of Sicily and Provence, imitated the example of Philip, and shared the booty with the Pope. In England, Spain, Portugal, Italy, and Germany, the Templars were arrested, but invariably acquitted. The inquisitions of Salamanca and of Ments also resulted in the justification of the order. Nevertheless, the Pope, at the Council of Vienne, in Dauphiny, abolished the order by a bull of March 2d, 1312. Mild treatment was promised to those who confessed, but death at the stake to those who persisted in denial. Grand Master D'Molay and Guido, the Grand Prior of Normandy, refusing the terms of clemency, on the 13th day of March, 1314, a day ever memorable in the history of the Templars, ascended the funeral pyre prepared for them in the city of Paris, in the presence of thousands, who had assembled to witness their martyrdom. The implacable Philip, and his pliant tool, the Archbishop of Sens, clothed in their robes of authority, were seated upon a dais in close proximity to the unfortunate knights. A few moments before the torch was applied to the pyre, the Grand Master D'Molay, with a dignity and solemnity alike worthy his high position and the terrible event he was about to signalize with his life, in a voice of impressive earnestness, thus addressed his regal persecutor:

"Before that God, in whose presence I expect shortly to appear, and in this, the last moment of my temporal existence, in the presence of these assembled thousands, I solemnly declare that the alleged crimes were not committed, for which so many valorous and magnanimous knights have suffered, and for which, as a last sacrifice, myself and my venerable coadjutor are now about to die; nor is the order, which I still glory in representing, justly chargeable with any offence against our holy religion. I die in full faith, and as the last act of my life, summon you, Philip of France, and Clement V. Pope of Rome, to confront me and my murdered friends before the Judgment Seat of God, within the present year, there to make good the charges you have laid against us."

Little more than a month after this event, on the 16th of April, the guilty Clement obeyed this fearful summons, and on the 29th of November thereafter, was followed by the sordid and cruel Philip.

The estates of the Templars were conferred by the Council of Vienne upon the Knights of St. John, and their treasures in money and precious stones were assigned for a new crusade. In France, the greatest part fell to the crown. The Pope also retained a large sum for himself. The general confiscation of the property of the order failed to destroy the organization. The undying principles still remained to vivify and re-animate it afresh, with all the purity, magnanimity, and excellence which characterized it in the day of its greatest prosperity. Its military power was forever gone. Its achievements, gathered into history, remained to illustrate its renown to after times.—H. L. Hosmer.

Lodge Libraries.

The long evenings and stormy weather are at hand, and Masons in their lodges, and they and their families at their firesides, need and should have books and periodicals to amuse and instruct each other. Few exercises are more healthy than reading aloud, few accomplishments more desirable and profitable, and no place better suited for the exercise and acquisition than the family circle. And what could more exalt the real character of a lodge, and its estimation in the minds of our families, than its possession of a small, well-chosen library of books and periodicals, properly used by its members, and loaned for the use of their families?

We write not for the benefit of our lodges in cities and large towns, where, generally, reading matter is abundant and public libraries are found; or where a number of lodges can unite and furnish a good library in common at a trifling expense to each member. But we have in mind, at present, our village and country lodges—each separate and distant from others—the membership limited, and often the members not overabundant in "worldly gear." We thoughts and sympathies are with these and their families, and our plans are devised for their benefit. They say, "We want and need such a library, but our means are inadequate to procure one. What, therefore, shall be done?"

I. Listen. Nearly every family has some books—books that have been read over and over again, until it is a weariness to think of opening and looking over their contents. And yet there are neighbors to whom those books are new, and to whom a perusal would give much pleasure. Now, suppose that at your next lodge-meeting each brother agrees to furnish one—two—three—five such works to a common library. Here are twenty—thirty—fifty members; and if only each one can bring one book that the families of the others have not read, you have at once books enough to supply each family with two books per week for some twenty to thirty weeks, without one cent of outlay! It only requires a small blank-book in which to enter the books and owners' names, and to whom lent, so as to secure their return when read. Even if each book should be fairly worn out by so much use, its owner has secured the reading of some 20 or 50 other volumes—an ample payment for his often-read book.

"But we need some lively and interesting magazines and papers, also." Certainly—and they can be had very cheaply also, thus:

II. Let the lodge subscribe, and pay for out of its lodge-funds, one or more copies of each of our Masonic periodicals—of which we now have a dozen, and all very good. Each Mason who can afford it should have at least one Masonic periodical for himself and family. Then let each member of the lodge contribute a stated sum—ten cents per month, or cash down for three months ahead—and let that amount be used to procure some of the best literary magazines now published. In this way four, or five, or more can be procured. Let these be taken by members in turn, according to some fair rule mutually agreed on, and in a few months (for each month will add four, five or more numbers to those already on hand) every family will have had the reading of all the Masonic periodicals, and of all the best literary monthlies now published, at a very trifling cost, indeed, to each Mason.

III. Where there are a dozen or a score of members who can afford it, a club can be formed to procure the reading of the best new books and magazines, at a small cost to each. Say twelve members contribute one dollar a month for one year, and pay up a few months in advance to start with; the books and monthlies thus procured in one year would keep all in as much reading as any business man would need for himself and family. But they should be read by others also. As soon, therefore, as this select club is done reading them, pass them over to the larger number of lodge-readers, and let them go on circulating until they have been read by the entire brotherhood and sisterhood of that community.

Either of these plans, and all of them combined in one, is perfectly simple, practical, and within the means of almost any lodge in our land. All combined in one by any lodge will furnish an abundant supply of the best (the most interesting and most instructive) reading-matter that can be procured by the wealthiest family in the community. The influence of one winter's reading of such books and periodicals in the families of our Institution, in any place, would tell greatly on the elevation of thought, of sentiment, and of the characters of the members of such lodge.

Brethren, what think you of these cheap plans for obtaining lodge libraries? Improve them if you can; but, whatever you do, fail not to procure the books and papers, and to read them.

Editors, please notice the above plans, and give them the powerful aid and influence of your recommendations. The more our brethren and families read, the greater will be the circulation, and the stronger the support, of the periodicals devoted to Freemasonry.

To our Masonic Exchanges.

We have received a letter from Bro. Geo. Bease, editor of the Masonic Record, Bombay, E. I. Bro. Bease requests us to procure for him exchanges between the American Masonic periodicals and the Record. If our co-laborers in the quarry will comply with Bro. Bease's request they will confer a favor upon him, and they will receive in return a valuable Masonic magazine, and especially so to us in America, for it contains information from a country of whose Masonry we know very little. Direct "To the publisher of the Masonic Record, at the Education Society's press, Bycull, Bombay, via Southampton." The postage is 6 cents.

Record S. Reynolds.

In April, 1837, we took a sad and sorrowful leave of our father's family, in Montpelier, Vt. Our oldest brother and sister were far away in the West, and we were soon to follow. Father and Mother soon passed over to the Silent Land, and years after, the grave and quiet youngest brother, Record, with nearly all the others of the family, came west, and he passed us northward to the Pacific coast, where he has since dwelt. He last resided at Gold Hill, Nevada, where, with his wife, he accumulated some estate and maintained an honored position as a citizen and Mason. The youngest of ten children, at the age of 39 years, in the midst of manly pride and vigor, he has yielded himself, after a short and painful struggle, to the relentless messenger, whom none may disobey. The circle is broken, and another may soon follow.

He was buried with Masonic honors, and the fire department and citizens assisted in the funeral rites. Peace to thine ashes, Brother, until we join thee and our kindred in the general resurrection.

Our Present Status.

Eighteen years since, we were elected Grand Secretary of the Grand Chapter, and, the following week, Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge. Two years subsequent thereto, we were mainly instrumental in organizing the Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters, and were elected Grand Recorder. These stations we have held until the recent convocations. Our eldest son succeeds us as Grand Recorder, and we hold no position in the Grand Council. We still retain the first station to which we were elected in the Grand Chapter, and R. W. Bro. Orlin H. Miner, the present State Auditor, succeeds us as Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge. The brethren of that august body have seen fit to elevate us to the position of Grand Master—the most elevated and responsible position in Masonry. If we do not reflect honor upon the position, we devoutly hope that we may escape disgrace. The responsibilities are vast, duties multiform, and cares unceasing. We shall do all that lies in our power to discharge the high trusts committed to our charge, and in this we look for the cordial assistance of the grand officers, our deputies, and all our brethren.

The Freemason and the Trowel.

In the September number of The Trowel we published an article showing that The Trowel published more matter for one dollar than any of its Masonic cotemporaries did. The Freemason takes us to task for it in a good natured way, and attempts to prove that we are wrong by quoting its club rates, and the full price of The Trowel. According to the lowest price of both papers, the amount furnished for $1.00 is as follows:

Including advertisements—

Freemason, No. of pages	192
Trowel " " "	192

Exclusive of advertisements—

Trowel, No. of pages	176
Freemason, No. of pages	172

Like the editor of the Freemason, we would not have started this question, but it was originally forced upon us.

The Lord's Prayer of Freemasonry.

This is a poem originally dedicated to the present King of Prussia, upon his embracing Freemasonry. It is translated from the German, and published by August Huncke. It is a fine chromo-lithograph, the poem is surrounded by a border or framework representing the design of King Solomon's Temple. This fine picture would be an ornament to a lodge-room or private residence. Size 19x24 inches. For sale at this office. For terms, see advertisement.

No person can be admitted into a Masonic procession, except he be a Mason. Whenever a Mason dies, who is a member of any other order or society, which desires to bury him with its peculiar ceremonies, the manner in which the ceremonies of each order shall be performed, and what pall-bearers shall have charge of the body, is a matter of amicable and courteous arrangement. But the Masonic funeral ceremonies must be separately and distinctly performed, and none must be admitted into the Masonic procession, except Masons. Hence, in answer to the query of Bro. Z. J. Daniel, the committee report that it is a violation of Masonic law to admit into funeral processions pall-bearers of any other society, who attend as members of that society.—Alabama.

Visiting Brethren.

There is a very confused idea in the minds of many brethren in regard to the rights and duties of visiting brethren, as well as in regard to the duties of the lodge they visit. We have heard men say often, "I should like to see any lodge refuse me admission," feeling confident of their ability to prove their standing as Masons. Such expressions argue an entire ignorance of the rights of the lodge. No brother has a right to demand admission to any other than his own lodge, and if he be admitted elsewhere, it is an act of courtesy to him. By such act, however, he becomes, when admitted, the guest of the lodge, who then assumes certain duties towards him. To our view, these duties are not fully discharged in the mere act of admission. A man simply admitted to any assembly, especially of strangers, is in a position more or less embarrassing, and should be so welcomed, when coming among brethren, that he may feel truly at home. It would be far kinder to deny a visitor entrance altogether than simply allow him to pass the portals, and then shift for himself; and, the labors of the evening ended, leave as he came, a stranger among kindred.

We have visited where, without any fuss or parade, we were made to feel that we were among brethren, and welcome; and again we have found ourselves—elsewhere—and for our part we prefer the former.

We know that lodges are sometimes beset with somewhat too many visitors, but the remedy is in their own hands, and we had far rather be denied admission, than to be grudgingly received.

Hereafter we shall say a word regarding those who are somewhat too fond of visiting for frivolous or unworthy purposes.—Courier.

The Russian Government having forbidden the Poles to speak Polish on the streets, and at the theaters, the educated classes of Warsaw, when they leave their houses, speak French or English, and, when they now and then utter a Russian word, they pronounce it intentionally in a very ludicrous manner. The ladies of Warsaw, especially, are firmly determined not to be dragooned into speaking Russian. Whenever a Russian addresses them in his native language, they shake their heads in feigned surprise, and say that they do not understand a word of it. Since instruction in the Polish language is prohibited in the city schools of Warsaw, only one-tenth of the pupils who formerly visited them attend. The hatred prevailing between the Russian officers and the higher classes of Polish society, is intense. The former are entirely excluded from the parties given by the latter.

ILLINOIS GRAND BODIES.

GRAND LODGE.

This M. W. body assembled in Representatives' Hall, Tuesday, Oct. 6th. M. W. Bro. J. R. Gorin, Grand Master; R. W. Breth. Chas. Fisher, Deputy; D. C. Cregier, S. G. Warden; J. A. Hawley, J. G. Warden; Harrison Dills, G. Treasurer; H. G. Reynolds, G. Secretary; Rev. D. P. Bunn, G. Chaplain; N. Bateman, G. Orator; W. Breth. J. C. Reynolds, Dep. G. Secretary; C. H. Flower and H. C. Callender, G. Sw. Bearer; Geo. E. Lounsbury, S. G. Deacon; D. A. Cashman, J. G. Deacon; O. N. Stafford, R. D. Lawrence, G. Stewards; John P. Ferns, G. Tyler.

The meeting was also graced by the presence of P. G. Masters Lusk, Lavely, and Bromwell, and P. D. G. Masters Hibbard and Ring. About four hundred and fifty lodges were represented, and over five hundred representatives were present. In consequence of the pressing duties which devolve upon us, we shall not enter into details this month.

The first day was occupied in opening, hearing the address, and receiving reports of committees, several of which had been laboring for several days. The report of Judge Cunningham, from the Committee on Lodges U. D., was exceedingly able, and elicited general admiration. The report of Bro. Ide, from the Committee on Chartered Lodges, evinced uncommon labor and thorough research. From a hasty examination of the returns—all we were able to give—we could not have believed it possible that so many lodges were liable to exceptions. Those which escaped were the exceptions. The report is still open to explanation, and upon making a satisfactory one, and paying up balances, the Grand Secretary has authority to amend by striking out. Each lodge will be notified, where explanation or payment is practicable, and opportunity will be afforded for amendment.

The report on Grievances, by Bro. Hudson, was very full, as we personally know that the labors of the committee were patient, impartial, and constant.

The report on Mileage, by Bro. Barnard, was made in good time, after exhausting labor and careful calculation.

The report on Finance is necessarily among the last, but when made, by Bro. Lowe, was complete in all its parts, lacking nothing.

The report on Correspondence, presented by Bro. Blakesley, is the most complete of any ever made to the Grand Lodge.

Bro. Levanway submitted the report on Obituaries, which is up to the standard of the admirable report of last year.

The eminent character of our Judiciary was fully sustained by Judge Bromwell.

The report on Credentials, by Bro. Flower, was the first made, and but few additions were made afterwards.

The grand bodies still remain in Springfield, and but few, if any, of the amendments to the by-laws were adopted.

The Committees on Work, Manual, and By-Laws, and Grand Lodge Hall, were continued.

National Convocations at St. Louis.

In the midst of severe labors and preparations to meet our grand bodies in this city, we went to St. Louis as a member of Elwood Commandery, and as a representative by proxy in both the General Grand Encampment and General Grand Chapter.

The receptions and displays were very fine; but the procession and escort of the grand bodies on Tuesday, Sept. 15th, exceeded any Masonic display ever seen west of the Alleghanies. The Grand Commandery of Missouri, under the command of R. E. Sir Geo. Frank Gouley, marshalled by Sir Frank Aglar, Capt. General, were the escort, while full eight hundred Templars in full uniform were in the procession. Their march through the city was like a triumph, and the banners and music gave inspiration to the scene. M. E. Sir Henry L. Palmer, Grand Master of Templars, and M. E. Comp. John L. Lewis, General Grand High Priest, with their associate grand officers, were provided with carriages, while the splendid and unsurpassed Wisconsin Commandery, under the command of E. Sir A. V. H. Carpenter, served as body guard for the Grand Master. Apollo Commandery, Chicago, E. Sir T. S. Gurney Commander, Elwood Commandery, E. Sir P. A. Dorwin Commander, and Quincy Commandery, Quincy, E. Sir Jos. Robbins Commander, with large delegations from all the commanderies in Illinois, were in attendance. To give details in our columns is impossible. Where all did their best, and all tried to excel, it would be folly to enlarge.

Provisions, delicacies, wines, free rides, and unbounded hospitality prevailed. The city authorities, Templars, Royal Arch Masons, and Scotch Rite Masons all vied with each other, and united in entertaining their guests.

In the evening a royal and munificent banquet was given to the General Grand Chapter by the Grand Chapter of Missouri, M. E. Martin Collins, Grand High Priest. The display of delicious fruit, costly viands, tempting confectionery, and abundant food, was all that a hungry man or a refined epicure could desire.

The cloth removed, a speech of welcome was made by the courteous and chivalrous Martin Collins, Grand High Priest. This speech will be given in full hereafter. Speeches were made by Comp. Lewis, G. G. H. P., Comp. Buck, Deputy, and by Comps. Fellows, Dodge, Pike, Hutchinson, Mackey, Caldwell, Anderson, Gouley, and Worrell. Dr. Guilbert, of Dubuque, responded eloquently on behalf of the press.

The general grand bodies opened on Tuesday, but soon adjourned until the following day. We must wait for the proceedings of both in order to do them justice.

In the Grand Encampment, the kingly and knightly Palmer is succeeded by the courteous and able Gardner, of Mass.; and in the General Grand Chapter, the accomplished and scholarly Lewis, of New York, gives place to the noble Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of his own State, James M. Austin, M. D., of New York City, while our late associate, J. W. Caldwell, of Cincinnati, still keeps the records.

The Grand Chapter of the District of Columbia was recognized, all disabilities growing out of its formation were removed, and the Potomac Chapter was taken under the wing of the general grand body.

The difficulties in Delaware were referred to the G. G. H. P., and we look for a recognition of a grand chapter in that State ere long.

The excursion upon the river, on Wednesday, was the event to be remembered. Three boats, the Belle of Alton, Mississippi, and Lady Gay, were chartered, and guests, visitors, and residents, with their ladies, were escorted by lively music, under a genial sun and balmy atmosphere, to the boats, where a splendid banquet was in preparation. A gala trip up the river several miles, with banners displayed, flags flying, and streamers floating in the breeze, welcomed along shore by martial music and the roar of cannon, and the boats turned south to Jefferson Barracks. Then followed such a banquet as only boatmen can prepare. A rousing salute from brazen throats at Jefferson Barracks welcomed the gay and gallant visitors upon the broad and beautiful parade ground. The corps of engineers, there stationed, soon had the grounds under guard, and a grand parade of Templars was formed by Gen. John Cook, acting Capt. General of Elwood Commandery.

Returning, an accident befell the Mississippi, but the passengers were quickly and safely transferred to the Lady Gay, and soon arrived, all well, at St. Louis.

On Thursday, the Southern Supreme Council convened, Albert Pike presiding. It was a pleasant meeting, and the welcome by the Supreme Commander was graphic, cordial, and fraternal; so was the response by Bro. Lewis, Deputy Sup. Com. for the Northern Jurisdiction. The banquet, by O'Sullivan Grand Lodge of Perfection, T. E. Garrett presiding, was a more finished and recherche affair than any previous one. The welcoming address was a fine old-fashioned greeting, while Pike, Mackey, Lewis, Simons, Hillyer, Austin, Blaney, Gardner, Dean, Collins, and others, made the hours pass quickly by. It was a feast among men of soul, heart, sympathy, and intellect. More in November.

AGED MASONS.

A Sketch of the Oldest Living Mason.

NORTHWESTERN LODGE No. 105,
PRESCOTT, WIS., Aug. 8, 1868.

Bros. H. G. Reynolds & Son, Editors Trowel:

As you solicit communications from your readers on matters of interest to the Craft, I send you a brief sketch of three aged Masons, now residing within the jurisdiction of this lodge.

Jehiel Beardsley, now living with sons in this county, is 79 years of age. He has been a Mason forty-five years, having been made a Master Mason in Au Sable Lodge, Essex county, New York, in 1823. The lodge was broken up at the time of the Morgan excitement, but afterwards Mr. Beardsley helped to re-organize it, and is now a member of that lodge. His health is poor, and his distance from the lodge here renders it impossible for him to meet with the brethren.

Maj. P. P. Furber, of this place, one of the early pioneers in the West, is a hale, vigorous man, 80 years of age this month. He was made a Master Mason April 5th, 1811, by Humane Lodge, Rochester, N. H., and has consequently been a Mason over fifty-seven years. He is the only living one among the members of the lodge at the time he was raised. Bro. Furber often meets with the lodge here, but his affiliation is with Ancient Landmark Lodge, St. Paul, in which city he resided for some time.

Mr. David Stiles, now living in this place, is probably the oldest living Freemason in the world. He is a chapter Mason, and bright in all the degrees. I can not do better than extract the following editorial article from the Prescott Journal of June 12th, 1868, with the assurance that all its statements are authentic:

> A few weeks ago we briefly stated that Mr. David Stiles, now stopping with his granddaughters in this city, had reached the remarkable age of 102 years.
> We yesterday enjoyed a very pleasant visit with Mr. Stiles, and a few facts in regard to him will not fail to be interesting to our readers.
>
> It gives one a sense of awe to sit and converse with one who bears the weight of a hundred and more years, who twice voted for Gen. Washington for the Presidency, who speaks knowingly of the fashions before the Revolution. It is history vivified. No one would suspect Mr. Stiles' extreme age from his conversation or appearance. He has now more vigor than most men of seventy, and seems likely to live many years yet. His step is reasonably firm, his mind clear, his memory tenacious, his disposition cheerful and social, his voice unbroken, and his conversation enlivened with touches of sentiment and wit.
> Mr. Stiles was born in Woodbury, Litchfield county, Conn., May 21, 1766, and is therefore a little over 102 years old. His first wife was Martha Ransom, daughter of Ebenezer Ransom, of Vergennes, Vt., whom he married in 1798, and by whom he had three children. His second wife, Elizabeth Cummings, who lived near Plattsburg, N. Y., he married in 1809, and she died at Hazel Green, in this State, in 1847, having borne him ten children.
>
> Mr. Stiles followed, or rather led the advance of civilization westward to the Mississippi, having located at Hazel Green, in Grant county, Wis., in 1839.
> His Masonic history is alike interesting and honorable to him. He has been a Mason 71 years, and is no doubt the oldest Mason on this continent. He was made a Mason at Toronto, Canada West, December 27, 1797, when Wm. Jervis was Grand Master of Canada. The lodge at Toronto was No. 16 of that jurisdictien. He has assisted in forming very many lodges, and is now a member of Hazel Green Lodge No. 43, of this State. He is not, like too many, a Mason merely in name—a rough ashlar—but he has been a devoted student of its teachings, and faithful follower of its precepts. His memory holds intact its lectures, and he is truly a polished stone fit for the Master's use.
> With his natural genial and cheerful disposition, sweetened by piety and strengthened by faith, with the companions of youth and the friends of middle age all gone before him, he stands on the far-out-reaching point of time, waiting for the Master's beck to cross the narrow space which keeps him from the "other side." May the call be gentle when it comes, and the answer ready and willing.

Yours for the promotion of the interests of the Craft. C. P. SARGENT.

Impostors.

NEW ALBANY, IND., Sept. 8, 1868.

Dear Brother:—A man calling himself FRANCIS SAVAGE, and holding a parchment diploma granted to FRANCIS SAVAGE by Grand Master's Lodge, of Dublin, Ireland, came to me for assistance last Saturday. He said he had been working for Jas. Hildreth, a Master Mason, foreman of Bell's foundry, Indianapolis, for five months, and was crippled with rheumatism, and on his way to Nashville, to a friend. I told him I would telegraph to Hildreth. Savage said he would return at four for the answer. He never again showed his face, thus showing himself an impostor. Grand Secretary Bramwell writes me there is no such a foundry and no such a Mason as Hildreth in the city of Indianapolis. SAVAGE is a very large man, with slightly grey whiskers, talks well, carries a cane, and walks slightly lame. Looks you well in the face, and is apt to deceive. Look out for him.

ALF. H. NUMMACHER,
Sec. and Treas. Masonic Gen. Relief Com.

CENTRALIA, ILL., Sept. 30, 1868.

Bro. H. G. Reynolds:

The enclosed will explain itself. Suffice it to say that Centralia Lodge was imposed upon by the rascal to the amount of $6. He gave his name as A. M. GREEN, of Putnam Lodge No. 124, of Campbellsville, Ky., and was trying to reach his brother, W. T. Green, near Alton, in this State.

J. C. COOPER,
W. M. Centralia Lodge No. 201.

PADUCAH, KY., Sept. 25, 1868.

Dear Bro. Hubbard:

I have just learned incidentally that an impostor named GREEN, who claims to be a Mason in distress, is in your town. He is of medium height, rather stout, of reddish complexion, and has a lame hand. He is between thirty and forty years of age. He has cheated scores of lodges in Tennessee, Kentucky, Mississippi, and other States. Spot him.

Yours, fraternally,
T. J. PICKETT.

ATLANTA LODGE, No. 59, F. and A. M.,
ATLANTA, GA., July 9, 1868.
[EXTRACT.]

WHEREAS, The M. W. Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of the State of Georgia, did at its last annual grand communication, A. D. 1867, A. L. 5867, pass the following resolution, as will appear by reference to the published proceedings of said grand communication, page 73.

"Resolved, That this Grand Lodge disclaim all connection with the institution known as 'The Georgia State Lottery for the benefit of the Masonic Orphans' Home;'"

AND WHEREAS, The said resolution, being only published in the official proceedings of said Grand Lodge, does not come to the knowledge of the public generally; and this lodge, believing that said lottery is not only from its Masonic name an injury to Freemasonry, but a source of demoralization to the public at large; be it

Resolved, That this lodge publish this preamble and resolutions in the newspapers of Atlanta, and the most prominent Masonic newspapers in the United States.

That copies thereof be forwarded to the several Masonic lodges under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Georgia, with a request that they take similar action, and publish the same for the information of the Fraternity in their several localities.

That the M. W. Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Georgia, be requested to sanction the forwarding of the preamble and resolutions to every Grand Lodge of the United States.

A true extract from the proceedings of Atlanta Lodge No. 59, F. and A. M., at its regular communication, July 9th, A. L. 5868.

NOT many years ago a worthy mechanic removed to a city from a distant State, and died before he had made acquaintances, and left his family destitute. The weather was most inclement; their home was cheerless; the mother was sick; the children hungry. One thing after another had been sold for bread, until all was gone. A crisis seemed at hand. They must die or beg. Again she searched to see if nothing remained. She found, neatly folded, a lambskin or white leather apron—the emblem of innocence, and the badge of a Mason—which she had seen her husband wear in Masonic processions. The tear came, the voice sobbed, and the heart sank. Could she part with it? Was it of any value? Would any one have it? Necessity compelled. She offered it to a merchant. He asked many questions; wrote her name and residence; supplied her wants and bid her call again. Soon might be seen a group talking earnestly together; soon the widow's uncomfortable tenement was exchanged for a neat cottage; the floor was carpeted; the furniture appropriate; the fire blinked bonnily; the children were fed and clad and gladsome, and the widow's heart was happy, and

Jurisprudence.

To the law and the testimony.—ISA. 8, 20.

DECISIONS BY THE GRAND MASTER.

1. When a lodge receives the petition and money from an applicant, the money should be paid to the Treasurer at once, and, in case of rejection, should be returned to the applicant by the lodge.

2. If the Secretary, or any other brother, retains money belonging to the lodge or subject to its order, after proper demand, he is liable to such punishment as the lodge may see cause to inflict.

3. An applicant for the honors of Masonry petitions for membership as well as for the degrees, and when raised to the third degree, he is a member of the lodge which elected him. Signing the by-laws is an important act of identity, but is not indispensible to membership.

4. It is unmasonic for a Freemason to ridicule all or any of the three great lights in Masonry, and such a person is unfit to be installed Master of a lodge.

5. Every candidate, before initiation, must solemnly avow a belief in God; a subsequent sincere avowal of a disbelief in God is a practical renunciation of Freemasonry.

6. Disbelief in the divinity of Jesus Christ does not in any sense affect Masonic standing.

Miscellaneous Reading.

The Phœnicians.

The Phœnicians, inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon, within the territory assigned to Asher, but who were never able to get possession, were the most public-spirited race of the ancient world; they excelled in mercantile pursuits, and in the sciences of geography, astronomy, and architecture. This knowledge was in a manner forced upon them by the peculiarities of the country which they had colonized. Inhabiting a barren and ungrateful soil, they were obliged by unwearied industry to correct the deficiencies of nature, and by extensive commercial enterprises to make the abundant wealth of more distant nations and fertile regions their own.

Sidon, the oldest and most powerful city of Phœnicia, five geographical miles north of Tyre, on the sea coast, is supposed to have been founded by Sidon, the eldest son of Canaan, which will carry up its origin to about B. C. 2700. The inhabitants of Sidon appear to have early acquired a pre-eminence in arts, manufactures, and commerce. They are said to have been the first manufacturers of glass, and particularly skillful in hewing timber and preparing it for building purposes.

Tyre, first the colony, then the rival, and finally the conqueror of Sidon, was built on the Mediterranean, about ninety-three miles north and east of Jerusalem. Joshua speaks of it as the "strong city of Tyre."

Josephus says: "Tyre was built not above two hundred and forty years before the Temple of Solomon," which would be two hundred years after Joshua. There were two cities of Tyre, one known to the ancients by the name of Palœ-Tyrus; the other, a later city, called only Tzor, or Tyre. The first was built on the continent where stood the Temple of Hercules. The other Tyre stood on an island opposite to the former, from which it was divided but by a narrow slip of the sea, Pliny says not above seven hundred paces.

The inhabitants of Tyre, more enterprising even than those of Sidon, pushed their commercial dealings to the extremities of the known world, and raised their city to a rank in power and opulence before unknown. They are said to have discovered the British Isles, and to have traded there for tin, lead, and skins, for which fact we have the authority of Strabo, Pliny, Herodotus, etc. Of this latter traffic, they were very jealous, and endeavored to prevent other nations from obtaining any knowledge of the situation of the country from which they obtained their tin and lead. It is related by an ancient historian that the Romans, being desirous of finding out this source of their wealth, deputed a ship, with strict orders to trace the Tyrian vessels to their destination. A captain of one of these vessels, observing this policy, ran his vessel boldly upon a reef of rocks and wrecked it. But having prepared for this event, his crew were saved. Not so the Romans. Their ship being close in the wake also struck; but the master not being aware of such an occurrence, was unable to save it and perished, with all his crew.

The country occupied by the Phœnicians, including the cities of Tyre and Sidon, was but one hundred miles in its greatest length, and from five to twenty in breadth. The coast abounded in bays and harbors, and its breadth was traversed by mountains branching from Libanus, several of which advanced their promontories into the sea. The summits of these mountains were covered with forests, which afforded to the Phœnicians the most valuable timber for the construction of their ships and habitations. This explains how it happened that the first time this people is personally spoken of in the Bible, is in the character of persons skilled in the hewing and transport of wood.

There appears to have been a friendly intercourse maintained between the Jews and Phœnicians from the first. The Jews taking a fancy to the Phœnician mysteries, sent their traditions, laws, and ceremonials, and the Phœnicians in exchange sent their mysterious doctrines and ceremonies, and thus each became conversant with the religious dogmas of the other.

Hiram, King of Tyre, had been the friend and ally of David. It is very natural, then, that Solomon should, in his emergency, seek assistance from the Tyrians in the prosecution of his enterprise; not only from the friendly relations existing, but because of their contiguity, and their pre-eminent ability to furnish mechanics and all the materials required in which the Israelites were deficient.

Tradition says that on its becoming known to Hiram, King of Tyre, that Solomon had ascended the throne of Israel, and that it was in contemplation to erect a magnificent building for the worship of the name of God, and desiring to have his own name associated with its erection, wrote a letter to Solomon congratulating him upon his accession to the throne at a time when there was peace throughout his dominions, and offering him every assistance in his power in carrying out his intentions in the building.—Pierson.

The Rod of Moses.

The Hebrew Rabbis tell wonderful stories of this rod. They relate that it originally grew in Paradise, and was brought away by Adam; that from him it passed to Noah, and so through a succession of patriarchs, till it came to be transplanted into Jethro's garden, where it took root again; that it was called Zaphir (whence Ziphorah his daughter had her name), and had the Tetragrammaton written upon it; that when Ziphorah fell in love with Moses, her father consented that she should have him if he could pluck up this Zaphir-rod, at the same time, publishing a proclamation that whoever did it first, should marry his daughter; that hereupon several lusty young men came and tried their strength in vain; but Moses, by being acquainted with the true pronunciation of the name of God, in virtue thereof did it with ease, and so not only obtained his daughter, but this rod into the bargain, with which he wrought afterwards all his wonders in Egypt.

In Exodus IV., 20, it is called "the rod of God." It is not surprising that the Hebrews should have held in great estimation the rod with which Moses accomplished such wonders in Egypt, and with which he afterwards divided the Red Sea, and brought forth water from the rock at Rephidim. In Exodus it is related that it was Aaron who performed the miracles in Egypt with his rod, at the command of Moses; but Josephus ascribes it directly to Moses, and relates that the rods of the Egyptian sorcerers appeared like dragons until the rod of Moses devoured them. Perhaps Aaron used the rod of Moses. In Exodus IX., 10, it was Moses who stretched forth his rod toward heaven, and the Lord sent thunder, hail, and fire, and afterwards (X., 13,) the locust. He also held "the rod of God" in his hand upon Mt. Horeb as he stretched forth his hands to heaven while the Israelites fought the Amelekites.

The rod of Aaron, which bore fruit and was laid up in the tabernacle as a testimony of the appointment of the Levites to the priesthood, was evidently the same rod, as in Num. XX., 9, "Moses took the rod from before the Lord, as he commanded him," and brought water from the rock. This was either the same event related in Ex. XVII., in the wilderness of Zin or Sin, the water being called Meribah, in both places, or else the same miracle was performed a second time in the same place, which is likely, as they encamped there twice in their wanderings. (Num. XXXIII.) At all events it was Aaron's miraculous rod which performed the latter miracle, and it is not likely that Moses would have been commanded to take Aaron's rod to perform a miracle which had been performed before, unless it were the same; while if this were the same event recorded in Exodus XVII., and the miracle happened but once, there is no escape from the conclusion that it was the same rod, as there he was commanded to take his rod with which he smote the river, while his taking it from before the Lord, as related in Numbers XX., shows that it was the rod which was laid up before the testimony. It was not Aaron's name which was written upon it, but the name of the tribe, Levi; and this rod must have been looked upon with peculiar reverence by that tribe as the pledge of their spiritual sovereignty over the people.

We hear nothing more about this famous rod in history, sacred or profane. It was probably destroyed with the temple. Reported traditions of its preservation are of little value. If the original ark survived the burning, the rod could not well have been in it, as the ark was only four feet, four and a half inches long, and the bible says Moses laid it before the testimony, not in it.

The rod is a symbol of power. In the hand of the prophet it represents the power of the Lord; in the hand of the sorcerer the power of magic or evil spirits; in the hand of the king it is a sceptre denoting his authority. Mythology gives a winged staff to Mercury with twined serpents upon it, signifying the speed, wisdom, and authority of the messenger of the gods. Fairy mythology assigns a rod or wand to fairies and magicians. Pharaoh's magicians were men of no mean power, for they changed their rods into serpents, "which seemed like dragons." There is no evidence of their being able to turn them back again, as the rod of Moses saved them that trouble by swallowing all the others, but it is to be presumed that they would have been able to do so.

The rod or staff of the Lord is constantly used in the scriptures as an emblem of power. In Isaiah XI., 1, "There shall come a rod out of the stem of Jesse" * * * * "he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth."

Landmarks.

1. A belief in the existence of a Supreme Being, and in the immortality of the soul.
2. That the moral law, which inculcates, among other things, charity and probity, industry and sobriety, is the rule and guide of every Mason.
3. Respect for, and obedience to, the civil law of the country, and the Masonic regulations where a Mason may reside.
4. That new-made Masons must be free-born, of lawful age, and hale and sound at the time of making.
5. The modes of recognition, and, generally, the rites and ceremonies of the three degrees of Ancient Craft Masonry.
6. That no appeal can be taken to the lodge from the decision of the Master, or the Warden occupying the chair in his absence.
7. That no one can be the Master of a warranted lodge till he has been installed and served one year as Warden.
8. That when a man becomes a Mason, he not only acquires membership in the particular lodge that admits him, but, in a general sense, he becomes one of the whole Masonic family; and hence he has a right to visit, Masonically, every regular lodge, except when such visit is likely to disturb the harmony or interrupt the working of the lodge he proposes to visit.
9. The prerogative of the Grand Master to preside over every assembly of the Craft, within his jurisdiction, to make Masons at sight in a regular lodge, and to grant dispensations for the formation of new lodges.
10. That no one can be made a Mason, save in a regular lodge, duly convened, after petition, and acceptance by unanimous ballot, except when made at sight by the Grand Master.
11. That the ballot for condidates is strictly and inviolably secret.
12. That a lodge can not try its Master.
13. That every Mason is amenable to the laws and regulations of the jurisdiction in which he resides, even though he be a member of a particular lodge in some other jurisdiction.
14. The right of the Craft at large to be represented in Grand Lodge, and to instruct their representatives.
15. The general aim and form of the society, as handed down to us by the fathers, to be by us preserved inviolate, and transmitted to our successors forever.

Freemasonry Exposed.

BY A VICTIM.

I have joined the Masonic Fraternity, Mr. Editor. I am a free and accepted son, or brother, or whatever it is, of that ancient and mysterious organization. I have belonged to many secret societies in my time; I have been an Orangeman, and a Son of Temperance, and a Fenian, and, if I remember aright, I once belonged to a gang of coiners; but this Masonic arrangement, this Institution of the compass and square, distances them all. I had often wondered what sort of a thing a Mason was—in what respect he differed from an ordinary human being. Time and again I have pumped persons who I thought knew what was what, with a view of finding out something regarding these queer men, but it was no go. Mum was the word, and those who could tell wouldn't, and those who would couldn't; for further information I was told to go and find out. I had a vague idea of my own, that a Mason was a sort of supernatural being, a regular ringtailed roarer, with horns and hoofs to match, who could come down the chimney or get in the keyhole, and disappear like a flash of lightning —a chap that could knock blazes out of a fellow with a wink of his eye, and of whom the devil himself was afraid.

There is one singular thing connected with Masonry of which you are perhaps not aware, and that is, a Mason never dies. Occasionally it is given out that a brother has departed this life, and the Fraternity is respectfully summoned to do honor to his remains, but it is all a sham, a big swindle gotten up to throw dust in the eyes of the uninitiated. The coffin is stuffed full of bricks, and deposited with due solemnity in the cemetery, while the brothers and friends are blubbering their eyes out over the graves of the dear departed, and the departed quietly enjoying himself in the back room of some hotel, preparatory to leaving for parts unknown.

It is a fact, Mr. Editor, Masons never die. They may change their appearance, and move off to other spheres, but as for dying, they don't do it. It is supposed by some, that after they have transacted wickedness enough on this earth, they are transformed into comets and meteors and go wandering through space kicking up shines and raising the devil generally. And a great many people suppose that the last meteoric display was nothing more or less than a free fight between some rival lodges that had crossed each other's path; the different colored lights betokening the different degrees they had acquired in the flesh.

Freemasonry is of ancient date, as proven by the fact that during the wet season Noah used to hold meetings in the corner of the ark. He was obliged to give it up, however, owing to the curiosity of Mrs. Noah, who, notwithstanding the fact that her husband placed a big pair of lions and a big crocodile at the door as outside guard, came pretty near finding out the secret and starting a female lodge on her own hook.

I must tell you of the perils and trials I had to undergo to become a Maso.
in question I presented mys
the lodge-room No. 66,666, sign of t cross-bones. I was conducted to an an where five or six melancholy chaps, in sa and embroidered napkins, were waiting to receive me.

On my entrance they all got up and turned back somersaults, and then resumed their seats. A big fat fellow, who sat in the middle, and who seemed to be the proprietor, then said: "Sinner from the outward world, advance!" I advanced. "Will you give up every thing to join us?" "Not if I know it," said I; "there's my wife and fourteen fine——." Another party here told me it was a mere matter of form. The fellows in the towels then groaned, and said, "'tis well." "Do you swear never to reveal anything you may see or hear this evening to any human being, nor your wife?" I said, "'pon my word I will not." Then they examined my teeth and felt my muscles, and made me put out my tongue, and then groaned again. I said, "If you don't feel well I have got a little bottle here that——." That fat man here took the bottle from me and told me to shut up. He then in a voice of thunder said, "Bring forth the goat." Another fellow then came up with a big cloth to blindfold me. "No you don't, Mr. Mason," I said, "no tricks on travelers, if you please; I don't believe playing blind man's buff with a goat. I'll ride the devil if you like, but I don't go it blind. Stand back, or I'll knock you into Smithereens." They were too much for me, however, so I had to submit and be blindfolded. The goat was then led in, and I could hear him making an awful racket among the furniture. I began to feel that I was urgently wanted at home, but I was in for it and could not help myself. Three or four fellows then seized me, and with a demoniacal laugh pitched me on the animal's back, telling me at the same time to look out for squalls. I have been in a good many scrapes, Mr. Editor; I have been in an election fight; I've been pitched out of a fourth story window; I've gone down in a railroad collision, and up in a steamboat explosion; but this goat excursion was ahead of them all. The confounded thing must be all wings and horns. It bumped me against the tables and chairs, and the stove and the ceiling, but I hung on like a Trojan. I turned front somersaults, and rolled over till I thought it was all over with me. I was just on the point of giving up when the bandage fell from my eyes, and the goat bounded through the window with a yell like a Camanche Indian giving up the ghost. I was in a lodge of Masons. They were dancing a war dance around a skull, and playing leapfrog, and turning handsprings, and the big fat fellow of the anteroom was standing on his head in the corner, finishing the contents of my little bottle. Order was soon restored, and I was led up to a desk and told to stand at my ease. The chief engineer of the establishment then put his thumb to his nose, and stretching his fingers in the shape of a fan towards me, commanded silence. The rest of the brethren did likewise, and were silent. The Governor then addressed me: Brother Knobb, you are now one of us. You are now a member of an institution that has lasted over ten millions of years. From this time forward your constitution is sound. You are impervious to light and heat, or any other atmospheric influence. You are water-proof, fire-proof, and over-proof. With impunity you may walk through the lake, or sit on a red-hot stove; with impunity drink aquafortis, rye whisky, Wahoo Bitters, or any other poisonous substance. You are free from rheumatism, dyspepsia, whooping-cough, or the measles. The sheriff dare not seize you for debt, nor the policeman for misdemeanor. You are of us and you are safe. Here is the password; with that and a big club you can get into any lodge in Christendom." I then stood the whisky and water all the way round, and I was a Mason.

The captain of a vessel just arriving in harbor directed one of his crew, an Irishman, to throw the buoy overboard. He was then stepping into the cabin. On his return the captain inquired if his order had been obeyed. The Irishman with great simplicity, replied, "I could not catch the boy, but I threw overboard the old cook."

Indian Gratitude.

"Not many years after the country of Litchfield, Conn., began to be settled by the English, a stranger Indian came one day into an inn in the town of Litchfield, in the dusk of the evening, and requested the hostess to furnish him with some drink, and a supper. At the same time, he observed that he could pay for neither, as he had no success in hunting, but promised payment as soon as he should meet with better fortune. The hostess refused him both the drink and the supper; called him a lazy, drunken, good-for-nothing fellow, and told him that she did not work so hard herself to throw away her earnings upon such creatures as he was. A man who sat by, and observed that the Indian, then turning about to leave so inhospitable a place, showed, by his countenance, that he was suffering very severely from want and weariness, directed the hostess to supply him what he wished, and engaged to pay the bill himself. She did so. When the Indian had finished his supper, he turned to his benefactor, thanked him, and assured him that he should remember his kindness, and whenever he was able, would faithfully recompense it. The Indian soon after withdrew.

"Some years after, the man who had befriended him, had occasion to go some distance into the wilderness, between Litchfield, then a frontier settlement, and Albany, where he was taken prisoner by an Indian scout, and carried to Canada. When he arrived at the principal settlement of the tribe, on the southern border of the St. Lawrence, it was proposed by some of the captors that he should be put to death. During the consultation, an old Indian woman demanded that he should be given up to her, that she might adopt him in the place of a son whom she had lost in the war. He was accordingly given to her, and lived through the succeeding winter in her family, experiencing the customary effects of savage hospitality. The following summer, as he was at work alone in the forest, an unknown Indian came up to him, and asked him to meet him at a place which he pointed out upon a given day. The prisoner agreed to the proposal, but not without some apprehensions that mischief was intended him. During the interval, these apprehensions increased to such a degree as to dissuade him effectually from fulfilling his engagement. Soon after, the same Indian found him at his work again, and very gravely reproved him for not performing his promise. The man apologized, awkwardly enough, but in the best manner in his power. The Indian told him that he should be satisfied, if he would meet him at the same place on a future day, which he named. The man promised to meet him, and fulfilled his promise. When he arrived at the spot, he found the Indian, provided with two muskets, ammunition for them, and two knapsacks. The Indian ordered him to take one of each, and follow him. The direction of their march was south. The man followed, without the least knowledge of what he was to do, or whither he was going; but concluded that, if the Indian intended him harm, he would have dispatched him at the beginning, and that, at the worst, he was as safe where he was, as he could be in any other place. Within a short time, therefore, his fears subsided; although the Indian preserved a profound and mysterious silence concerning the object of their expedition. In the daytime they shot such game as came in their way, and at night kindled a fire, by which they slept. After a tedious journey of many days, they came one morning to the top of an eminence, presenting a prospect of a cultivated country, in which was a number of houses. The Indian asked his companion whether he knew the ground. He replied eagerly that it was Litchfield. His guide then, after reminding him that he had, so many years before, relieved the wants of a famishing Indian at an inn in that town, subjoined, 'I that Indian; now I pay you; go home.' Having said this, he bade him adieu, and the man joyfully returned to his own house."

It is sad that the great poet of the human heart has made it almost a conviction that "the evil that men do lives after them, that the good is oft interred with their bones," and the idea at once springs up that we remember but evil, and forget good. It is not so. The emanation from Deity which exists in every man's heart, yearns for what is true, and lovely, and bright, and grand. It covers with the veil of regret, and the wintry sheet of silence, the imperfections of past humanity. Who is the perfect man? Not one. The race after perfection extends through eternity, and the first click of its great clock has yet to be heard; even when past, present, and future to man's comprehension, are written upon the scroll and placed among the archives of the Most High.—Giles M. Hillyer.

A Touching Incident.

The following incident of travel is narrated by a correspondent of the Daily Saratogian, N. Y. It took place on the Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad, on one of the northern trains, between Saratoga and Whitehall:

When the train halted at Saratoga, among the passengers from the West came a man of about 30 years of age, elbowing his way through the crowd and bearing in his arms a child. He was a poor man, his clothes were poor; he looked poor. Around his hat was tied a piece of soiled, worn crape. It was evidently all the mourning his scanty means would permit, for the mother of the child was dead.

This man was rough in exterior, yet his face was an honest one. He handled the baby awkwardly, yet there was a tenderness in his sad look that showed the purity of a father's love. That little fellow lay asleep on his coarsely-clad knee; a stray sunbeam glanced across its tired face. They were both tired, the father and the child, for they had come from the far West; and as he placed his hard, toil worn hand to shield it from the golden rays, there was in his look a mixture of sadness and care, as if his pent-up feelings had been so crowded back into the inner cells of his heart that even tears could have been no relief to the hidden anguish that was making his life a misery.

The poor child cried; it might be the little thing was tired; it might be it missed its mother; perhaps it was hungry; perhaps it was sick, and so it cried. The tears rolled down its baby cheeks; the father wiped away the dewdrops as they fell, and then tried to feed it. He was so awkward with the bottle—his had been a life of toil and hardship—and he knew not how to give his darling its nourishment. As he made effort after effort to stifle the cries and check the tears of his motherless babe, how he must have missed her who in his life of labor and privation had been his solace and comfort! An unbidden tear started to his eye, but he brushed it away. All who saw him pitied him. At length a woman, richly appareled, with an infant resting on the lap of the nurse beside her—she had been watching the man—said in a gentle tone, "Give me the child." The poor fellow looked at her with a look of gratitude, for there was a mother's tenderness in her voice. With humble resignation, as though it were pain to part with him, even for a moment, he gave her his boy. The woman took it; its soiled clothes rested on her costly silk; its tiny head was soon beneath her shawl, and in a moment all was still. Like the Grecian daughter who, through iron bars fed her starving father, so did this high-born lady from her breast feed the hungry child, and when, on her gentle bosom the little one lay in calm and unvexed sleep, she put aside the shawl.

The father's heart swelled with gratitude. He said, as a tear swelled in his eyes, and his voice was quick with emotion, "Thank you, I'll take him now." Then the woman's nature spoke forth, as she gently answered, "Not yet; you will wake him," and for mile after mile that noble hearted women held that poor man's child, and it was not until her own babe required such nourishment as only a mother can give, she gently rose and placed the the stranger boy with its father.

That woman was a real Freemason. She needs no initiation.—[Ed. Trowel.]

The Sexes and Amusements.

It may be laid down as a general rule that amusements which separate the sexes are dangerous. I would not press the truth too narrowly and literally; but undoubtedly it is a general truth that where women seek their amusements in one way by themselves, and men seek theirs in another way by themselves, there is in both a tendency to degeneration and temptation. God meant that men and women should live, work, and in all the functions of life—civil, social, religious, artistic, and intellectual—co-operate with each other; and their mutual relations are harmonizing and balancing, and nowhere else more than in the seeking and prosecution of amusements.

I believe that boys and girls should go to school together. As they sit together in the household, so I think they should sit together in our temples of learning. Colleges should not be for all men or women, but the same building and the same professors should be provided for both in common. And as it is in everything else, so it should be in amusements. There is much greater liability to temptation and immorality where amusement is sought in the isolation or separation of sexes.

Therefore all exhibitions of pictures, statues, all provisions for public recreation, all institutions for public amusements, should be such as to enable the people to go in groups and families.

I do not think amusements can be good generally, in a community, in which a man is ashamed to take his whole family to them. If there is anything you would not like your wife and children to participate in with you, the presumption is that it is wrong; and if there is anything you would like them to participate in with you, the presumption is that it is right. And this might be made a rule of judgment far more widely than it is now.—H. W. Beecher.

An Old and True Friend.

A gentleman played off a rich joke on his better-half the other day. Being somewhat of an epicure, he took it into his head that morning that he should like to have a first-rate dinner. So he addressed her a note politely informing her that a gentleman of her acquaintance—an old and true friend—would dine with her that day. As soon as she received it, all hands went to work to get everything in order. Precisely at twelve o'clock she was prepared to receive her guest. The house was as clean as a new pin—a sumptuous dinner was on the table, and she was arrayed in her best attire. A gentle knock was heard, and she started with a palpitating heart to the door. She thought it must be an old friend, perhaps a brother, from the place whence they once moved. On opening the door she saw her husband, with a smiling countenance.

"Why, my dear," said she in an anxious tone, "where is the gentleman of whom you spoke in your note?"

"Why," replied the husband complacently, "here he is."

"You said a gentleman of my acquaintance—an old and true friend—would dine with us today."

"Well," said he, good humoredly, "am I not a gentleman of your acquaintance, and an old and true friend?"

"Oh!" she cried, distressingly, "is there nobody but you?"

"No."

"Well, I declare this is too bad," said the wife, in an angry tone.

The husband laughed immoderately, but finally they sat down cozily together, and for once he had a good dinner without having company.

Alexander and the Africans.

FROM THE GERMAN OF ENGEL.

Alexander, the conqueror of the world, in one of his expeditions came into Macedonia, situated in an obscure corner of Africa. The inhabitants dwelt in humble cottages, and were neither versed in the art of war, nor yet subject to a conqueror. On the arrival of Alexander, he was conducted to the dwelling of their chief, who placed before him dates, figs, and apples of pure gold.

"Do they eat gold here?" asked Alexander.

"You being able, as I suppose," replied the chief, "to obtain provisions in your own country, for what, excepting this, have you come hither?"

"It is not for your gold that I have come," replied Alxander, "but to become better acquainted with the customs of your people."

"Since this is the case, then," added the chief, "tarry here as long as thou wilt."

During this colloquy, two citizens came for judgment. The plaintiff said, "I purchased of this man a piece of land, and turning up the soil, I discovered a valuable treasure. This is not mine, for I only bought the field, and have no title to the treasure contained therein; yet this man refuses to receive it again."

Then the other replied, "I am as conscientious in this matter as my neighbor. I sold him the field, with all that was therein concealed. Therefore the treasure is his own, not mine."

The judge then repeated their words, that he might be sure that he understood the meaning of each correctly, and after a little reflection thus spoke:

"You," said he, addressing the first, "have a son?—have you not?"

"I have," replied he.

"And you," said he to the other, "a daughter?"

"Yes."

"Well then, the son shall marry the daughter, and the treasure shall be their marriage portion."

Alexander seemed perplexed. "Is my sentence unjust?" inquired the chief.

"By no means," said Alexander, "but to me the decision seems strange and peculiar."

"How, then, would the affair have been decided in your own country?"

"To speak truly," said Alexander, "we should have detained the two men in prison, and have taken the possession for the king."

"For the king," said the other in astonishment. "Does the sun shine in that land?"

"Surely."

"And does it rain there?"

"Yes."

"Are there flocks and herds there?"

"Very many."

"It is well then, that the Great Being who rules over all things should permit the rain to fall upon that land, and the sun to shine there, for the sake of these innocent beasts, but you do not deserve it."

The Father--An Instructive Sketch.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

It is the duty of mothers to sustain the reverses of fortune. Frequent and sudden as they have been to our own country, it is important that young females should possess some employment, by which they might obtain a livelihood in case they should be reduced to the necessity of supporting themselves. When the families are unexpectedly reduced from affluence to poverty, how pitiful and contemptible it is to see the mother desponding or helpless, and permitting her daughters to embarrass those whom it is their duty to assist and cheer.

"I have lost my whole fortune," said a merchant, as he returned one evening to his home, "we can no longer keep our carriage. We must leave this large house. The children can no longer go to expensive schools. Yesterday I was rich. To-day there is nothing I can call my own."

"Dear husband, we are still rich in each other and our children. Money may pass away, but God has given us a better treasure in those active hands and loving hearts."

"Dear father," said the children, "do not look so sober. We will help you to get a living."

"What can you do, poor things?" said he.

"You shall see, you shall see," answered several cheerful voices; "It is a pity if we have been to school for nothing. How can the father of eight children be poor. We shall work and make you rich again."

"I shall help," said the youngest girl, hardly four years old, "I will not have any new things bought, and I shall sell my great doll."

The heart of the husband and father, which had sunk within his bosom like a stone, was lifted up. The sweet enthusiasm of the scene cheered him, and his prayer was like a song of praise.

He left his stately house. The servants were dismissed. Pictures and plate, rich carpet and furniture were sold, and she who had so long been the mistress of the mansion shed no tear. "Pay every debt," said she, "let no one suffer through us, and we may yet be happy."

He rented a neat cottage and a small piece of ground, a few miles from the city. With the aid of his sons he cultivated vegetables for the market. He viewed with delight and astonishment the economy of his wife, nurtured as she had been in wealth, and the efficiency which his daughters soon acquired under her training.

The eldest one assisted her in the work of the household and also assisted the younger children. Besides, they executed various works which they had learned as accomplishments, but which they found could be disposed of to advantage. They embroidered with taste some of the ornamental parts of female apparel, which were readily sold to merchants in the city.

They cultivated flowers and sent bouquets to market, in the cart that conveyed the vegetables; they plaited straw, they painted maps, they executed needle-work. Every one was at her post busy and cheerful. The cottage was like a beehive.

"I never enjoyed such health before," said the father.

"And I never was as happy before," said the mother.

"We never knew how many things we could do when we lived in the great house," said the children, "and we love each other a great deal better here—you call us your little bees."

"Yes," replied the father, "and you make just such honey as the heart loves to feed on."

Economy as well as industry was strictly observed—nothing was wasted. Nothing unnecessary was purchased. The eldest daughter became assistant teacher in a distinguished female seminary, and the second took her place as instructress to the family.

The little dwelling, which had always been kept neat, they were soon able to beautify. Its construction was improved, and the vines and flowering trees were replanted around it. The merchant was happier under his woodbine-covered porch, in a summer's evening, than he had been in his showy drawing-room.

"We are now thriving and prosperous," said he, "shall we now return to the city?"

"Oh, no, no, no," was the unanimous reply.

"Let us remain," said the wife, "where we have found health and contentment."

"Father," said the youngest, "all we children hope you are not going to be rich again; for then," she added, "we little ones were shut up in the nursery, and did not see much of you or mother. Now, we all live together, and sister, who loves us, teaches us, and we learn to be industrious and useful. We were none of us happy when we were rich, and did not work. So father, please not be a rich man any more."

THE TWO IMPORTANT QUESTIONS; OR, THE INDIGNANT BARBER.—Stopping for a day or two at a short distance from Boston, Jeems went to a barber's to get shaved. On entering, and casting his eye about the room, he perceived that the barber drove a double trade of tonsor and small grocer.

"Shave, sir?" said the barber to his customer, whose face sufficiently indicated the object of his visit.

Jeems made no reply, but drawing himself up to a lofty height, proceeded, in the attorney's fashion, to interrogate the barber as follows:

"Sir, you are a barber?"

"Yes, sir. Have a shave?"

"And do you also keep this oyster-cellar?"

"Yes, sir. Have any oysters?"

"Well, sir, this occupation of yours gives rise to the most horrible suspicions. It is a serious thing to submit one's head to the manipulations of a stranger; but if you can answer me a couple of questions to my satisfaction, I should like to be shaved.

The barber said he would try.

"Well, sir," said Jeems, solemnly, "do you shave with the oyster knife?"

"No, sir," said the barber, smiling.

"One question more," continued the interrogator, "and remember that you are under oath, or, rather, recollect that this is a serious business."

The barber stared.

"One question more. Do you never open oysters with your razor?"

"No, sir," exclaimed the barber, indignantly, amid a roar of laughter from the bystanders.

"Then shave me," said Jeems, throwing himself into the chair, and untying his neckcloth with the air of a man who had unshaken confidence in human nature.

Married.

October 14th, 1868, at the residence of the bride's brother, in Savanna, Ill., Sir Kt. JOHN R. ROBINSON, W. M. of Mississippi Lodge No. 385, to Miss LOUISA STEDMAN, eldest daughter of Albert Stedman, Esq.

May the pleasant ties that now bind them together be severed only in death.

Died.

In Sidney, Sept. 15, GEORGE MANFORD, infant son of Dr. G. W. Hartman, W. M. of Sidney Lodge No. 346.

This is the fifth child our brother has lost within six years.

In Perry county, Bro. Hon. H. S. OSBORN, a member of Mitchell Lodge No. 85, aged 59 years.

The deceased was formerly a member of the State Senate. The lodge passed resolutions of condolence.

In Williamsburg, Shelby county, Oct. 2d, Bro. JACOB HART, Senior Warden of Cold Spring Lodge No. 513, aged 46 years.

The deceased left a family to mourn his loss, and a reputation more durable and precious than gold. His lodge renders many tributes to his memory.

DECKER & CO.'S

IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

PIANO FORTES!

Warerooms: No. 2 Union Square, corner Fourteenth St. and Fourth avenue,

NEW YORK.

These Instruments are celebrated throughout the country, and are distinguished for

THEIR SINGING QUALITY,
VOLUME and PURITY OF TONE,
SYMPATHETIC, ELASTIC, EVEN TOUCH,
DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION,
and BEAUTY OF FINISH.

Decker & Company's Pianos have always received the First Premiums, whenever and wherever they have competed with the most celebrated makers in this country.

OUR IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

Is an invention beautiful in its simplicity and wonderful in its practical effects. It is the most compact Agraffe ever invented, and its influence upon the tone is to render it mellower, rounder, and more clearly brilliant, while it utterly overcomes that sharp, metalic quality which disfigures the instruments of all other makers.

WHY WE EXCEL.

While other Pianos are rarely in tune,

THE DECKER & CO.'S PIANOS invariably retain their Pitch and Tone.

While other Pianos are made of poor or unseasoned materials,

THE DECKER PIANOS combine the Best Materials, Skillful Workmanship, and Scientific Construction.

While other Pianos are deficient in the great requisites of a good touch,

THE DECKER & CO. PIANOS have a flexibility under skillful manipulation, which not only adapts them to the style of every performer, but which causes the player to feel en rapport with the Instrument, and affords his taste and fancy free expression.

IT IS A FACT—That philosophy of construction is not less important than fitness of material.

IT IS A FACT—That various minute, unobserved appliances, adaptations, and improvements have an influence in the tone, durability and manipulative character of a Piano, in no degree inferior to the more ostensible modifications.

IT IS A FACT—Therefore, that science, as well as experience; artistic discrimination, as well as methodic care; capital, as well as conscientiousness, are requisite in the production of a GOOD PIANO-FORTE. In our

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte

is exhibited the result of an uninterrupted, persevering regard for these facts and principles; and purchasers who have so often spoken of the uniformity of excellence in our Instruments will be led to understand how this superiority and uniformity has been attained—a result which is apparent to even ordinary judges, in the volume and richness of tone, the sustained and human character of their singing quality, while connoisseurs and critics fully indorse all that we have adverted to.

The unanimous opinion of the best artists and the most reliable critics is, that

THE DECKER & COMPANY'S

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte is the only Square Piano-Forte, which, in Voluminous Sonority, and Positive Solidity of Tone,

Can stand comparison with the Diversities.

One sits, with folded hands and dreams
Of future, glorious days;
When fame, in show'ring garlands down,
Shall deck his brow with bays.

One, o'erpowered by greed of gain,
Toils in the city's mart;
And in his hoarded wealth forgets
The culture of his heart.

One, a genius at his birth,
Sways all souls by his song;
He fires the patriot soldiers' hearts,
Through battles fierce and long.

He nerves their arms with potent strength,
He drives away despair and doubt;
He makes "retreat" a dreaded word,
And glorious the victor's shout.

One was a martyr—o'er his bier
A nation's garland hung;
He freed the bondsmen from their chains,
And then his work was done.

One is a statesman, wise, discreet,
A synonym for truth and right;
He notes the errors of his peers,
And points them out with force and might.

And women, too, they strive, like men,
Oft to climb the highest plane;
To feel the balm which science brings
To the cureless heart of pain.

God grant a helping hand to each
Who strives to climb above
The level track so many walk,
Though walking it with love.

Extracts From a Poem

Delivered at the Laying of the Corner-stone of the new State-House, at Springfield, Ill., Oct. 5th, 1868.

BY MILES BEACH CASTLE.

Hail! Glorious State—thy growth unknown before,
Hath left thee, a young giant, at Fame's door.
Like the bold eagle, soaring for Heaven's height,
Your course is upward! Progress is your right;
Queen of the Lakes, Chicago, wooing sings—
To Illinois, "Be thou my king of kings."

This prairie State—our hearts triumphant swell
As we review the past. As memories tell
How few the years since the wild Indian slew
On these same plains the kingly buffalo.
Where now three million souls in daily strife,
Imbued, and energized with Yankee life,
(Prosperity unprecedent) this State has made—
The fourth in wealth, inhabitants, and trade.

Where, then, the end? Our fancy's wildest flight
Can scarce conceive what is our children's right.
With healthful climate, mellowed in its tone
To every product of the temperate zone,
With more broad acres waiting tiller's skill
Than other State can show—and mind to till,
With streams that pulsate with the power to feel
The throb and labor of the water-wheel,
From lordly Mississippi to where is set
In conscious innocence the Calumet,
Who is there dares set bounds—limit our stride
As we press up in power, people, pride.

We've vast, free waters, our bounds hold stream and tide,
Where a world's navies might in safety ride!
We've inland port on inland sea, where rest
The flowing wealth that feeds the giant West.
Soon ship canal will bear at water rate
The many products of a growing State.
We've—wonder of wonder—that cross between
A standing cess-pool, and a Stygian stream;
Vast in its usefulness, but hard on river—
The great unwashed—oft sung—Chicago River!

We've near four thousand miles of railroad line—
From East to West—from North to South—a mine
Of wealth and power; with iron arms extending,
To common hopes the different sections blending;
Whose trains uncounted, daily sent, do test
The wants of commerce—mingling East with West,
Making Chicago the vast center—heart—
Where throbbing veins of commerce hold their mart.
That center, round which gravitate the whole
Our planet's wealth; as Earth around its pole.

Yet, not alone in Earth's rich bounties cast,
With lavish hand, o'er all our mem'ries past;
Nor yet in sordid traffic, where lust for gold
Would climb the ether vaults; or, grown more bold,
Would dare to delve in Pluto's dark domain
Their selfish lusts—their selfish hopes to attain,
Can we transmit our history—there lie
Far above, hopes, for which men dare to die?

Age o'erlaps age. Life's memories quickly fade,
The thought, battle, burial, parade—
Pass like a panorama from the view;
A fleeting moment, and our work is through.

The mightiest empires on this orb have passed!
Their splendor fled—for what of Earth can last?
Yes, many a kingdom, power, throne, now gone,
Has left but legend frail, or crumbling stone.
Time o'er the mount of glory darkening sweeps;
Then, o'er the ruins left, oblivion creeps.
Climb as thou wilt, vain man, thou art but clay,
And thy memorials pageants of a day.
Thy proudest deeds the heralds of thy doom;
Thy path to power, the journey to the tomb.
'Tis only in your monuments—yes, alone
In works of art, or reason's granite throne,
That coming ages, as they their actions cast,
Can note the fading foot-prints of the past.

We labor for to-day—the nation's pride,
Which links across a continent the laughing tide
Of separated seas; has present time
And present good in view. No Homer's rhyme
Will sing the praise of commerce, or build thought
In lofty paeau's where sordid interests wrought.

For posterity we build. The dark wave
May overthrow our present hope—the grave
Insatiate, claim the mortal, while his name
Be never written in Time's book of Fame.
While capitol, cathedral, pyramid will rise—
The proud memorials—reaching toward the skies,
The glorious beacons lighting every age,
The theme of patriot, poesy and sage.

As Time's unceasing currents onward roll,
Pregnant with life and thought, as soul on soul
Their span shall pass, as hurrying led,
They crowd the generations of the dead,
Here yet will stand these granite walls, to teach
That man is dust. In works alone can each,
By faith supported, bequeath to man a good
That lasts with time—that passes Lethean flood.

Here, then, majestic pile, with mystic rite,
We consecrate to liberty and light.
Your founders die, but ever lives their thought,
In hall, and battlement, and tower wrought.
Here stands their monument—while time shall last,
Here speaks a noble record of the past.

May the broad spread prosperity we boast
Continue ours, until from coast to coast,
Throughout the length and breadth of this great nation
We stand first in glorious constellation.

May never section 'gainst section be arrayed,
Nor thunderbolt of war unloosed, but stay'd
The party strife, the sectional hate, while peace,
Makes us more fam'd than Rome, Mecedon or Greece.

May never shadow from these towers cast,
Speak to the world of glories over—past.
But progress—enduring as this granite wall,
Be over ours, until the trumpet-call
Of the Great Architect to Earth proclaims
The closing of Time's books and of Time's names,
'Till then, may these walls stand reflecting light
O'er happy people, holding to the right.
A people strong, without disparity,
In truths eternal—Faith, Hope, and Charity.

ANCIENT AND MODERN RITES

Worked Under the General Denomination of Freemasonry.

BY TYRIAN.

NO. III.

In my last article I intimated that the French Rite of Adoption would be noticed in this article, which I will now do at length.

RITE OF ADOPTION.

Dr. Mackey, in speaking of the numerous androgynous societies which sprang up in France, says: "At length, the Grand Orient of France, finding that these mystic societies were becoming so popular and so numerous as to endanger the permanency of the Masonic Institution, a new rite was established in 1774, called the 'Rite of Adoption,' which was placed under control of the Grand Orient. This is the legitimate adoptive rite of France, and is still in existence. Among the regulations prescribed for its government by the Grand Orient were, that no men should be permitted to attend the meetings but regular Freemasons; that each lodge should be held under the sanction, and be placed under the charge, of some regularly constituted lodge, whose Master, or, in his absence, his Deputy, should be the presiding officer. He was also assisted by a female President or Mistress."

The first regular Lodge of Adoption was opened in Paris in 1775, under the sanction of the Lodge "St. Anthony." The Duchess of Bourbon was installed as the Grand Mistress, and presided over the first lodge.

This rite has four degrees, viz.: 1, Apprentice; 2, Companion; 3, Mistress; 4, Perfect Mistress. The first is but an initiatory grade, introductory in character, and is only intended to prepare the candidate for the reception of the other three.

The temptation in the Garden of Eden is the burden of the second degree, the aim of which is to remind the candidate of all the unhappy results of the first sin, from the time of its committal to the deluge.

The building of the Tower of Babel, the dispersion of the human family, and Jacob's Ladder, appear in the third degree. By the Tower of Babel and the discord which there took place, the candidate is reminded of a badly regulated family or lodge. Jacob's Ladder is introduced as an emblem of the virtues which the possessors of the rite should uphold and maintain.

The fourth degree represents the passage of the children of Israel through the wilderness; the officers representing Moses, Aaron, their wives, and the sons of Aaron. The officers are a Grand Master, Grand Mistress, Orator, Inspector, Inspectress, Depositor, Depositrix, Conductor and Conductress.

The Grand Master is the head of the lodge, and corresponds to the W. M. of a lodge of Freemasons. He is assisted in his duties by the Grand Mistress, who, however, has little to do or say, the office being simply a distinction conferred on the possessor, as a mark of respect for character and virtues. The Inspectress, assisted by the Inspector, corresponds to the S. W., the Depositrix, assisted by the Depositor, to the J. W. of a lodge of Freemasons; while the Conductor and Conductress are the Deacons. The regalia is simple, the officers wearing a blue silken sash or collar, to which is appended a gold trowel. The members wear plain white aprons and white gloves. Their lodge-rooms are fitted up with great taste and elegance, and separated by curtains into four apartments, representing the four quarters of the globe. Among the members of this rite, at the present time, we find the Empress Eugenie. The Empress Josephine at one time presided over a lodge of adoption held at Strasburg.

Among other androgynous societies, Dr. Oliver notices the following, of which no description is given—nor can we find any other mention of them. "Mopses," "Knights and Ladies of the Cork," "Green Apple," which we presume has something to do with the Garden of Eden, "Lovers of Pleasure," "Knights and Ladies of Perseverance," "Free Knights and Ladies of Paris," "Princess of the Crown," and a host of others, all now extinct.

I will leave this part of our subject, which was, after all, an after thought, and not included in the original design, by giving an extract from Dr. Oliver, showing in a manner some of the ceremonies which the neophites taking these androgynous degrees were required to pass through.

"A young lady of somewhat irritable temperament, was introduced as a candidate for admission. During the preparatory examination she exhibited a degree of nervous excitement, which attracted the observation of the Venerable or R. W. M., and he asked her kindly whether she had any confidence in her own fortitude?

"I know," she replied, "that there is danger to be encountered; but I am not afraid of it."

"Not to deceive you in this matter," responded the Venerable, "I think it right to add that your person will be exposed to the most imminent perils; and if you feel any misgivings, it would be better for you to retire unscathed than to fail in courage and resolution; for if you should be so unfortunate as to shrink from the actual presence of danger, you will expose yourself to the contempt and derision of the lodge."

"'You insult me by your doubts,' said the lady, 'exhibit your terrors, and see if I shall blanch under them.'

"She was accordingly conducted through all the usual trials of fortitude, and endured them with the courage of a martyr, and even at last, when placed on the summit of the symbolical mountain, and told that she must cast herself down from thence into the abyss below, where she saw a double row of bright steel spikes, long and sharp.

"Mimic spikes, of course," interposed Bro. Inwood.

"No, indeed," said the stranger; "they were real, substantial spikes, that would have killed a horse if he should have been impaled thereon. The word was given to throw herself down, and with a suppressed shriek, she made the required plunge; and so unexpectedly sudden was her obedience, that the Frere terrible, or guide, who had charge of the machinery, was scarcely allowed time to touch the spring before she fell recumbent at the bottom of the abyss."

"Poor creature! What became of her?" asked Bro. Inwood, highly interested.

"You shall hear. The machinery is so contrived that at the very moment when the final leap is taken, the scene changes to an Elysium of green fields and shady trees, bubbling fountains and purling streams, and beneath the velvet herbage is placed a bed of the softest down, to receive the fair body of the exhausted novice as she falls. In the present case the lady fainted, and lay for a time without motion, but she was soon restored and tranquilized by the application of essences and perfumes, and the soft and soothing influence of delicious music."—Oliver's Revelations of a Square.

ANCIENT CRAFT MASONRY.

I have now arrived at what was originally intended as the starting point of these series of articles. But it having been suggested that it might be well to include, as far as possible, all known orders and degrees conferred under the general title of Masonry, or at least under its superintendence and recognition, the plan was changed, and I now commence what was really intended as the first article.

Masonry, in this country, is divided into two divisions, in each four classes.

The first division is termed the "York Rite," (which I hold to be a misnomer, being more properly the "American Rite"), containing Ancient Craft, Capitular, Cryptic, and Chivalric.

The second division is termed "Scotch Rite," or, to use its legitimate designation, "The Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite." The four classes of this rite are similar to those of the American Rite.

In the American Rite, the four different bodies are designated the lodge, the chapter, the council, and the commandery. The first is the Ancient Craft; the second, capitular, partaking somewhat of the nature of the Ancient Craft; the third is the cryptic, which is a continuation of the Ancient Craft, and the fourth, the Chivalric, or Christian—where all that appertains to Ancient Craft Masonry is dropped.

In order to gain access to the cryptic degrees, one must be a member of the capitular and Ancient Craft—so, also, of the commandery.

In this State (Illinois) the possession of the council degrees is not required of candidates for the orders of knighthood. In regard to this matter I will speak at the proper time.

The degrees of the American rite are twelve in number, as follows: 1, Entered Apprentice; 2, Fellow Craft; 3, Master Mason; 4, Mark Master; 5, Past Master; 6, Most Excellent Master; 7, Royal Arch; 8, Royal Master; 9, Select Master; 10, Red Cross Knight; 11, Knight Templar; 12, Knight of Malta.

In some jurisdictions the degree of Super-Excellent Master is added, and placed either before or after No. 9. In others, it is left out and No. 8 is placed as No. 9, and No. 9 as No. 8. This, however, will be fully treated of in the article entitled "Cryptic Masonry."

Freemasonry is denominated operative and speculative; that is, Masonry was originally an operative science, but, as now practiced in our different bodies, it receives the title, "Speculative."

Speculative Masonry dates its origin from the building of the Solomonian Temple by Jewish and Tyrian architects and artizans. They were engaged in the construction of an earthly and material temple, to be dedicated to the worship of the Most High—a house in which God was to dwell.

The operative art having for us, at the present day, ceased, we, as speculative Masons, symbolize the labors of our predecessors by engaging in the erection of a spiritual temple in our hearts, pure and spotless, fit for the dwelling place of Him who is the author of purity.

So much has been written regarding the origin of Freemasonry, and its antiquity having been proven beyond a doubt, I shall not, at this particular place, enter into a dissertation upon the subject.

That the Institution was originally constituted as an operative one, continued as such down to the time its doors were thrown open to those who were not masons and architects in the literal meaning of these words—that the various societies and guilds of builders of the middle ages were incorporated in its folds, and that their architectural secrets were thereby preserved—is beyond doubt, and that constituted operative Masonry. But when its strictly operative workings were done away with, and the Fraternity was erected into an institution of good for mankind, seeking the improvement of society and the human race, its glorious and onward career as a speculative science commenced, and has to the present time continued, and ever will continue.

Our Fraternity is denounced by such men as the Rev. Blanchard and C. G. Finney as a religious institution, having for its object the overthrow of all the present systems of churches, denying Christ, and the eventual destruction of the Christian religion. They hang to this idea with a perseverance worthy of a better cause.

It has been well said that "In the Masonic Society we recognize and bow to the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. We believe in a resurrection, and a consequent immortality of the soul. The Knight Templar is a Christian, and the propagator of Christianity. And so in some of the degrees of the Ancient and Accepted or Scotch Rite, Christianity is recognized; but what we call Ancient Craft Masonry teaches now, and only teaches, that which might have been taught, without special revelation, centuries before the advent of the blessed Redeemer. Ancient Craft Masonry does not change with the times. It inculcates brotherly love, relief, and truth. While no atheist is allowed to enter the lodge, a trust in God and a profound reverence for His name, are among its earliest lessons. As citizens, its initiates are forbidden to be concerned in conspiracies against, but are required to be true to, the government which gives them protection. The practice of the cardinal virtues, temperance, prudence, fortitude, and justice, are enjoined. In brief, Masonry requires—nay, demands—a discharge of all our duties to God, our neighbors, and ourselves—the sum total of man's duties upon earth."

We do not claim, as Masons, to stand upon the Christian's mount. Our sphere is a lower, but, we maintain, not an antagonistic one. We never teach that Masonry is a substitute for religion in any form whatever. We never tell the initiate that Masonry is sufficient for salvation. It is his conduct in this world which concerns us. Nor do we tell him that our position is high enough. On the contrary, we, with mutual assistance, travel the same path. When he commences his ascent to the holy mount, Masonry does not interfere in any way, but leaves him to his church, or synagogue, or his bishop or pastor, Bible or Koran, according to the dictates of his own conscience, for liberty in religion and politics, as well as of person, is one of the landmarks of our Fraternity. Bad men could never have transmitted Masonry, in its purity, to the present age. Wolves make poor shepherds. When good men unite, the cement of brotherly love grows stronger and stronger with age. They organize for good and not for evil. Bad men never undertake to organize for good; they can not remain united for evil. This is one of the strongest evidences in favor of Freemasonry. If it had been, or is, the institution of debauchery, libertinism, malevolence, and treachery which these men would have us believe, it could not have lasted the many years it has.

In our Fraternity are the elements of union, strength, and mutual support. It can never be overcome by opposing principles, nor by the machinations of its enemies.

The legitimate degrees of Ancient Craft Masonry are three, viz.: Entered Apprentice, Fellow Craft, and Master Mason, and of these I propose to treat in my next article.

Communications.

Letter from M. W. Benj. B. French,

GRAND MASTER D. C., AND PAST GRAND MASTER OF TEMPLARS, U. S. A.

WASHINGTON CITY, Oct. 29, 1868.

My dear Bro. Reynolds:

I have just laid down your TROWEL of the 15th inst., which came only to-day. I have read it from Bro. Bromwell's poem—"The Lute of Israefel"—to the end, and have been interested. I congratulate you on your election as Grand Master of Masons for the great State of Illinois. Knowing how faithfully and thoroughly you did your duty as Grand Secretary, I know how well you will perform the duties of Grand Master, and so I congratulate the Grand Lodge, as well as yourself.

I feel, in my very soul, how much we of this District owe you for standing by us as you did at St. Louis, and I give you my warm thanks for the good you there did us. I trust Capitular Masonry here will now go on in prosperity, and amid that prosperity I do not believe those who so nobly defended our Grand Chapter at St. Louis, and among them yourself, will ever be forgotten.

You left prior to the holding of the lodge of sorrow, which was by far the most impressive and solemn gathering together of Freemasons I ever witnessed; and hope, ere long, we shall have the full published account of it.

I hardly know when I have ever enjoyed a sojourn in any place so perfectly as I did that week in St. Louis. The hospitality of that prince of good fellows, both as a man and Mason, Martin Collins, was extended to me without stint, and it was a luxury of my life to meet once more Mrs. Collins, who was born in this city, and whose father was my dearest friend and associate. I knew her in her earliest infancy, and was intimate with the family until they left for the Sandwich Islands, where Bro. Collins met her and married her. I saw her for the first time since she left Washington, at St. Louis, and found her only changed from an elegant, amiable, and accomplished girl, to an elegant, amiable, and accomplished wife and mother. May Heaven's best blessings rest upon that family.

But the Masons of St. Louis, of all grades, how they did pile the hospitality upon us all! I really thought they would kill us with kindness. My only regret, and it was often in my thoughts while there, was that our dear departed Bro. O'Sullivan, with his big heart and noble intellect, could not have been spared to be with us. How I respected—how I loved that good and generous brother. How I shall ever respect his memory!

I left St. Louis on Monday, the 21st of September, at half past two—or, as I have said in my journal, "at about half past two we (Bro. Buist and myself) left glorious St. Louis behind us, to live, as it always will, indissolubly connected, in my mind, with kindness and unbounded hospitality."

On Wednesday I reached New York, where I took the steamer Bristol, and arrived in Boston at 6 A. M., on Thursday, having traveled from Boston to St. Louis and back—some 3,000 miles—without the slightest accident.

I have many relatives and friends who do business in Boston and reside in its vicinity, and among them I spent a most pleasant and agreeable week, and then, with my wife, whom I left in Concord, Mass., on going to St. Louis, returned here, where we arrived on the first day of this month.

On the evening of the 2d, I commenced my grand visitations, as Grand Master, and finished them last evening, having visited every lodge, sixteen in number, personally, and made addresses, either extemporaneous or written, before each! This, Bro. Reynolds, finishes up my labors as Grand Master. I accepted the office last year reluctantly, and only because I thought I could do some good in my old age, with the avowal that it would only be for a single year. Next Tuesday the year expires, when I shall withdraw and a successor will take my place, and on St. John the Evangelist's day (our day of installation) I shall lay down the gavel of the Grand Master, which I have held eight years in all, forever!

Freemasonry was never in a more flourishing condition in this District than it now is, and in Ancient Craft Masonry perfect harmony exists, and I sincerely hope and trust that, ere long, it will be restored to every grade of Masonry. I wish you could have been with me last evening, to have attended the visitation to Acacia Lodge No. 18. I do not select this lodge as the pattern, for it is only a sample of nearly all, but name it because it happened to be the last. You would have seen more than a hundred Masons, all clothed in black, wearing white gloves and aprons, and, among them, visiting brethren from many States, and one from Constantinople! The officers of the grand lodge were received with all the appropriate honors, the lodge quartette club sang beautifully, accompanied by the organ; the Grand Secretary and Grand Treasurer then made their reports; I then addressed the lodge on "preparation in the heart," and after further singing by the club, the officers of the grand lodge withdrew.

This is but one of the sixteen visitations I have made, and every one was most satisfactory; which is the best evidence that Freemasonry is in a flourishing condition here.

While turning over the leaves of your paper, the words "The Lord's prayer of Freemasonry" met my eye. It brought to my mind that I once attempted to versify the Lord's prayer, and, as a wind-up to this rambling letter, I will append my version. No one has ever seen it before, as I copy it from my private journal, where alone it was written:

THE LORD'S PRAYER VERSIFIED.

Father in Heaven whom we bow down before,
Be Thy name hallowed ever—evermore.
Come may Thy kingdom—let Thy will be done,
As in the Heaven, so here, beneath the sun.
Give us our daily bread this day that is,
And oh! forgive our many trespasses—
As we forgive debts which to us are due,
Father in Heaven forgive our debts to you.
Should e'er temptation lead us on tow'rds wrong,
Shield us, our Father, from her syren song.
Thine are the kingdom, power, and glory—then
To all thou doest, fore'er and e'er, Amen.

Your faithful brother and sincere friend,
B. B. FRENCH.

The Eastern Star Degrees.

M. W. Bro. Reynolds:

Your correspondent, "Tyrian," in his article entitled "Ancient and Modern Rites," in the tenth issue of the present volume, has correctly quoted my sentiments concerning "The Eastern Star," and has well added his own opinion that "these degrees, when well conferred, are elegant and impressive; bunglingly conferred, they are worse than nothing." This applies with equal force to all the dramatic ceremonies interwoven through our Order. How often is the initiation—how often the beautiful middle chamber work—how often the solemn tragedy—made "worse than nothing" by bungling hands?

Your correspondent, however, has added one gratuitous remark to which I am impelled to make reply, viz.: "The reason why so much space is assigned to the Eastern Star, and every conceivable opportunity seized in which to mention it by Bro. Macoy, is due to the fact that he is largely interested in its spread." This is not only gratuitous, but ungenerous, and therefore unmasonic. How does he know that? Did he ever hear me say so? He might apply the same aspersion to all Masonic degrees if, because I am engaged in the sale of Masonic books and paraphernalia, I am to be charged with being "largely interested" in their spread. How would the remark apply to yourself, Bro. Reynolds? You, too, publish and sell. Yet, would you not deem it unmanly for an anonymous writer to charge you with being largely interested in the spread of Masonry? I think you would. But let the matter pass. Such insinuations are harmless. Some persons are nothing unless they are severe, or try to be.

Your correspondent says, "The ladies are taught or led to believe that they are receiving Masonic degrees." Now, I have heard this sort of reckless charges against Adoptive Masonry for many years, but no one undertakes to prove it. I do not believe it. I have conferred the degrees of the Eastern Star upon thousands, but no lady was ever taught or led, by me, to believe so. The statement, indeed, refutes itself; for in all the constitutions of grand lodges and the by-laws of subordinate lodges, the landmarks are so clearly laid down that it is incredible any Mason would dare inform a lady that "he proposed to make a Mason of her." Therefore, I deny his statement in toto, and defy him to the proof.

"Tyrian" has much to say in favor of the degree of "Mason's Daughter." He "gives so much space to it" and "seizes every conceivable opportunity to mention it," that I suppose "he is largely interested in its spread." Well, let him praise it. I have nothing against it. On the contrary, I think its dissemination will do good. So with the "Good Samaritan," the "Heroine of Jericho," and other adoptive degrees. Every man to his taste. I prefer the Eastern Star, and so do many others.

It is no part of my duty to defend "the present Grand Patron," who seems to find more friends in his silence than he loses by the attacks made upon him. Yet it is proper I should say he has never claimed official authority over me, nor, I think, over any one else. When he does, it will be time to inquire into the foundation of his claims to his present title.

"Tyrian," please sanctify thyself unto those things whereof you should speak, and utter the words of kindness and brotherly love.

Yours, fraternally,

ROBT. MACOY.

R. W. Bro. Cunningham presented the report of the Committee on Lodges U. D. The work, returns, and by-laws of National, Princeton, Pera, Gardner, Allin, Troy, Dorchester, Watson, Laclede, Egan, Capron, and Vesper lodges were found correct. Five lodges were found deficient in the examination of candidates for advancement; the records of five lodges did not show by what authority they were convened; the records of seven lodges were found imperfect and slovenly kept; one lodge recorded a balloting without any record of reception or reference of petition, or report thereon. One lodge provided for special regular meetings, and the same lodge provided for indefinite suspension in certain cases without charges or trial. Six lodges conferred degrees before the lapse of time required by law; one lodge admitted members by demit; one lodge held a meeting on Sunday; one lodge re-considered a balloting; one lodge gave reasons for rejection; one lodge gave no date of its meetings; one lodge conferred the second and third degrees upon an E. A. without consent of the initiating lodge, and without petition or ballot; the Master of one lodge did other business at special meetings other than that for which the lodge was convened; one initiated a candidate while open on the second degree; and the records of another show that the first degree was conferred while open on the second degree. Imperfect records and careless and incompetent Secretaries are severely dealt with. Charters were refused to eight lodges; the dispensations of seven were continued, and one was dropped altogether.

Charters were granted as follows:

The statistical table of lodges U. D. shows 735 members, 341 initiations, 282 passed, 237 raised, and 89 rejected.

The following resolutions were recommended and adopted:

Resolved, That all lodges under the jurisdiction of this Grand Lodge are prohibited from acting upon or consenting to any petition for the formation of a new lodge under dispensation, until the same shall have been presented at a regular meeting and laid on the table for one month.

Resolved, That all lodges under the jurisdiction of this Grand Lodge are hereby required to receive no petition for membership or the degrees, unless the petitioner shall have signed the same with his full name; and all lodges are hereby required to preserve in their records the full name of each person hereafter petitioning for membership or the degrees.

The credentials of the representative of the Grand Lodge of Nova Scotia were read, and he was introduced by the Grand Master, and after some remarks, on motion of M. W. Bro. Bromwell, R. W. John Scholfield was appointed as the representative of the Grand Lodge of Illinois near the Grand Lodge of Nova Scotia.

W. Bro. J. C. Reynolds, from the Committee on Chartered Lodges, presented a complete report, setting forth every error in the returns, and every error in the work of the several lodges. The errors in the returns are blanks unfilled, certificate omitted, unsigned, or imperfect, and want of lodge seal. The errors in work of lodges are, no date of reference of petition, election, or initiation, passing, or raising of candidates, election or admission of members affiliating, want of completeness in names, omission of the ages and profession or occupation of candidates for initiation or applicants for affiliation, balloting for applicants for degrees or affiliation in less than one lunar month from the date of reference, dropping for non-payment of dues, suspension for non-payment of dues without charges or trial, omission of officers' names in list of members, omission of names reported last year, insertion of non-resident members' names in the list of residents, reporting those living out of the jurisdiction of the lodge, but living in the State, or engaged in the service of this State or of the United States, or whose families reside in this State, as non-residents; omission of brethren raised, admitted or reinstated from list of members, or from list of demitted, dead, suspended, or expelled, where such was the case; a great deficiency in dates, repeated and various violations of lodge by-laws, failure to note dispensations to do work out of time, and many imperfect recapitulations. We omit the footings of statistical tables until they can be carefully revised. The number of resident members, including those in lodges U. D. and not returned, will nearly reach, if not exceed, 30,000, while the non-residents will bring the sum total up to 32,000. The initiations exceed 4,000, and the rejections more than 1,700.

The labor of the committee was immense, the report searching, and was intended to make errors, omissions, and carelessness odious, and good work, care, and complete and neat returns meritorious. Let our lodges elect good Secretaries, who will inform themselves, take pride in the work, and who can be mortified over errors and mistakes.

Past Grand Master Brown, of Washington, Ter., was introduced by W. Bro. Avise, and welcomed to a seat in the East.

W. Bro. Levanway, from the Committee on Obituaries, made report in relation to Gen. Isham N. Haynie, P. M. Marion Lodge No. 130, and Cairo Lodge No. 237, and who died in Springfield, May 21, 1868, at the age of forty-three years; Elijah VanHorn, who was made a Mason Dec. 27, 1808, bore the burthens and persecutions of anti Masonic times, and died March 23, 1868, aged eighty-two years; B. M. Atherton, formerly of New Hampshire, who died in Iowa, Dec. 22, 1867, aged eighty years, and was buried at Morris, in this State; Alfred S. Mayfield, an initiate of Mt. Nebo Lodge No. 76, and the first Master of Girard Lodge No. 171, who died in Carlinville, Feb. 21, 1868, age not given; A. R. Sawyer, formerly Master of Bunker Hill Lodge, a Christian Mason, who died May 21, 1868, aged thirty-five years.

We give the following report on the address of the M. W. Grand Master, by W. Bro. W. G. Swan, entire:

To the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Illinois:

The undersigned committee, to whom was referred the address of the Most Worshipful Grand Master, after a careful consideration of the same, submit for the approval of this Most Worshipful Grand Lodge, the following report:

We greatly rejoice that the preceding year has been one characterized by an existence of harmony, fraternal feeling, and prosperity to a degree unequaled in the previous history of our Order in this jurisdiction, and we would unite with our Most Worshipful Grand Master in according most sincere and grateful praise to Him "from whom all blessings flow," for His manifold dispensations of goodly gifts.

As the information relative to dispensations issued, contained in said address, is matter that has been fully considered and reported upon by the Committee upon Lodges U. D., no reference to the subject will be necessary in this report, except that we desire to improve this occasion to most earnestly recommend that at this communication of the Grand Lodge, some action be taken that will tend to restrict, to as great a degree as may be consistent with the true interests of our Fraternity, the creating of Lodges U. D. during the succeeding Masonic year, as, in our judgment, the too rapid increase of new Lodges is calculated to prejudice the healthy growth and prosperity of our constituent Lodges, and to the succeeding M. W. Grand Master, and the lodges that may be called upon to assist in the formation of these new lodges, we commend the whole subject, to the end that the future usefulness and glory of our noble Order may be best conserved in this important particular.

In relation to the districting of the State, as authorized by the Grand Lodge at its last annual communication, we would recommend that the M. W. Grand Master be again authorized to appoint twelve District Deputy Grand Masters, to discharge his duties in their respective districts as he may direct, during the coming year, and we propose the adoption of the following additional by-law, which, under the rule, must lay over one year:

> The M. W. Grand Master shall divide this jurisdiction into twelve districts, over which he shall appoint, at each annual communication, twelve officers, to represent him in the performance of his duties, as directed by him, said officers to reside in the districts over which they may be placed, and to be known as "District Deputy Grand Masters."

The report of the historian covers the formation of the Grand Lodge of 1822, the Constitution of the same, and the proceedings of the Grand Lodge for 1822, '23, '24, and '26, also, the Lodges subordinate thereto and formed by the same, complete; also, the formation of the Grand Lodge of 1840, and the history of the Lodges which formed it, complete. It covers over six hundred pages of manuscript, and includes important information, obtained from the jurisdictions of Missouri, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Pennsylvania. In the compilation of this valuable work, W. Bro. J. C. REYNOLDS, the Historian, has evinced, throughout his indefatigable labors, a talent and assiduity entitling him to the thanks of every Mason in our State, and your committee recommend that the grateful acknowledgements of this Grand Lodge be tendered to M. W. Grand Master GORIN for the conception of this laudable enterprise, and likewise to W. Bro. REYNOLDS, for his successful accomplishment of the same; and we also recommend that the first four officers of this Grand Lodge be authorized to arrange for the publication of this work in such manner and at such time as may be by them deemed expedient, one copy of the work, when so published, to be presented to each of the constituent Lodges.

In relation to the subject of the proposed erection of a Grand Lodge Hall, your committee would say that they strongly endorse the views of the M. W. Grand Master as to the urgent necessity existing for an edifice fully commensurate with the dignity and reputation of this M. W. grand body, and of the ancient Craft and we would recommend to the members of this Grand Lodge the great importance of agreeing upon some plan, by the execution of which the speedy accomplishment of this most desirable enterprise may be realized.

The recommendations of the M. W. Grand Master in relation to the distinguished services of our R. W. Bro. HARMAN G. REYNOLDS, are fully concurred in by your committee. Bro. REYNOLDS has served the Craft as Grand Secretary for this grand jurisdiction in the most zealous and faithful manner for a period of eighteen years, concluding with this communication, and it is a fact acknowledged by all, that his reports and official correspondence have secured to him the well-earned commendations of the various Grand Lodges (both domestic and foreign) upon this continent; and to him, perhaps, more than to any other one man, is this Grand Lodge indebted for its exalted position, as second to none in point of high character and influence. Your committee gladly indorse the recommendation of the M. W. Grand Master as to the propriety of rendering to R. W. Bro. REYNOLDS, upon his retiring from his position is Grand Secretary, some suitable testimonial, as a proper recognition of the benefits that have been derived by this M. W. Grand Lodge through his laborious efforts in its behalf.

In conclusion, your committee would again congratulate this Grand Lodge upon its present prosperity, and influence, and recommend that the thanks of this M. W. Grand Lodge be tendered to M. W. Grand Master JEROME R. GORIN, for the able, faithful, and impartial discharge of his onerous duties during the past Masonic year.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

WM. G. SWAN,
L. W. SHEPHERD,
GEO. W. BRIGHT,
GEO. W. JONES,
Committee.

V. E. Sir J. R. Gorin, Deputy.
V. E. Sir A. W. Blakesley, G. Gen. P. T.
V. E. Sir C. E. Munger, G. C. G.
Rev. and V. E. Sir C. A. Gilbert, Gr. Prelate.
E. Sir J. M. Pearson, G. S. W.
E. Sir A. J. Dunning, G. J. W.
E. Sir R. H. Foss, G. Treas.
E. Sir J. H. Miles, Gr. Rec.
E. Sir Daniel Dustin, G. St. B.
E. Sir W. D. E. Andrus, G. Sw. B.
E. Sir A. S. Converse, Gr. Warden.
E. Sir L. K. Osborn, G. C. G.

Nearly every Commandery was represented.

After the usual precautions, the Grand Commander said:

Swift as a weaver's shuttle has sped the year since we met in annual conclave; and I rejoice in my ability to give you a truly fraternal welcome, in which no mournful cadence mingles; for, remarkable as it may appear, not one who clasped hands with us on that occasion has been called from earthly labor to heavenly rest, for which every true heart will throb with fervent thanksgiving. I trust the same unanimity of action and knightly courtesy which has always characterized our annual conclaves will prevail during this.

After the opening ceremonies and the appointment of committees, the Grand Commander delivered his annual address, all of which, except that portion which may be considered local, is here given:

SIR KNIGHTS: Most gladly do I greet and welcome you to this annual re-union. Life and health in this grand old world demands first of all that a psalm of thanksgiving ascend from our hearts to Him whose merciful providence has guarded and blessed us, and to-day fills our souls with peace and joy. The genial sun and the descending shower have answered the prophetic labor of the husbandman with a generous fulfillment, and the granaries of the land are filled, so that the shadows of want cannot fall upon the homes of our people for a year to come. With its philanthropic heart alive to all that can affect the welfare of humanity, our Order hails all these tokens and assurances of peace and prosperity with glad thanksgiving. We stand pledged by every sacred obligation for human weal and progress. As Templars we are toiling to lift up the race to the enjoyment of a true Christian civilization. Lifting up our banner of the Cross as the sign of that invincible power which moves steadily onward to redeem humanity, we inscribe thereon our sacred motto, "In Hoc Signo Vinces," and filled with its inspiration we march forward in our way of toil and achievement. Catholic in our aims and spirit, we welcome all the ameilianis of our time. We are jealous of neither sect nor party, but utter a hearty God-speed to all who are toiling to enlarge the boundaries of human progress and pour into human life the streams of a deeper and richer experience. We have never uttered a word or performed an act which could be justly construed into an attack upon the Christian church. Indeed, this were impossible without a plain violation of our purpose and obligation. It has been with pain, therefore that we have witnessed during the past year an attempt to bring the church and Freemasonry into collision. The warfare made upon us in behalf of the church, and in the name of the Christian religion, has been conducted by a few sectarian bigots, and with peculiar bitterness. An attempt is made to revive old slanders, arouse old buried prejudices, and by a most unwarrantable misrepresentation of our designs, work, and history, to place us under the ban as "anti-Christian." So proscriptive and intolerant has this warfare become, that under its leaders, Masonic membership has been made the ground of expulsion from the church. While this needless and most unjustifiable hostility is to be deplored, its sad effects will be seen not in the wrecking of our Order, but in a withdrawal from the church of the most liberal minded and large hearted of her membership, material she cannot well afford to lose. This proscriptive spirit only furnishes another unanswerable demand and necessity for our Order. There is such a tendency to division in the church, such sharp and often bitter wrangling about conflicting creeds, often ending in an intolerant and persecuting spirit, and these dissensions tend so inevitably to chill human charity and make men forget the obligations of a common brotherhood, that we need some sacred asylum, sheltered from the storm of sectarian strife, where we may go to lay our hearts upon a common altar, and fan the dying embers of charity and good will into a loving flame.

Our Order has withstood the shocks of the past, the combined assaults of its enemies in days when it was comparatively weak, and it can smile at the puny attempts to weaken its large growing power. Emissaries without cannot do lasting harm; and if we suffer loss, it will be from the infidelity and unworthiness of our members, the moral treason of those within our sacred enclosure. We may become recreant to duty and principle, false to our obligations, and then we should meet the fate we merit; but while we are true to our aims, true to our history, we shall absorb more and more of the best intellect and heart of the world, and win new and nobler triumphs. No institution of history has been enriched by nobler names or prouder achievements. From our long roll of honor we might select the names of those who have been most eminent in science, literature, and art, whose lives have been sanctified by purity and philanthropy. Surely, ours is a noble lineage, and to-day, in calling to mind the thousands of the gifted and the good who adorn our Order, we may feel that our ancestry is not dishonored. We proudly point to the genius and culture arrayed under our banner, and bid the world render that honor which worth and greatness demand. The year has been marked by unprecedented growth of our Order. In our own and foreign jurisdictions, peace and prosperity have abounded, and there has been a large and gratifying increase in all that makes effective strength.

* * * * *

July 31st I received a communication from E. Sir Harman G. Reynolds, notifying me of his appointment as Grand Representative of the Rt. E. Grand Commandery of Pennsylvania near the E. of the Grand Commandery of Illinois, enclosing patent for same, and requesting that it be placed on file; and also expressing the desire to nominate Sir Alfred Creigh, of Washington, Pa., as representative of the Grand Commandery of Illinois near the E. of the R. E. Grand Commandery of Pennsylvania. In accordance with his request, I ordered the commission to be duly accredited and placed on file.

Fully appreciating the honor shown to this Gr. Commandery by so imperial a body as the R. E. Grand Commandery of Pennsylvania, in both desiring a representation, and nominating one of our most honored members to that position, and entertaining the most exalted respect and consideration for the old patriarch in the Order of Chivalry—one who has lain his brilliant talents and achievements upon the altar of Masonry, I felt that I not only did myself, but also this Grand Commandery, honor, by issuing, on the 17th day of August, a commission appointing Sir Alfred Creigh as representative of this grand body near the E. of the R. E. Grand Commandery of the State of Pennsylvania.

Entertaining the utmost cordiality and heartiest desire, we have sought to knit our pleasant relations with the sister jurisdictions into closer, firmer bonds, by the appointment of Grand Representatives near the E. of several, subject to your approval, to-wit:

August 17th, Wm. Sewall Gardner, of Boston, for Massachusetts and Rhode Island, since elected M. E. Gr. M. of the Gr. En. of the U. S.; Aug. 17th, Josiah H. Drummond, of Portland, for Maine; Aug. 24th, Geo. Frank Gouley, of St. Louis, for Missouri; Sept. 22d, Herman Ely, of Elyria, for Ohio; Sept. 23d, Wm. Barrett, of Nashua, for New Hampshire; all of whom occupy pre-eminent positions in their respective jurisdictions.

I have also to acknowledge the honor of having received, on the 14th of August, notice of my appointment and commission as Grand Representative of the Grand Commandery of Missouri near the E. of this grand body; and it gives me pleasure to assure you, Sir Knights, that the fraternal relations existing between our respective jurisdictions are of the pleasantest character. No doubt this movement will have the happy effect to create a deeper interest in the welfare each will develop for the other—a protecting care over the outside interests and relations of each, which must necessarily bring us into the closest and most harmonious relations; a consummation in which every devoted lover of our Order will rejoice.

I have visited Chicago Commandery No. 19 during the official terms of both E. Sirs Wiley M. Egan and Geo. Gardner; found harmony prevailing in their ranks, and the Commandery in a most prosperous and flourishing condition.

The year has been fruitful in incidents of more or less importance to us in our fraternal relations, of which one of the most delightful episodes in my masonic experience occurred in my visit, by invitation, to Joliet Commandery No. 4, Chas. E. Munger, E. C., Sept. 2d, accompanied by P. Gr. C., J. V. Z. Blaney, and the Sir Knights of Apollo No. 1, T. T. Gurney E. C. Upon our arrival we were received with distinguished courtesy by the Sir Knights of Joliet, escorted to the hotel, where a sumptuous repast awaited us, to which we did ample justice, as well as to our clamorons stomachs: after which we were escorted to and received with all the honor due our several stations in their new asylum, which is a rare combination of the utile dulci, of which the Sir Knights may be justly proud. We ante-dated its dedication by receiving with appropriate ceremonies two "weary pilgrims" who had wended their way within its mystic portal, conferring the Order of the Temple upon one myself, and E. Sir T. T. Gurney upon the other. From this pleasant labor we were bidden to a banquet, princely in all its appointments; but the scene took its deepest and most touching interest from the fact that it was P. Gr. C. Blaney who granted their dispensation, signed the charter, dedicated their first asylum, constituted the commandery, and installed its officers; and I believe created and dubbed the first 17 of its members. His review of its history, mingled with affectionate remembrances of some of the original members who sleep in death, stirred the fountain of deep feeling, which overflowed in tears from eyes not given to weeping; forcibly illustrating the sympathy which vitalizes the bond of our Brotherhood. The genial spirit of harmony ruled the feast, at which we lingered until warned by the small hours of morning to depart, when we were escorted to the depot with the same marked courtesy and kindness that signalized our reception, and with the interchange of mutual good wishes and hearty blessings, we bade adieu to the Sir Knights of Joliet and returned to our plodding life, enriched with the memory of the happy hours we had passed with Joliet Commandery.

During the past year I have often desired the gift of ubiquity, that I might have been here and with the different commanderies within our jurisdiction at one and the same time; but failing in this attribute, I have been prevented by imperative duties from doing justice to them or to myself. What I have failed to do far exceeds what I have done. I earnestly hope all the commanderies, especially any that may have made preparations to receive me with every demonstration of respect, as did Elwood Commandery No. 6, Springfield, in whose disappointment at my non-appearance I equally shared, will charitably overlook my shortcomings, as I shall probably never err in that direction again.

But the great event of the year—an event never equalled west of the mountains, the bead upon the brimming beaker, which poured a flood tide of joy through the heart of every participant, was the Triennial Conclave of the G. Encampment of the U. S., at St. Louis, Sept. 15th. This grand body was represented by your G. C., D. G. Commander, H. G. Reynolds, proxy for Grand Generalissimo, Grand Capt. General, and P. G. Commanders J. V. Z. Blaney and Josiah Hunt. The triennial election resulted in the choice of the courteous gentleman and Christian Knight, distinguished both for his profound literary and masonic erudition and wisdom, Most Eminent Sir Wm. Sewall Gardner, for Grand Master.

The business transacted was quite inconsiderable, and not so important as has sometimes claimed the attention of that grand body. Not having the official report of the proceedings I cannot give details. But the effect of thirty different States or jurisdictions North and South being represented in perfect harmony, before the echoes of the recent strife have wholly died away, cannot be over estimated. It was one of the grandest illustrations possible of the principles which underlie our organization. It demonstrated our firm faith in the sublime possibilities latent in the human soul, which under the pressure of circumstances, springs full armed to meet the fiery ordeals of life; ignoring all the bitter prejudices, casting the broad mantle of heavenly charity over faults real or apparent; and on all possible occasions enforcing the law of loving kindness.

The result is a deep laid harmony whose sweet diapason will echo through the years when our implements of labor have passed to other hands. But the pen that would essay a description of the grand pageant at St. Louis should be dipped in the fire of living inspiration, to begin to do justice to our glorious reception. Our excursion and right royal banquet on the river—which was gotten up on a scale of unparalleled grandeur, the procession and equally imperial banquet in the city, the speeches warm from hearts brimming high with fraternal love and hope; the intellectual repast in Gr. M. H. L. Palmer's masterly effort, which left no point exposed where a cavilling critic could make a successful attack; the magnificent appearance of the various commanderies, among which the Wisconsin No. 1, A. V. H. Carpenter, E. C., in perfection of drill, in knightly courtesy, and gentlemanly bearing, stood second to none. Of Apollo Commandery No. 1, it would misbecome me to speak in eulogistic terms, I being a member of the same; but I must acknowledge my deep and life long obligations to its E. C. and Sir Knights for the unusual courtesy extended to me in tendering to me an escort to St. Louis and return, in taking charge of all the arrangements for transporting and providing sumptuously for my comfort from the hour I left Chicago until I returned to it, relieving me entirely from every thought or care for myself: right royally did they perform their self-imposed task. I would also tender them my sincere and hearty thanks for their cheerful compliance with the request of our sister jurisdictions at my instance, and which could not have been done had it depended upon me. I desire also to express my thanks to the Sir Knights of Elwood Commandery No. 6, who turned out 100 strong and splendidly equipped, and of Cyrene Commandery No. 23, for their alacrity in complying with my order to report to Gr. C. Gouley for escort or other duty, as he might direct; and to the delegations from Beauseant No. 11, Quincy, and the eight other commanderies from this jurisdiction, which helped to swell the numbers of that grand parade, which far eclipsed any previous assemblage of Sir Knights on the continent.

Sept. 25th I received a communication from Sir Geo. W. Lininger, E. C. of St. John Commandery No. 22, Peru, setting forth that he was soon to move out of the State, and that the Generalissimo and Captain General not only lived sixteen miles distant from Peru, but also that they had withdrawn from St. John Commandery to help form a new commandery at Mendota, this State, and that the Sir Knights desired to hold an election of officers for the ensuing year before he should leave, and respectfully requested a dispensation for that purse. Deeming this good and sufficient reason, I granted a special dispensation for the election and installation of officers, naming, at their request, Sept. 30th as the time.

I would remark that the calls for judicial decisions have been few—mostly verbal—and of such a nature as not to require recapitulation, and besides having been satisfactorily answered by the Gr. Commanders who have preceded me.

The committee appointed at our last annual conclave, on "Tactics and Drill," have prepared what I conceive to be an unusually able, correct, and elaborate report, meeting any and every emergency, which I accepted and approved; and in pursuance of and in conformity with the resolution passed at our last annual conclave, I instructed and authorized your Gr. Recorder to have published in the form and manner prescribed.

I commend to your favorable consideration the fact that this (Tactics and Drill) report is the product of much time, study and thought, and demands more at your hands than simple commendation.

From facts which have come to my knowledge, I am satisfied that there exists—from various and natural causes—a great discrepancy in the ritual, both verbal and ceremonial, as worked in the several commanderies in this jurisdiction, and deeming it of the highest importance that there be a uniformity of work, I would recommend that a competent committee be appointed to indicate what the true ritual is, and if practicable report at this Gr. Conclave. And would also recommend that a thoroughly instructed and experienced Sir Knight be "appointed, or provision made to elect," as "Gr. Expert," or other synonym, whose duty it shall be to visit each subordinate commandery at least once in each and every year, to disseminate and instruct the officers and members in the true work and in the tactics and drill, that there may be a perfect uniformity of work and drill throughout our entire jurisdiction. I would also suggest for your consideration the propriety of setting apart a day for the annual parade and general review of the commanderies of the State, as is done in several jurisdictions.

I would also suggest for your consideration the propriety of so amending our by-laws, or passing a resolution to the effect, that when a constitutional number of Sir Knights petition for a new commandery, the first three officers named, or the E. C., S. and J. Wardens, be required to pass an examination, and exhibit suitable proficiency in the working and conferring of the orders and in the tactics and drill, before receiving the recommendation of the nearest commandery for the same, to the end that efficiency and uniformity shall be insured, and a still higher standard attained in our Order.

And now, Sir Knights, I bid you go to the work before you with singleness of purpose, with love for our Order, with faith in humanity, and trust in God. You will be called upon to select some worthy Sir Knight to fill the responsible position from which I am about to retire. May your choice signalize your devotion and your wisdom. Retiring from this honorable station, to which your partiality and kindness raised me, I must again thank you for your confidence and co-operation; and I can but regret that arduous professional duties have prevented my giving that time and attention to the duties of my office which your interests demanded, for I could not always turn a deaf ear to the sick and dying. Many may serve you with more ability, may have less pressing claims upon their time and thought, and so be able to give you the aid and service of an undivided heart; but none can feel a deeper interest in your welfare, or offer more fervent prayer for your happiness and prosperity. I speak for you, as for myself, when I express the deep wish of my soul that, living I may walk worthily beneath our sacred banner of knighthood, and that dying it may be the last earthly thing to bless my failing vision as the pledge of my redemption and the symbol of my immortality.

The ritual, tactics, and drill prepared by Sir Kt. Brower were adopted, and the same is to be supplied to every Commandery.

J. R. Gorin, Decatur, was elected Grand Commander; C. E. Munger, Joliet, Deputy; A. J. Dunning, Springfield, Gr. Generalissimo; John M. Pearson, Alton, Gr. Capt. Gen.; Daniel Dustin, Sycamore, Gr. Sen. Warden; W. D. E. Andrus, Rockford, Gr. Jun. Warden; Hiram W. Hubbard, Centralia, Gr. Standard Bearer; A. S. Converse, Galesburg, Gr. Sword Bearer; Louis H. Jorgensen, Cairo, Grand Warder; L. K. Osborn, Chicago, Grand Sentinel.

Important Masonic Conference.

The irony and application of the following article, from the London Freemason's Magazine and Mirror, is unmistakable to any American Freemason who is posted in matters of Masonic humbugs and beggars:

To the editor of the Freemason's Magazine and Mirror:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: As I was sitting at home in the evening, Mrs. Harris working after tea, and myself engaged in literary labors, a knock was heard, which Mrs. Harris went to answer. I am now engaged in collecting newspaper cuttings and extracts from books for my two great original Masonic works—the Mysteries of Masonry explained from the Sanscrit and Hindoo languages, and the Twenty-one Knocks, or Vademecum, explaining all the Chivalrous Orders of Masonic Knighthood. The Mysteries of Masonry will throw a new light on that subject. By copying the proper selections from the Hindoo Pantheon, and uniting the Hebrew and Celtic illustrations, I expect to produce one of the most learned and abstruse works on Masonry which has ever appeared, and far indeed beyond anything which has yet been done in that line. For real Hebrew I have a great advantage in a neighbor, a traveling Jewish glazier from Poland, a most learned man, though his English is rather difficult, and he knows nothing of Masonry—but I supply that. I have the advantage also of a large mass of Masonic MSS. collected by me in my former labors as a Masonic instructor, and obtained from my predecessors. A great deal of it has been fairly copied by good hands, and some that is fairly copied is properly spelled. It will take a world of trouble in that way, but luckily printers understand all about spelling and pointing, as is their business.

Mrs. Harris conveyed in the stranger, a tall, thin gentleman of dignified presence, in black, with a satin waistcoat.

"Bro. W. Harris, P. M.," says he.

"The same," says I.

"The celebrated inventor of the Order of the Garter," says he.

"The humble improver," says I; "as it was invented by King Arthur, the first Grand Master of Masons in England (see Pocket Book)."

"Bro. Harris," says he, "your learning, of which I have heard so much, is as great as your modesty, and I wish I had as much of either. I am Sir Knight Jones. from America, United States, the inventor of Prince Masonry, come to put myself at the feet of the Gamaliel of Masonic chivalry."

He told me the name of the place besides in three letters, which was either I. O. A., I. O. I., I. O. U., O. I. U., or U. O. I., or something of the kind.

"Sir Knight Jones." says I, "you are heartily welcome to my humble castle. I cannot say that I know your name, my acquaintance with America being limited to those valuable manuals from which I have copied so much, and which leave little more to be printed or revealed. I give you a hearty greeting. Here's to you," says I, and I passed him the tumbler of weak toddy with which I had been soothing my arduous literary labors.

"Bro. Harris," says he, "we have heard of you in America, United States, of what you have done for Masonic chivalry, of how you have been maligned and persecuted, and of your wonderful constancy in carrying on your Order and adding other Orders to it in the face of ridicule and contempt, and when respectable and timid men abandoned you. Perseverance must carry the day; it is a Masonic virtue, and must have its due reward."

I felt much comforted to find that, while as Sir Knight Jones said, there had been a sad falling off here, I was covered with glory in America, United States.

"Bro. Harris," says he, "here's to you; persevere and faint not. In America we have as great a want of new orders as you have here, and my motto is always 'Business.' You have invoked Knight Masonry; I have summoned forth from the vasty deep Prince Masonry, and I propose that we form a league to promote the glorious Craft and science, and the progress and development of the knowledge of Masonry and light among the thousands of nations who will be enrolled under our banners. Masonry is the only universal science, the only universal aristocracy, and the only universal knighthood. May it flourish!"

"Sir Knight Jones," says I, "I know nothing of Prince Masonry."

"Then," says he, "I will make you a Prince Mason in a jiffy; but I have a sudden inspiration. You are not a Prince Mason, I am not a Knight of the Garter, let us swear allegiance to our respective jurisdictions."

We knelt down on the hearthrug, and did so. He then conferred on me all the orders of Prince Masonry, and I did the like by him.

We then began a long and confidential conference, during which Mrs. Harris, who had been sitting in our kitchen picking a bit of supper, went quietly up stairs to bed, after supplying us with refreshment.

Sir Knight Jones had come here upon one of those important Masonic delegations which are entrusted to our American brethren. His object was to illustrate the connexion of the English aristocracy with the Masonic chivalrous orders. He had made a very large and valuable collection of objects belonging to the aristocracy—cards of lords and ladies, ciphers, crests, impressions of seals, parts of the same blue ribbon from which the Duke of Hopborough was furnished, several garters bought wholesale in the Burlington Arcade, being of the same pattern and from the same lot as supplied to H. R. H. the Princess Maria Anne. Sir Knight Jones presented me (for Mrs. Harris) with a small piece of the Duke's blue ribbon and several other remarkable objects. This tended very much to mollify Mrs. Harris the next day, as she is devotedly attached to fashion and high life.

Being privileged as an American citizen, he had the means of acquaintance with many connected with the aristocracy, an invaluable advantage for the promotion of chivalrous Masonry. We agreed that it was most desirable a young nobleman should be appointed to preside over the Order of the Garter, but Sir Knight Jones said there were plenty of old lords could be got as well, and that we might be made beautiful forever. As he is to find a lord, and is sure of doing so, the Order of the Garter may be looked upon as now established. Many respectable tradesmen and influential professional men, an accountant, the clerk to a leading solicitor, a surveyor, a professor of dancing, a mercantile agent, a photographic artist, and others in my neighborhood, are quite willing to take high dignities.

Among other high deeds on that memorable night, we formed a Primeval Grand Sanhedrim of Chief Viceroys and High Patriarchs. and I was elevated to the dignity of a Chief Viceroy and High Patriarch of Prince Masons. and of the Ineffable and Imprescriptible Order of the Garter, being the highest Sir Knight Jones could confer, as he reserved for himself the Post of Sovereign Viceroy. This Sir Knight Jones, is quite willing to resign to H. R. H. Prince Arthur or Lord B., and to become Past Sovereign Viceroy and Suzerain Patriarch.

It was a great night, illuminated by the scientific star of Masonry, and softened down by spirits and water in tumblers. Sir Knight Jones has a wonderful ready address and an expert memory for all kinds of charges, addresses, orations, &c., at conclaves, encampments, &c. He would give me some specimens, among others his original Masonic oration in inauguralatiating of the Grand Socratic Encampment at Bubastisville, Za or Ya. He went on for some time with passages more or less familiar to me, when I took it up verbatim, being part of my original address at the installation of an encampment.

"Bro. Harris," says he, "I did not take it from you, but from the sermons of the Rev. Franklin Drowry, a distinguished American divine of the last century."

"And he and I took it from Tillotson," says I.

"I know nothing of Tillotson," says he. "But what a shame for a Christian minister to deceive me in this way, and pass off other men's sermons as his own. I shall never place faith in Drowry again; and he supplied me with a mass of matter for original orations, for, where he put 'Christianity,' I put 'Masonry,' and so on, and admirable and original Masonic addresses they are, quite edifying, as is universally allowed and attested under certificates of our leading Masons."

I offered to read him some of my original addresses, but he proposed instead to give me the Sacred Sword Song of the Prince Mason Crusaders of Galilee, as composed for his Order by a very eminent American poet, well known in his State. A French brother, he said, had never seen or heard anything so imposing as the Sword Song given by 500 Prince Masons with swords and charging glasses working in unison, and assisted by an organ, corps of drums, three military bands, and the bells of Jerusalem. No other Masonic country could produce the like, but America, United States, said he. For want of swords he managed that I should take the poker and he would take the shovel, but that could give me, he said, only a very faint notion of this heart-stirring congregation of high-souled Masons.

THE SACRED SWORD SONG OF THE PRINCE MASON CRUSADERS OF GALLILEE.

The Hozannas are sounding,
The gavels are bounding,
We will guard the Sanhedrim (or Sanhederim).
By the brook of Kedron,
With our swords and our gavels,
Against all cowans and cavils.
Hurrah! hooray!
Up with the oriflamme,
In earnest, no sham!
Our vespers we say,
Hurrah! hooray!
By our glaives in the caves,
We will guard the Sanhedrim.
Hurrah! hurrah! hooray! hooray!

Whenever we came to "Sanhedrim," or "Hurrah," or any point, we clashed the swords, or, as Sir Knight Jones poetically called them, "glaives." We had got through three out of the seven verses of the Sacred Sword Song about half-past one in the morning, when our labors were brought to a sudden and untimely close by two unmysterious knocks on the ceiling from the Grand Mistress above.

So closed this ever-memorable evening for Masonry in peace and harmony—so far as Sir Knight Jones was concerned, and he left his fraternal respects for Mrs. Harris—but, I regret to say, not so far as that lady is concerned, for she forthwith applied to our distinguished and illustrious brother the term "Masonid reprobate," and to me other epithets equally disrespectful. On the announcement of the liberal and handsome presents of Sir Knight Jones, she consented to be mollified, but hoped the best sitting-room fire-irons had not been damaged.

Mrs. Harris said she had not had a wink of sleep with the row, but dosed till she dreamed that villain, Jones, after much struggling, had put her on a gridiron, while I held a poker, and a legion of devils with rough music danced round in Masonic aprons. She awoke to the Sacred Song in full swing.

Sir Knight Jones has promised to bring on his next visit a distinguished American brother and Sir Knight, experienced in the working of the Sacred Sword Song, so as to give me a notion of an evening of harmony.

I began the collection of the water-rates rather late on the morning after this memorable night, and may, as Mrs. Harris says, be snubbed by a tyrannical Board, being so near quarter-day; but it is a sacrifice I endure in the cause of Masonic chivalry.

Yours fraternally,
W. HARRIS, P. M.

To be praised, you must die.

THE MASONIC TROWEL,

IS PUBLISHED BY THE FIFTEENTH OF EVERY MONTH, BY

H. G. REYNOLDS & SON.

One copy, one year..$1 25

We will hereafter publish regular lists of our agents, so that the brethren may always know who are authorized to receive money for us for The Trowel.

The place of birth, age, name, time and place of death, and membership of deceased brethren, are solicited. Resolutions are declined.

We are responsible for our agents, and none others, but favors will be gratefully received from all who may send us subscribers, orders, or work.

Notice.—Remittances by Express and Registered Letters at our risk. Parties sending us money by mail must assume the risk.

HARMAN G. REYNOLDS, Editor.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., NOV. 15, 1868.

☞No communication or advertisement is likely to receive attention, if received after the first of each month, in the issue immediately following.

EDICT.

To all officers of every grade in the Grand Lodge of Illinois, A. F. & A. M., and likewise to all Worshipful Masters, Wardens, and brethren of all subordinate lodges in this jurisdiction:

It has been represented to me that certificates or letters of recommendation have been granted by lodges, lodge officers, and lodge members, to enable persons to proceed from lodge to lodge, or, in an itinerant manner, to apply to lodges for relief.

I presume this has been done in the absence of proper information, and in all cases from an impulse of charity.

I would call your attention to the 31st section of the Grand Lodge By-Laws, which reads thus:

Sec. 31. No lodge, or officer or member thereof, shall, under any circumstances, give a certificate or recommendation to enable a mason to proceed from lodge to lodge as a pauper, or in an itinerant manner to apply to lodges for relief.

All masons are under obligations to obey the laws of the Grand Lodge, and the officers of the Grand Lodge, and all Worshipful Masters, are instructed to take up such certificates or recommendations issued in this jurisdiction and forward them to the Grand Secretary, and all brethren are likewise instructed to assist said officers and Masters in the performance of said duty.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and caused the seal of the Grand Lodge to be affixed, this third day of November, A. L. 5868.

Harman G. Reynolds.

By the Most Worshipful Grand Master.
O. H. Miner, Grand Secretary.

Caution to Lodges.

As will be seen by reference to the doings of the Grand Lodge, all lodges are prohibited from recommending any application for a dispensation for a new lodge, until the application shall have laid over one lunar month, or, more practically, four weeks. This rule will be steadily followed henceforth. Blanks will soon be furnished for petitions and for lodge recommendations. It is my earnest wish that the intention of the above rule should be observed in its full spirit, and not as a formality.

To this end, it is desirable that every petitioner should show that he is square on the books of his lodge, or has a demit; that the petitioners should show, in some form, that they are in good standing as men as well as Masons: that the petitioners furnish a certified plat of the rooms which they are to occupy, together with the size of each room, the size, character, location, and use of the building; that a map of the townships, embracing the contemplated lodge and the nearest lodge, be made, with a statement of the population in each, as near as may be, the character of the population, and the disposition of the same towards Masonry. Before acting upon any application for a new lodge, brethren should be perfectly satisfied as to the ability of the petitioners to work, to sustain a lodge, and to have the respect of the community, and all this, too, without materially affecting the prosperity of any neighboring lodge.

We now have 587 lodges in life, with about 30,000 resident Masons, being an average of 51 to each lodge. Every county but one has a lodge, and but very few—not over four—have less than two; and three-fourths have three or more lodges. It is useless to make new lodges with a view to finance or numbers. Where the good of Masonry, its real prosperity, or the positive wants of brethren demand it, new lodges may be created, but the recommending lodges will be held responsible.

It is my request that this caution be read in every lodge.

In testimony whereof, I have hereto signed my name and caused the seal of the Grand Lodge to be affixed, at Springfield, Illinois, this 7th day of November, A. L. 5868.

Harman G. Reynolds.

By the Grand Master:
O. H. Miner, Grand Secretary.

Caution to Chapters.

To the High Priests, Kings, Scribes, and companions of the constituent Royal Arch chapters in the State of Illinois:

Dear Companions—It has come to my knowledge, in connection with my duties as Grand Master of the Grand Lodge, that one or more chapters in this State has given a certificate or recommendation to enable a Mason to proceed from chapter to chapter to get relief. Such a certificate was taken up and detained at Quincy.

Of the resolutions of the Grand Chapter in force, No. 12, on page 68, proceedings of 1867, reads as follows:

Resolved, That no chapter, or officer or member thereof, shall, under any circumstances, give a certificate of recommendation to enable a Mason of any degree to proceed from chapter to chapter as a pauper, or in any itinerant manner to apply to chapters for relief.

The Grand High Priest will probably issue an edict in relation to the matter, when the same shall be brought to his attention, as it will be soon.

H. G. Reynolds,
G. Sec. G. Chapter.

Our Paper.

In our anxiety to have the office of Grand Secretary in a situation to leave it, we have paid very little attention to our private affairs. What little we have in this world is invested in our printing office. We have been subjected to such depredations through the mails, that we have several times been on the point of abandoning our paper, but we do not like to take the backward track. Happily, the mail trouble is over. But our neglect of our own affairs tells upon us also. Our son has done all he could, but his acquaintance with names and places is not ours, and some unavoidable acts from his standpoint would have been different from our lookout. With new publications in Iowa, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Indiana, added to those before in life, our circulation is of necessity cut down.

We must therefore look mainly to Illinois, and the unoccupied States and Territories. In them we have an agent in every lodge, so far as we could find them. Their names are in the supplement which accompanies this number.

We have made our paper attractive and useful to the family, the father, the man, the mother, the woman, the boy, the girl, the child, and shall continue to do so.

We have made The Trowel useful and profitable to lodges and Masons. We shall try to make it better than ever. We have held our politics in such a position, that politicians of either party who did not know, have judged us to belong to a party different from themselves. This is the strongest proof of our neutrality in The Trowel. Yet no man is more decided, politically, than we. Our position on any political issue, or on any local or personal matter in Masonry, cannot be found in The Trowel. We publish it for the good of Masonry, and not for the benefit of any party, place, or sect. If we were to abandon The Trowel, our printing office would not sell for half its value, and we should be obliged to sell what few goods we have at a dead loss. So we are compelled to go on. Our brethren want us to go on; they protest against stopping. The paper will of necessity occupy an official position. The jurisprudence, instead of being opinions, will, in all symbolic matters, be the law until reversed.

The time has come when the price is of serious consequence. It is as low as we can make it. We give better paper, better mechanical execution and arrangement, more and better matter, than any one else for the same money. One dollar and a quarter is quite a sum in some families to part with—but we appeal to every woman, every child, every father who has read The Trowel, to say that never has there appeared in these columns one article, or line, with the least tendency to immorality or loose principles, or offensive to the coyest modesty. Well then, the paper must be had. Why?

1. Every one can pay $1.25.

2. Its Masonry is good, and the information it gives is indispensable.

3. It is useful to the child, the girl, boy, woman, man, mother, father, sister, and brother. It pleases them all, comforts all, and instructs.

4. It minds its own business, and attends to Masonry. All its articles are Masonic.

5. It is now official.

Brethren of Illinois! You can afford us 10,000 subscribers without encroaching upon any other paper. Let every subscriber renew his own subscription and secure one or two more. And to every new subscriber furnished for 1869, before the first day of January, we will send this and the December number, as long as they hold out. The earlier the better.

Iowa Transactions.

In addition to many favors already received, we acknowledge with great pleasure the receipt of Volume I., Transactions of the Grand Chapter of Iowa, from our esteemed co-laborer, Theodore S. Parvin, the princely Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of Iowa. These Transactions reach from 1854 to 1867.

Not content with this generosity, we find, from the same source, our table loaded with the 4th Volume of the Transactions of the Grand Lodge of Iowa, for ourself and for the Grand Lodge, with Vol. I. Grand Chap. Trans.

for Grand Chapter. Verily, courtesy from a Prince like the Iowa Active, is a good thing.

Tennessee.

The Grand Commandery met at Nashville, Sept. 28. Joseph M. Towler, Columbia, was elected Grand Commander; J. M. Gilbert, Deputy; J. B. Morris, G. Gen.; T. A. Thomas, G. C. G.; A. D. Sears, G. Prel.; Henry Sheffield, G. S. W.; Wm. A. Nelson, G. J. W.; W. H. Horn, G. Treas.; John Frizzell, Nashville, G. Recorder.

The Grand Council R. and S. Masters was held Sept. 30. The Grand Council resolved "to perpetuate its present independent, organic form." The degree of Super-Excellent Master was added to the number of degrees. David Cook, Lebanon, was elected Grand Master; W. F. Foster, Deputy; John B. Morris, P. C. W.; John Frizzell, Nashville, Gr. Recorder.

The Grand Chapter was held Sept. 30. William Maxwell, Maxville, was elected G. H. P.; W. A. Nelson, Deputy; J. W. Hughes, G. K.; A. P. Hall, G. S.; W. H. Horn, G. Treas.; John Frizzell, Nashville, G. Sec.; J. H. W. Jones, G. Chap.; W. H. Cooke, G. C. H.

The Grand Lodge assembled at Nashville, in its 55th annual communication, Oct. 5. Two hundred and fifty-eight lodges were represented. Jonathan S. Dawson, Paris, was elected Grand Master; John F. Stover, Deputy; A. J. Wheeler, S. G. W.; Jas. P. Hanner, J. G. W.; W. H. Horn, G. Treas.; John Frizzell, Nashville, Grand Secretary; Isham G. Harris, G. Orator; Rev. W. A. Nelson, G. Chap.

Springfield Public Schools.

Bro. A. M. Brooks, of Central Lodge No. 71, has politely favored us with a copy of his report as Superintendent of Public Schools in Springfield, during the year ending in June last.

The public schools consist of one high school, four common schools, and one for colored pupils. The building and ground occupied for a high school are valued at $100,000; while the grounds and large two-story buildings for the four wards, are worth considerably more; taken altogether, including the grounds and house for the colored school, the value of school property in Springfield may be safely estimated at $250,000, perhaps $300,000.

The moneys raised for the support of schools, was $40,752.82 from taxes; $3,818.11 from State fund, and $492.90 from tuition, making the sum of $45,063.83. Expended for teaching, $30,213.13. The remainder was expended in building, furnishing, repairs, and incidental expenses. The whole number of scholars registered for attendance is 2,870; average attendance during the year, 1,914.

The report covers 77 pages, and shows that Springfield is not inferior in the facilities for education, or in the character of her teaching, so far as it goes, to any place in the West. The graduates of the high school would probably be admitted to any college on this continent without further preparation.

Those who graduated last were the Misses Maggie E. Muir, Addie Van Hoff, Fannie Dunton, Lizzie Nottingham, Mary E. Tilburn, Mattie E. Kane, Mary V. Hubbell, Fannie Lamb, Annie Adams, Laura Fitzhugh, and Masters Charles P. Kane, Frederick Trapp, Samuel B. Ives, Wilbur R. Condell, Wm. L. Grimsley, Charles A. Armstrong, Edward D. Matheny, and Aaron C. Thompson. Some of these are poor, and some are orphans. God be praised for a system of education which falls on all like the gentle dew, refreshing shower, and the genial sun.

John Priest, C. A. Helmle, William Jayne. M. D., Wm. Lavely, N. W. Matheny, Chas. E. Dodge, and John L. Million, M. D., are the School Board. Four of them are Freemasons.

Lodges Constituted.

We have constituted two Lodges in person—the first, Vesper 584, at Galesburg. This lodge was constituted Oct. 17. The officers installed were, Robert B. Carson, W. M.; John M. Morse, S. W.; David Greenleaf, J. W.; John McFarland, Treas.; Jonas F. Anderson, Sec.; Julius L. Dewey, S. D.; O. F. Price, J. D.

The Grand Lodge consisted of J. C. McMurtry (W. M. 26), Deputy; D. M. Eiker (W. M. 66), G. S. W.; W. W. Patch (W. M. 155), G. J. W.; J. W. Spalding (P. M. 155), Grand Treas.; J. B. Boggs (372), G. Sec.; Rev. J. P. Cairns (Fairbury), G. Chaplain; Rev. J. P. Weston, Grand Orator; A. S. Converse (W. M. 372), G. S. D.; ——— ———, G. J. D.

After the ceremonies were concluded, President Weston made some appropriate and eloquent remarks, when an oyster supper, with the usual accompaniments, followed. It was a creditable affair, and the new lodge starts off well.

Wiley M. Egan 593, at Jefferson, Cook Co., was constituted Oct. 28. The officers are, David B. Fonda, W. M.; Lyman O. Budlong, S. W.; George Dunlap, J. W.; E. R. Bean, Treas.; J. H. Clybourne, Sec.; M. L. Penney, S. D.; H. Eames, J. D.

We were assisted by R. W. Breth. D. C. Cregier, Deputy G. Master; J. W. Clyde, Dist. Deputy; G. W. Barnard (W. M. 141), S. G. W.; W. H. Reid (W. M. 310), J. G. W.; S. C. Smith (W. M. 209), G. Treas.; A. M. Bennett (P. M. 411), G. Sec.; A. W. Hitchcock (P. M. 438), and Wm. Lapham (W. M. 438), as S. and J. G. Deacons; and J. P. Ferns, Grand Tyler.

It was a nice time, and the quartette from Oriental discoursed sweet music. W. Bro. Egan, for whom the lodge is named, officiated as Grand Marshal. The lodge room was filled with ladies and citizens of the vicinity, and the ceremonies made a good impression. Here we met our old Rock Island law partner, Judge E. R. Bean, who has got well off in the world, while we are still poor. Another pleasant feature was the presence of W. Bro. Milo Winchell, who presides at Wheeling in his 17th year. Supper followed, of course, to which all did ample justice. Those who were at the constitution of Wiley M. Egan Lodge will always remember it as a pleasant time. And it will be an important date in the future history of Jefferson, which will soon be a part of the Empire City of the West.

Congratulations.

The letter of M. W. Bro. French appears in this issue, omitting a passage too personal.

Other letters have been received from M. P. Josiah H. Drummond, Supreme Commander of the A. A. S. Rite, N. J.; M. E. Sir Wm. S. Gardner, Grand Master of Templars U. S. A.; R. W. Bro. Robert Macoy, P. D. Gr. M. and Rep. near the Gr. Lodge of N. Y.; R. W. Bro. C. W. Moore, editor Freemason's Magazine; M. W. Ed. A. Guilbert, P. G. M.; R. W. Geo. Frank Gouley, Grand Secretary Mo.; R. E. Sir V. L. Hurlbut, Grand Commander Ill.; besides a bagfull from our choice and beloved friends in and out of the State, congratulating us upon our accession to the Grand East.

Brethren! one and all, accept our thanks. To Bro. Bailey, of the Voice, we promise to rule over him with affection, love, and the spirit of a sound mind. To Bro. Guilbert, who is afraid that we will get too large for our ———, as our Senior in office, we serenely bow! And we think Bro. French has shown his good sense in going out as we come in!

Chicago Consistory.

The editor of the Evergreen comes at us quite cavalierly, since the Commander of Chicago Consistory has deemed it necessary to spoil our fun by making "singular concessions." It seems that a subordinate consistory has seen fit to talk to a foreign body. We have some friends in that body that we would have helped through if their Commander would have permitted.

The points we made in the September Trowel are impregnable, as the case then stood; as it is, we wash our hands of the whole affair.

Templar Manual.

We are in receipt of a beautiful little book from Sir E. B. Myers, law bookseller and publisher, Chicago, with the above title.

It embraces military instruction for Knights Templar, manual of the sword, Templar sword practice, tactics and ceremonies in the asylum, tactics and ceremonies in the council, Templar tactics for public parade, tactics for full display on public parade, reception and escort honors, funeral honors, escort to other Masonic bodies, tactics for grand parade, working text for the orders of Knighthood, burial service, statutes and regulations, ceremonies for installation, jurisprudence, trial code, and costume regulations.

The book has 247 pages, and is a full manual for the Templar, and abounds in plates, figures, diagrams, squares, angles, lines, and columns, making every thing plain to both teacher and learner. Published by order of Grand Commandery, and the book is law.

Losses by Mail.

Owing to changes in the postal service somewhere—no matter where—money comes to us as safely by mail as it ever did. We are glad to say this. We say it gratefully. Our losses direct are heavy—indirectly, heavier still; the losses of our patrons are several thousands. Of course there will be incidental losses by mail, but the intentional losses are passed, we think.

Where all these losses have gone to, we do not know; if the proprietors of saloons and fancy dens cannot tell, then, perhaps, no one else can. A curse will rest upon such as have added perjury to theft and robbery.

Premiums.

The enormous premiums offered for large subscription lists, show a sort of dishonesty that is hardly excusable. We publish our paper low, and we can not offer premiums. We give our agents all we can afford. We will therefore rely upon them and upon our subscribers to give us the circulation which our price and merits demand.

Beware of liars. They will cheat, when opportunity offers. Teach such that truth is a much better commodity to deal in.

Extracts From an Address

Delivered by Hon. J. D. Caton, on the Occasion of the Laying of the Corner-Stone of the new State-House, at Springfield, Ill., on Monday, Oct. 5th, 1868.

These scenes and ceremonies are suggestive of the past, the present, and the future. Within less than fifty years, which marks the period of our State existence this is the fourth time a corner-stone has been laid of a structure for the convenience of the people's representatives, when assembled to pass laws for the good of all, and for the accommodation of the Courts when called upon to administer the laws impartially to all, and, also, for the preservation of the archives of the State, where future generations may observe the acts and doings of its early founders, and trace its progressive steps from its feeble beginning in 1818, till it shall have attained its full and matured greatness in the time to come. Many are still living—nay, there are many who hear me now, in whose memories are recorded the history of the past, who are still permitted to behold the present, and who may well hope to see years of the future. Most of her growth to her present greatness has been developed during the thirty-five years of my residence here. What, however, may be termed the romance of her history, had nearly passed away when I came; but not all. If her legislature was accommodated in an edifice erected for the purpose, a large proportion of the courts in the country were necessarily held in log school houses, or the bar-rooms of country taverns, from fifty to a hundred miles apart. The great intervening prairies were traversed from point to point by judges and lawyers on horseback. Many still live to sigh for those joyous times, when going the rounds of the circuit seemed like a holiday festival: when fraternal con cord and cordial good will were more cultivated and better illustrated, than when a more artificial state of society prevails, under the influence of modern improvements, which seem necessarily to exclude such intimate companionship. They were great men then, who have left a deep impress upon our State, most of whom are gone; among them I may mention Kane and Cook, and Mills, and Hall, and McLean, and Starr, and Blackwell, and Ford, and Williams, and I may add Lincoln, though most of these had passed away before he joined the ranks of those who went the circuit rounds, and gladdened the joyous cavalcade with his genial presence. May we not hope that some competent pen will yet record the romantic history of those times, now preserved only in the memories of their living cotemporaries. They who were the companions of these men when living, who knew their real worth and learning, and who could really appreciate their great talents, will cherish their memories with more fondness than is possible to another generation, who can only know them through a remoter medium.

For many interesting events of former times, more especially germain to the present occasion, I am indebted to the present learned Chief Justice of our State, whose whole life, from boyhood, has been here spent. In no other way can I so well tell of the past, as to use his own words. In answer to my inquiries, Chief Justice Breese says:

"I came to the State the very month it was admitted into the Union—December, 1818—and though writing from recollection only, having no recourse to memoranda which I have at home, I think what I write may be relied on.

"This State, as all know, was a part of the Northwestern Territory, was claimed by the State of Virginia to be included within the limits of the charter granted by James I. To this claim was superadded the conquest of a portion of it—Kaskaskia and Vincennes—by the arms of Virginia, led on by General George Rogers Clarke, and its incorporation into the State, by forming it into a county, and called the 'County of Illinois.'

"In September, 1780, the Congress of the Confederation recommended to the several States in the Union, having claims to waste and unappropriated lands in the western country, to make a liberal cession of a portion of their respective claims for the common benefit of the Union. With the generosity and nobleness of spirit which has ever characterized our distinguished sister, she ceded to the United States, in 1784, all her western lands included within the royal patent, reserving only a small tract on the north bank of the Ohio, and now in the State of Indiana, to be allotted to the officers and soldiers of Clarke's regiment who marched with him when the British forts at Kaskaskia and Vincennes were recovered; and another tract between the Scioto and Little Miami, in Ohio, to make up the deficiences to the officers and soldiers on Continental establishment.

"For the government of this large and widely spread territory, Congress passed the ordinance of July 13, 1787, and General Arthur St. Clair, a distinguished officer of the Revolution, was appointed Governor over it. The seat of government was at Chillicothe, on the Scioto. This official established the counties of Randolph and St. Clair, which for many years were the only counties in this part of the Territory. Delegates to the Legislature from these counties met those from other parts of the Territory in council at Chillicothe.

"On the 30th of April, 1802, an act of Congress was passed, enabling certain portions of this Territory therein defined, to form a constitution of State government. The State of Ohio was the result, and she was admitted into the Union, February 19, 1803. The residue of the Territory was organized as Indiana Territory, and William Henry Harrison appointed Governor, and this ordinance extended over it. Delegates from this part of the Territory met their associates in the Legislature in Vincennes, Ind., which was then the seat of government, and so continued up to February 3d, 1809, at which time the Territory was divided by an act of Congress of that date. Jesse B. Thomas was then the delegate in Congress from Indiana Territory, elected as the ordinance required—by joint ballot of the House and Council, of the former of which he was a member. The assembly had been closely divided on the question of a division of the Territory. Mr. Thomas had pledged himself to the members from the western part of the Territory, to do all he could in Congress to effect a division, and with their votes and his own he was elected by a majority of one! Mr. Jefferson, then President of the United States, was known to be hostile to a division, but such was the persuasive power of the new member, and such his persistence, he accomplished the object, and returned to Illinois with the commission of Judge of the United States Court in the Territory. His associates on the bench were William Spriggs, a very good lawyer from Maryland, and Alexander Stuart, of Virginia, a man of fine education and polished manners, and withal a good liver, of whom it is said, he esteemed the turkey 'the most inconvenient of the poultry tribe, as it was too large for one, and not large enough for two.'

"The act of Congress of February, 1809, dividing Indiana Territary, provided that the seat of government of Illinois Territory should remain at Kaskaskia, on the Mississippi River, until the Legislature of the Territory should otherwise direct. The territorial government was at once organized by the appointment of Ninian Edwards, then not more than than thirty years of age, and who had been previously Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Kentucky, the Governor of the Territory. He was accompanied by his relative, Nathaniel Pope, who was appointed Secretary, and by John J. Crittenden, appointed United States District Attorney. These gentlemen made their headquarters at Kaskaskia.

"The Legislature of the Territory was composed of a council of five members appointed by Congress, on the nomination of the members of the House, and the members of the House were elected, twenty-five in number, by the free white male inhabitants in counties and townships—the former holding their offices five years, and the last, two years. For both, a free-hold qualification was requisite. The Governor, Legislative Council, and House of Representatives, had authority to make laws in all cases for the good government of the District, on the passage of which the Governor had an unqualified veto.

"The sessions of this august body were held in a large, rough building in the center of a square, in the village of Kaskaskia, the body of it being of uncut lime-stone, the gables and roof, which was of the gambriel style, of unpainted boards and shingles, with dormer windows. The lower floor, a large and cheerless room, was fitted up for the House, whilst the Council sat in a small chamber above, around a circular table; and, it is said, when the labors of the day were over, the interesting game of 'Loo' at once succeeded. This venerable building was, during the time of the French occupancy of the country, prior to 1763, the headquarters of the military commandant, and doubtless, within its walls, many an arbitrary edict was framed, to be executed with all the severity attendant upon the administration of military law by a military man.

"The laws passed by the Territorial Legislature, were, for the most part, adopted from the codes of neighboring States, Kentucky principally. They were revised by Mr. Pope, and published in two volumns, and known as 'Pope's Revision.'

"During our territorial life, we had three different delegates to Congress. The first was Shadrack Bond, an intelligent farmer of Monroe county. He returned with the commission of Receiver of Public Moneys for the Kaskaskia Land District. The next was Benjamin Stephenson, the father of the gallant James W. Stephenson, of Galena, whom you well know. The last delegate was Nathaniel Pope, late Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Illinois. He achieved much for our State during his short term of service. He was elected to procure the passage of an enabling act of Congress preparatory to admission into the Union as a State. He took his seat in Congress in December, 1817, and on the 18th of April following, the enabling act was passed. You will observe a striking departure from the ordinance of 1787, in that act. By the fifth article of the ordinance, it was provided that there should be formed in the Northwestern Territory not less than three, nor more than five States, the boundaries being as follows: The western State in the said Territory to be bounded by the Mississippi, the Ohio, and the Wabash rivers; a direct line drawn from the Wabash and Port Vincents (Vincennes) due north to the territorial line between the United States and Canada, and by this territorial line, to the Lake of the Woods and Mississippi. The boundaries of the middle State (Indiana), were then defined, and also those of the eastern State (Ohio), and then follows this provision: 'And it is further understood and declared, that the boundaries of these three States shall be subject so far to be altered that if Congress shall hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two States in that part of said Territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan.'

"The idea was natural that one of these States should be south of this east and west line, and bounded by it on the north; but Mr. Pope, by his persuasive arguments and persistence, gained the consent of Congress in the enabling act, to carry our northern line to a point in the middle of that lake, in the latitude of forty-two degrees and thirty minutes, and thence west to the middle of the Mississippi River; thus securing to us a long line of coast on that inland sea, on whose bosom our products are borne to the markets of the world, and on its beautiful shore there is now a mart of commerce unsurpassed in the extent of its traffic in lumber, provisions, and grain.

"Soon after the passage of this enabling act, an election for delegates to a convention was ordered. There were then but fifteen counties in the Territory, the most populous of which were St. Clair, Madison, and Gallatin, each of them having three delegates; Jesse B. Thomas was one chosen by the people of St. Clair, and was elected President of the convention. The other counties had each two members, all of whom signed the Constitution except one delegate from Washington, who died whilst the convention was in session. This body of assembled wisdom, for it was so, convened in the same 'old stone house' in the large room on the ground floor, and was presided over with great ability and dignity by Judge Thomas, who possessed as much of the suaviter in modo as any man I have ever known. The deliberations of this body closed on the 26th of August, 1818. The original draft of the constitution was engrossed by Col. Henry S. Dodge, the father of Mrs. Benjamin S. Edwards, signed by the members of the convention, and deposited in the office of the Secretary of State, where it now reposes. It is a noble specimen of permanship, and he was a noble specimen of humanity.

"The constitution was not submitted to the people for approval, that not being the fashion of the day. The doctrine then was, as the people had elected representatives of their opinions to frame a Constitution, their acts were binding on them. The territorial officers gave up their seals of office so soon as their places were supplied by elections provided by the constitution. It was provided by this instrument that the seat of government should remain at Kaskaskia until the General Assembly should otherwise direct; and that body was required, at their first session, to petition Congress to grant to the State a quantity of land of not more than four and not less than one section, or to give to the State the right of pre-emption in the purchase of that quantity, the land to be situated on the Kaskaskia River, and as near as might be east of the third principal meridian on that river. Should the petition be granted, the General Assembly, at their next session thereafter, were required to appoint five commissioners to make the selection of the land granted, and to provide for laying out a town upon it; which town it was declared, should be the seat of government of the State for the term of twenty years. The President of the convention was required by the constitution to issue writs of election for Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Sheriffs, and Coroners, and for members of the General Assembly, as apportioned by the constitution. This was done, and the election held at which Shadrack Bond, who had been the first territorial delegate, was elected Governor, and Pierre Menard, a Canadian gentleman of great wealth, extensively engaged in the fur trade, and one of the best men I ever knew, was elected Lieutenant Governor. Members of the General Assembly were elected from the several counties, and they convened in October, 1818, in the 'old stone house,' and thus was the new government put in motion. At the session held in this month, which continued but a few days, nothing important was done, save and except the election of Ninian Edwards and Jesse B. Thomas to the United States Senate, and the election of four Judges of the Supreme Court.

"The memorial to Congress for the grant of land for the seat of government was also adopted, the prayer of which was favorably answered, but not until the second session of the General Assembly, which was in the month of January, 1819.

"The news of this action of Congress was received with intensest joy by the majority of the Legislature, many of whom had been members of the committee.

"There is a little history about this seat of government movement. When the question was before the convention, two points were in contemplation, by members and outsiders; one was Carlyle, just then located on the Kaskaskia River, by two Virginia gentleman, and an elevated site higher up that river, known as 'Pope's Bluff,' and the property of Nathaniel Pope. He and his friends were, of course, very desirous the seat of government should be located there, while the proprietors of Carlyle had no less desire that the latter place should be the favored spot.

"While the subject was under discussion in-doors and out, there came to look in upon that body, a noted hunter and trapper, one Reavs by name, who had his cabin still higher up the river, and near where the third principal meridian crossed the stream. He spoke in glowing terms of the beauties of 'Reavs' Bluff;' that 'Pope's Bluff' nor Carlyle, wasn't a primin' to his bluff. To defeat the friends of Pope's Bluff as well as Carlyle, it was agreed that land on the river, as near as might be, east of the third principal meridian, should be the chosen spot.

"At the session of 1819. five commissioners were appointed to select the land granted by Congress, and they selected the old hunter's home, 'Reavs' Bluff.'"

"It proved to be a most beautiful spot, a heavily wooded tract, covered by gigantic trees, under whose shades the former lords of the soil might have held grave council. A town was laid out with a handsome public square and broad streets, and christened 'Vandalia,' but these vandals did not suffer one of those forest kings to remain on the square, but cut them down to the ground, leaving not one to sigh in the summer wind or bend to the blast.

"Lots were sold at public auction, on credit, at fabulous prices, few of which were paid for in full. The enterprising and scheming came to it, some from the old world, and soon the nucleus of a town was formed. Measures were inaugurated for the erection of a State-House, which culminated in a plain two-story frame building, of rude architecture, set upon a rough stone foundation, and placed in the center of the square, the lower floor of which was devoted to a passage and stairway to the upper story, and a large plain room devoid of ornament; the upper floor was divided into two rooms, the largest for the accommodation of the Senate, and a smaller one for the office of the Secretary of State, the Auditor, and Treasurer occupying detached buildings hired for that purpose.

"No ceremonies were observed in laying the corner-stone of this unsightly structure; no music disturbed the solitude of the forest, then in its primeval beauty; no crowd in pride of pageantry lent excitement to the scene; no sound was heard save the rap of the mason's hammer and the sharp click of his trowel.

"These preparations being made, the archives of State were removed from Kaskaskia to Vandalia, and it was my fortune, being the clerk of the then Secretary of State, Mr. Kane, to remove his office, which I did in a small road-wagon, early in the month of December, 1820, encountering in my route great difficulties, and as their was no wagon road, the driver and myself had to cut a way through the woods at several points; I opened the office in this little room in the second story of the State-House, the whole of the rest of the building being then occupied by the family of the Auditor, with whom I was a boarder. During the entire session of the Legislature, which commenced the first Monday of the following November, I kept the office in this room, the Auditor removing his family to a small cabin on the outskirts of the town."

"In this humble building, Jesse B. Thomas was re-elected to the Senate of the United States, John McLean to serve out the term for which Governor Edwards had been elected, he having resigned on being appointed Minister to Mexico, and Elias Kent Kane received his first nomination and election to that distinguished body, and in it Governor Coles, successor of Governor Bond, delivered his inaugural address.

"The tenure of office of the Judges elected by the General Assembly at their session in October, 1818, was fixed by the constitution, 'until the end of the first session of the General Assembly, which should be begun and held after the first day of January, 1824.' That session was held in this building, when William Wilson, of White county, was elected Chief Justice; Thomas C. Browne, of Gallatin, re-elected; Samuel Drake Lockwood, of Madison county, and Theophilus W. Smith, also of Madison county, were elected Associate Justices, to hold office during good behavior. But one of them survives; he is in active life and one of the Trustees of the Illinois Central Railroad, appointed by the State. May he long live to witness the further developments of this magnificent State, whose advent to it was on the same day as my own.

"I shall never forget the day on which the session of 1820 commenced. It was most beautiful. The sun shone in cloudless splendor, and the temperature of the air was autumnal. It being the first meeting at a new place, all was excitement, and all seemed pleased.

"This edifice was destroyed by fire, in what year I do not now recollect. It was succeeded by a commodious brick building, of sufficient dimensions, built, in part, at the expense of the citizens of Vandalia. The corner-stone was laid, as I remember, without any public display; it still stands, renovated and embellished by the people of Fayette county, and is now devoted to the administration of Justice, and to the various public offices of the county.

"In this building Kane and McLean were re-elected to the Senate, the latter dying in that office; the vacancy was filled by the election of William L. D. Ewing. For the long term, Gen. Robinson, of White county, was elected, and in 1837 Richard M. Young was elected for the term of six years. This was the last election of Senators held in that building. As the twenty years, during which the seat of government was to remain on the land granted by Congress, was about to expire, measures were set on foot to change the location—'to put the State-House on wheels'—as it was termed, and such influences were brought to bear, as to determine the Legislature in favor of Springfield.

"A large appropriation of money was made by the State, and funds contributed liberally by the inhabitants of Springfield for the purpose of erecting a substantial State-House; one that should be an honor to the State, and its pride. The result is seen in that huge, unshapely pile, for the site of which a hole was dug in low ground. When reared, it was the wonder of the country round. Nothing so grand or magnificent was to be found, devoted to the purposes of legislation, in Europe or America. This was eight and twenty years ago. All men of taste and judgment have long regarded it as unworthy a great State, whose march to wealth and political power is unparalleled in any annals.

"At the first session held in this edifice, Samuel McRoberts, of Vermillion county, who had for many years been a prominent politician, was elected Senator in Congress for six years, and at the same session the following named persons were elected Judges of the Supreme Court, in addition to the four then on the Bench: Samuel H. Treat, now U. S. District Judge of the Southern District of this State; Thomas Ford, Walter B. Scates, Stephen A. Douglas, and myself.

"The cause of this action of the Legislature, originated, it is understood, in hostility of the then dominant party to a decision made by two of the Judges denying the power of the Governor to appoint his Secretary of State, making a vacancy for that purpose by removal of the incumbent whom he found in office when he was inaugurated. The case was tried before me, then Circuit Judge, on a quo warranto, and I decided, after full argument, that the Governor had the power; an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, and the judgment reversed by Wilson, Chief Justice, and Lockwood, Justice, concurring. Brown, Justice, took no part in the cause, being a relative of the relator, and Smith, Justice, dissented. The decision caused great excitement, and resulted in the addition of five members to the Bench.

'Twenty-eight years have made most wonderful changes in our noble State. When Thomas Ford laid down his Judgeship in November, 1842, to assume the reins of government, the State had not credit or money with which to purchase a pound of candles, as he stated, in a communication to the Legislature.

"Notwithstanding the depressed condition of our finances during the whole of Governor Ford's administration, and perhaps influenced by that fact, the General Assembly, at the close of it, submitted to the people the question of a revision and amendment of the Constitution, which was affirmatively decided, and a convention was called in the summer of 1847.

"That body, though financial distress prevailed throughout our land, and every department of business was languishing, incorporated into the Constitution this clause: 'There shall be annually assessed and collected in the same manner as other State revenues may be assessed and collected, a tax of two mills upon each dollar's worth of taxable property, in addition to all other taxes, to be applied as follows, to-wit: The fund so collected shall be kept separate, and shall, annually, on the first day of January, be apportioned and paid over, pro rata, upon all such State indebtedness, other than the canal and school indedtedness, as may, for that purpose, be presented by the holders of the same, to be entered as credits upon, and to the intent of the extinguishment of the principal of said indebtedness.'

"This clause the people sanctioned by their votes accepting the Constitution, and at once the credit of our State was redeemed. It was a sublime sight to see the people voluntarily taxing themselves, and thus devoting a portion of their labor, or its avails, to the payment of their honest debts.

"As the Supreme Court of this State said, in the case of The People vs. the Auditor, 30 Ill., 439, in speaking of this: 'Never, perhaps, in the history of any State, has a grander spectacle been presented than in the action of our people, when, in the darkest period of our infant history, public and private embarrassment being almost universal, in the voluntary uprising to subject themselves to a heavy tax and shackle themselves for an indefinite period.'

"The result is seen in the almost entire obliteration of our onerous State debt, and in the quickened march of our people to wealth and independence.

"Our State is now an empire, owing an insignificant public debt, and with a credit in the money markets of the world unsurpassed. When I came to the State in 1818, we had not forty thousand people, we now count our millions, and will soon lead the van in the mighty sisterhood of States."

Passing from the Old World to the New, we are struck with the magnitude and the stability of the structures, the ruins of which are so profusely scattered over the plains of Yucatan, the highlands of Chili and Peru, and the mountains and the valleys of Mexico, extending, as we learn within the last few weeks, far up the Colorado. The architecture of these great buildings was rude indeed, showing but little of the harmony, the beauty, the sublimity, or even stability of the ancient orders. Still they are covered all over with rude efforts of ornamentation, and from the very durability and mass of their material, many of them still stand in tolerable preservation, to excite the admiration of the beholder at the patient perseverance and unyielding energy which enabled their unknown builders to accomplish such immense works, with such limited means, without iron, without machinery, unless of the simplest and rudest kind, and without domestic beasts of draft. If they lacked a knowledge or appreciation of the arch, they supplied its place with massive stone lintels, which have sturdily resisted the wasting wear of time and seasons, while so many of the hard travertine arches, every stone of which was nicely fitted, that supported the Coliseum, or stretched away for miles across the Campagna, for the support of the Roman aqueducts, have crumbled and fallen to the ground. In the convenience these ancient dwellings afforded to their inmates, did they alone equal the residences of their cotemporaries of the Old World.

It is only in quite modern times that the votaries of architecture have bent their energies to develop the greatest amount of practical utility in planning structures for the accommodation of man, without sacrificing those other elements which so exclusively engrossed the ancients. In this regard alone, may the present generation claim to be far in advance, in architectural design, of the time when St. Sophia was built at Byzantium. Michael Angelo exhausted all his genius and all his powers on St. Peters, and yet its ancient neighbor across the Tiber, stands its perpetual rival to excite the admiration of the world, though vastly inferior in magnitude. For actual convenience, St. Peters scarcely excels the Pantheon. It was the fault of public appreciation. The architect met, and more than met, the public demand. Architecture, like everything else, while to some extent it leads, must necessarily obey public tastes and public requirements.

The requirements which public appreciation of human comfort and convenience have demanded, have stimulated modern architecture, till they are now answered in a remarkable degree, without impairing the admirable features of the ancient orders. In adopting the plans proposed for the structure whose corner-stone has just been laid, these elements of utility have been no less studied than those which almost exclusively engaged the attention of the great masters who have gone before us, and who have left such wonderful monuments of their genius; and it is most fitting that the commencement of this great task, shall crown the first half century of our State's existence, and it is a source of especial pride to her citizens, that the manifest merits of the plans presented by one of her own sons secured their adoption.

To the ancient and honorable Order, whose services have been required in laying this corner-stone, is the world indebted, not only for the preservation, but for the creation of the science of architecture. From the building of the great temple by the wise King of Israel for the worship of Israel's God, to the present day, Freemasonry has been identified with all the great architectural works throughout the civilized world, and there is no reason to doubt that such will be the case in the future, though latterly to a less practical extent. Amid the dark gloom which overshadowed the world during the middle ages, when war and bloodshed were alone thought worthy of greatness, and constituted the sole ambition of rulers and of peoples, the venerable Order of Freemasonry protected, beneath the shades of its mystic rites and ceremonies, and preserved to a world more enlightened, those architectural designs which had for so many centuries been the admiration and the study of former ages. During all that long, sad period of seven hundred years, in those secluded recesses where met the brethren, on their altars perpetually burned the incense of light, and truth, and love. There Faith, Hope, and Charity exemplified their beautiful influences upon the hearts of men, and led them to look for the dawn of a brighter day, when the light of a higher civilization should break forth and dispel the dark pall which then enveloped the world; when the tide of blood and carnage which that veil could not hide from future generations, should be stayed; and the fruition of Faith and Hope should be realized in the exercise of Charity to all mankind. When that time came which the ancient brethren so clearly saw, and so much longed for, our ancient Order emerged from its constrained obscurity, and displayed to an admiring world the beauties of that art which it had with so much care and devotion preserved throughout that long, dark, and gloomy period.

Under the patronage of more enlightened rulers and more appreciative peoples, the honorable brotherhood spread itself over every country in Europe, and erected all those stately structures which still stand as modern monuments of the ancient arts, which had been thus preserved in the mystic lodges of Freemasonry. If occasion does not permit it now to show in the same way its devotion to the good of man, still Masonry finds a broad field for the exercise of its energies for the promotion of human happiness; from which, I trust, it may never be allured by the smiles of prosperity, or driven by the frowns of adversity.

The Masonic Record.

The above is the title of a new 64-page magazine, published by John Frizzell & Co., at Nashville, Tenn. Bro. Frizzell, like our lamented Bro. Fuller, was formerly Grand Master, and is now Grand Secretary and Grand Recorder of the Grand Lodge, Chapter, Council, and Commandery. His ability is beyond question, and the number before us is a decided success every way. The triennial meetings at St. Louis are quite fully noticed, while the proceedings of the four grand bodies above named claim a large space. For all this, there is abundance of room for several sensible talks, such as we shall rejoice to see from month to month. $3.00 per annum. Address John Frizzell & Co., box 81, Nashville, Tenn. Here is our warm right ☞.

Jurisprudence.

To the law and the testimony.—ISA. 8, 20.

DECISIONS BY THE GRAND MASTER.

7. Upon a trial, the votes taken were as follows: Guilty, 7; not guilty, 2; for expulsion, 4; against, 5; for indefinite suspension, 5; against, 2. A question arose whether the vote so taken should be recorded.

Decision.—The law specifies what the condition of the vote shall be upon the separate questions of guilt and punishment, and it is not sufficient to state the vote in general terms, but the actual vote should be recorded as above, so that the record may show at any time, or for any purpose, whether the law has been complied with.

8. An expelled Mason, re-instated, is not liable for dues during the period of his expulsion.

9. No Master elect can be lawfully installed until the installing officer is certain that such Master is invested with the secrets of the chair.

10. Where a candidate has received the first degree, change of residence within the same grand lodge jurisdiction does not change the lodge jurisdiction over the remaining degrees, unless by consent.

11. A request from lodge A to lodge B, to confer degrees, leaves the candidate in lodge A, with the fees, unless there be an agreement in relation to them.

12. If lodge A relinquishes a candidate to lodge B, the candidate must petition lodge B for such degrees as he has not received, and pass through reference, report, and ballot.

13. Objection by a member of lodge A to the initiation or advancement of a candidate in lodge B, is not imperative, but is entitled to, and should receive, full consideration, and even delay, when necessary to a calm and dispassionate examination.

14. Where a petitioner for degrees has been guilty of crimes unknown to the lodge at the time of his initiation, he may be tried and punished by expulsion, suspension, or reprimand.

15. The one-year law in relation to candidates applies only to applicants for initiation. See Sec. 38, Gr. Lodge By-Laws.

16. Opinion. If a candidate is physically qualified to receive the symbolic degrees, we know of no law, for that reason, to debar further progress.

17. An applicant rejected for advancement to second or third degree, may apply again at the next regular communication. See resolution on page 50, proceedings 1867. Query: can he apply at all, if he fails to apply at the "next"?

Literary.

The Bombay Gazette.

We are indebted to Bro. H. H. Avron for three copies of the avove mentioned journal, of Sept. 8th, 15th, and 26th. It is a large six-page paper, about four times the size of THE TROWEL. The Gazette is devoted exclusively to news and reading matter, there being no advertisements in the paper. The news is mostly local and from Europe; and herein is a curious fact, that the daily papers of America, even in the little towns of only 10,000 or 12,000 inhabitants, depend almost exclusively upon the telegraph for news, and they spend more money every year for foreign news than is spent by the great journals of Europe and the East. And here in our pleasant little city of Springfield, with only 25,000 inhabitants, we would think it very hard if our morning papers did not give us the full news from Europe, as late as midnight in London, and if it had been twenty-four hours on the way from Egypt, we would think it was old.

The Gazette is an ably edited paper, and is a credit to the country it represents.

Mayne Reid's Onward.

No writer of fiction has done more than Mayne Reid to captivate the youthful mind and rouse a noble and intelligent emulation among those who must soon govern our land. His stories are beautiful natural histories—easy descriptions of countries, scenes, and every-day life—and splendid delineations of the higher and nobler types in human nature, even among rude and uncultivated people. His prospectus for a new magazine, to be called the Onward, is now being circulated, and we hope our youth will everywhere subscribe for it. In the hands of Mayne Reid it must be a splendid success.

Western Social Science Association.

We regret that we did not get the notice of the meeting to form a society of the above name in the October TROWEL, and equally regret that the meeting was not put far enough forward to receive notice in this number. The meeting was to be held at Music Hall, in Crosby's Opera House, Chicago, on the 10th inst. Doubtless it was, as it certainly should be, a success. All Masons should be profoundly interested in all that pertains to social science.

"SLOAN'S ARCHITECTURAL REVIEW AND BUILDER'S JOURNAL," PHILADELPHIA.—Bro. A. J. Bicknell, of this city, who is now engaged in the sale of architectural works and plans, has laid upon our table No. 4, Vol. 1, of the above journal, published in Philadelphia, monthly, by Claxton, Remsen & Hafflinger, 819 Market street, Philadelphia. No terms stated. It is a third larger in the page than Harper's Magazine, and has sixty-four pages, on good type and paper, and has, besides, several very fine plates. Among the best are the "Tudor Mansion," "two adjoining city residences," West Spruce street Baptist Church, and a Franco-Venetian city store. For sale by A. J. Bicknell & Co., Springfield.

Old Age.

Brighter burns the blazing fire
  In the frosty winter day;
Brighter glow the embers then
  Than in the sunny May.

Brighter beams the spirit, too,
  Of age with shivering cold;
Mortality decays and dies,
  But spirits grow not old.

Youth hath its sunny hour,
  Manhood its might,
Ripeness of years its power,
  Old age its night;

But "Night is the time for prayer,"
  Night the time for thought;
Night has its chilling air,
  But often have I sought

Night for its blazing stars,
  Night for repose;
Night bringeth heaven to view,
  Dews bathe the rose.

Hot in the summer day,
  Longed I for night,
Cool with the zephyrs' play,
  Dreaming with delight.

Then bathe my weary soul
  In thy sea, O Night;
Upward to gaze on heaven's
  Starry spangled light.

So 'tis with night of years,
  So with December;
Age then should have no fears
  For brighter burns the ember,

Jeweled on the hearth to glow,
  As glows the fire of age;
Pure as the springlets flow,
  So with saint and age.

But One Fault—A Word to Such.

Occasionally we meet with a brother who is cordial, sincere, and benevolent; devoted to Masonry and humanity, and it is said of him he has "but one fault."

The President of the United States said of a brother once: "He is a firm friend of my policy and the country, just the man for the place, but he has 'one fault.'"

A naval officer said of another, "He understands the adjustment of instruments and the scientific method of taking observations, was himself once the commander of a vessel. He has but one fault—if he will drop that I will put him through all the promotion he wants."

A devoted wife said of a husband, otherwise noble and exemplary, "He has but one fault."

An express agent said: "I must dismiss your friend from the service, although he has 'but one fault.'"

A lovely but wise young lady said: "I esteem —— highly, my family also, but he has one fault." She was right.

Our army, our navy, our merchant ships, our land swarms with such men, who are kept subordinates and mere drudges for this "one fault." There are thousands who have lost, and are daily losing, valuable situations for this "one fault." We are glad to know that it is very rare to find a drunken Freemason—and still rarer to find a Lodge who will not subject him to discipline.

Dear brother, possessed of "but one fault," suffer a word of kind exhortation. Thy friends, thy true friends, thy brethren, love thee and would save thee. But they are powerless without thine own act. Wilt thou not obey and honor Freemasonry? Then cease drinking, and, as thou hast fallen once, take the only safe course for thee—that of total abstinence. Thou must not go into temptation. Thou must avoid places and scenes of temptation. Thou must absolutely refuse all invitations to drink, and thou must boldly and courageously say that you fear to fall, and you abstain. Then you will not be pressed more.

There is no sin in the moderate use of liquor for the aged and the feeble. Young men rarely ever need stimulants in this country. Thou canst afford to die, but not to bring disgrace upon the Craft, trouble upon thy family, and sin upon thy soul.

Officers in Lodges, and older brethren, must bring the power of kindness and Masonic fidelity to bear upon such brethren as may be erring. It is not sufficient to permit a brother to take his downward course unchecked, and then when the charge of "habitual drunkenness" is presented, vote the brother guilty and expel him. Be plain and kind with thy brother, and change his associations. Do all that thou mayest to save him.—National Freemason.

THE late Mr. Cobden used to tell the following anecdote: "When in America," he said, "I asked an enthusiastic American lady why her country could not rest satisfied with the immense unoccupied territories it already possessed, but must ever be hankering after the lands of its neighbors, when her somewhat remarkable reply was, 'Oh, the prospensity is a very bad one, I admit, but we came honestly by it, for we inherited it from England.'"

Influence of Freemasonry on Civil Institutions.

It can not be questioned that the effects of Freemasonry on society have been great, and of the most salutary character. It has accomplished much in the development of the idea of liberty, and in aiding the progress of free institutions. The last half of the eighteenth century was remarkable for its intellectual activity and the freedom with which all social, political, and religious questions were discussed. There was a universal mental unrest. The coming events seemed to have cast their shadows before them, and there was a universal feeling that the old despotisms and feudal aristocracies were tottering to their fall, and that more equitable laws and institutions were about to be inaugurated.

These new ideas had an irresistible charm, and even kings, like Fredrick the Great, and princes like the Duke of Brunswick, and numberless nobles as well as philosophers and savans, were carried away with them. But it was in Masonic lodges that they found freest utterance and the most numerous and ardent disciples. Frederick himself, the Duke of Brunswick, Lafayette, La Place, and hosts of the princely, noble, and learned classes, were Masons, and in the lodges, these sacred laboratories of thought, had learned the doctrines of liberty, fraternity, and equality. The Masons of that period, on the European continent, were for the most part the apostles of democratic ideas. The lodge itself, in all its teachings and government, suggested a constitutional and elective administration. Within the Masonic circle all were equal. The mechanic was the peer of the monarch. Before the altar, illuminated with the burning triangle, all distinctions of rank vanished, and the brothers consequently constantly contemplated the image of a republic.

Most of the founders of our Republic were Masons, and we can not but believe that, in choosing a form of government after throwing off the British yoke, they were influenced by the spirit of Masonry. The mass of the people were monarchists—had no ideas of a different form of government, and probably expected, after having achieved their independence, a monarchial rule, with, perhaps, Washington as king. But Washington, Franklin, and their compeers, had been educated to democratic ideas in the bosom of the Masonic Brotherhood, and when called to the great work of laying the corner-stone of a new government edifice, they founded it on those ideas. Had they not been Masons there is room to doubt whether they would have established a republic.

Essentially republican in its nature, it constantly presented to the brothers a picture of a new order nowhere found on earth—the ideal of a civil government opposed to, and at the same time more perfect than, any existing civil organizations. Tyrants, therefore, hated it. "It was anathametized," says Louis Blanc, "at Rome, by Clement VII., pursued in Spain by the Inquisition, and persecuted at Naples. So in France, the Sarbonne declared Masons worthy of eternal punishment."

Nevertheless the Fraternity lived, and steadily advanced in influence and power. Working in secret, like the Cyclops in the forges of Vulcan, it fashioned those thunderous bolts which shattered the dungeons of tyranny and sent despotism howling to its den of darkness. And we believe it will continue to be a shield of liberty, and a powerful protector of the rights of man.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

"That's the Place."

BY JENNIE HARRISON.

There was a queer old gentleman at the academy on examination day. The trustees seemed to think a great deal of him, and treated him with much respect; but the boys felt rather uneasy, as his sharp, grey eyes looked searchingly at each one of them, and they saw that he was listening carefully to their answers.

"I do wonder who that old chap is!" exclaimed Charley Vane, after the exercises were over, and they were preparing to go home. "I declare, he frightened me so, I don't think I could have told the points of the compass, if he had asked me!" Harry Brown laughed. He did not look frightened; he had done his part well that day, and many admiring glances had rested on the boy who was called "the best scholar."

The strange old gentleman was standing with one of the school-officers, in the play-ground, as Harry passed out with several other boys.

"Harry," said Mr. Raymond, stopping him, "I think this gentleman has left his cane in the hall up stairs, will you look for it?"

"Certainly, sir," and Harry went quickly up to the school-room again, and returning with the cane, presented it to the gentleman with a polite bow.

"That's a fine boy," remarked Mr. Raymond, as Harry passed on toward the gate; "he is one of the boys we are proud of." The old gentleman was following Harry closely with those stern grey eyes.

Just as the boys reached the gate, a young girl from the female department of the school was going out; and in trying to open it, dropped one of her books. The other boys paid no attention; but Harry stepped forward, held open the gate, and picked up the book, handing it to her with a pleasant remark. At that moment a carriage, containing several ladies, drove up. As they looked at Harry, he recognized them, and raised his cap from his head with a graceful bow.

The old gentleman saw it all; but when Mr. Raymond said, in a pleasant way, "How few boys have such good manners!" he only replied, "It is all very well; but let me see that boy at home; that's the place! Let me see him with his mother and sisters, and then I can judge of his good manners. If you want to know a boy's true character, see him in his home; that's the place!" The old gentleman brought down his cane with emphasis at these last words; and Mr. Raymond seemed rather disappointed that he did not appreciate more the "model boy" of their school.

But I think the old gentleman was right when he said, "that's the place." Suppose we look into Harry Brown's home, and see how he appeared there that same evening.

Harry went into his room where his mother and sisters sat at their sewing. He threw his cap carelessly down upon the table; he did not even say good afternoon, as he took it off. Perhaps he forgot it, or else he did not think it worth while—only his mother and sisters, you know!

"Well, Harry, did your examination pass off successfully?"

"Oh, yes, first-rate!"

Harry might have told the particulars of the examination to interest his mother and sisters, as they had been unable to attend it; but he did not think it necessary. He began to look around for a seat. Somehow the ladies' work had become scattered about on the different chairs, and it offended Harry's feelings.

"For pity's sake, can't you give a fellow a chair to sit on?"

Sister Ellen began to move her work. "Here is one," she said, and as Harry took it a spool of cotton fell and rolled away. He did not pick it up, but sat down and opened one of his books. Surely, that did not seem like the boy who had so politely held open the gate and picked up the book for a young miss, half an hour before! But it was only Harry's sister this time; and perhaps he thought it foolish to be polite to her!

When Harry's father came in, and asked him to look in the library for a magazine which had been left there, Harry did not do it with that "certainly, sir," and that bright look, which had so pleased Mr. Raymond in the afternoon, and which would have pleased his father still more, and helped to make home happy.

At the tea-table Harry did not think of those little acts of politeness which he would not have forgotten had he been taking tea with Mr. Raymond or the strange old gentleman, instead of only at home. He helped himself to bread, without noticing that his sister by his side had none. He said, "Here, take it!" when Ellen did not see that he was holding the butter-plate towards her. And he neglected the little "thank you," and the "please," which are such necessary parts of politeness at all times.

Then, when Harry went to bed, he did not think it worth while to say good night—though he had been very careful to say a polite "good afternoon," before leaving school that day.

In truth, Harry's good manners were kept for those outside of his own home. And that strange old gentleman knew how many boys had this fault. So, in a few years, when he wanted a book-keeper for his counting-house, from among the graduates at the academy, he would not select one until he had visited several at their homes and became acquainted with their manners there. Then—to the surprise of all the school—he did not choose Harry Brown. "For," said he, "I don't want any boy about me who can't be polite to his mother and sister!"

Boys, how many of you are like Harry? Some of you are, I know. Then bear in mind the words of the strange old gentleman: "Let me see that boy at home; that's the place!"

Do not think that home is the place where you can throw off all politeness, and be as careless and rough as you please. If there is a place on earth where you should wear your good manners and be polite end kind, "that's the place!" If there are any persons to whom you should give your most polite words and kind attentions, those persons are your father, mother, and sister. Will you give more attention and respect to those outside than to the dear ones at home? will you be praised for good manners by strangers, and cause those at home to think you rude and thoughtless? It will make your homes much more happy and pleasant, if you wear your best manners always there. Do net omit any act of politeness there which you would perform elsewhere. Do not be ashamed to be polite at home; that is the best place in all the world to you; that is the place where your best friends are; that is the place where your true character will appear; therefore, remember to cultivate politeness at home!

The Way of the World.

Once on a time, there was a man who went into the wood to cut hoop-poles, but he could find no trees so long, and straight, and slender, as he wanted, till he came high under a great heap of stones. There he heard groans and moans as though some one were at Death's door. So he went up to see who it was that needed help, and then he heard that the noise came from under a great flat stone which lay upon the heap. It was so heavy it would have taken many a man to lift it. But the man went down again into the wood and cut down a tree, which he turned into a lever, and with that he tilted up the stone, and lo! out from under it crawled a Dragon, and made at the man to swallow him up. But the man said he had saved the Dragon's life, and it was shameful thanklessness in him to want to eat him up.

"May be," said the Dragon; "but you might very well know I must be starved when I have been here hundreds of years and never tasted meat Besides, it's the way of the world,—that's hows it pays its debts."

The man pleaded his cause stoutly, and begged prettily for his life; and at last they agreed to take the first living thing that came for a days-man, and if his doom went the other way the man should not lose his life, but if he said the same as the Dragon, the Dragon should eat the man.

The first that came was an old hound, who ran along the road down below under the hill-side. Him they spoke to, and begged him to be judge.

"God knows," said the hound, "I have served my master truly ever since I was a little whelp. I have watched and watched many and many a night through, while he lay warm asleep on his ear, and I have saved house and home from fire and thieves more than once; but now I can neither see or hear any more, and he wants to shoot me. And so I must run away, and slink from house to house, and beg for my living till I die of hunger. No! it's the way of the world," said the hound; "that's how it pays debts."

"Now I am coming to eat you up," said the Dragon, and tried to swallow the man again. But the man begged and prayed hard for his life, till they agreed to take the next comer for a judge; and if he said the same as the Dragon and the Hound, the Dragon was to eat him, and get a meal of man's meat; but if he did not say so, the man was to get off with his life.

So there came an old horse limping down along the road which ran under the hill. Him they called out to come and settle the dispute. Yes; he was quite ready to do that.

"Now I have served my master," said the horse, "as long as I could draw or carry. I have slaved and striven for him till the sweat trickled from every hair, and I have worked till I have grown lame, and halt, and worn out with toil and age; now I am fit for nothing. I am not worth my food, and so I am to have a bullet through me, he says. Nay! nay! It's the way of the world. That's how the world pays its debts."

"Well, now I'm coming to eat you," said the Dragon, who gaped wide, and wanted to swallow the man. But he begged again hard for his life.

But the Dragon said he must have a mouthful of man's meat; he was so hungry he couldn't bear it any longer.

"See, yonder comes one who looks as if he was sent to be judge between us," said the man, as he pointed to Reynard the fox, who came stealing between the stones of the heap.

"All good things are three," said the man; "let me ask him, too, and if he gives doom like the others, eat me up on the spot."

"Very well," said the Dragon. He, too, had heard that all good things were three, and so it should be a bargain. So the man talked to the fox as he had talked to the others.

"Yes, yes," said Reynard; "I see how it all is;" but as he said this, he took the man a little on one side.

"What will you give me if I free you from the Dragon?" he whispered into the man's ear.

"You shall be free to come to my house, and to be lord and master over my hens and geese, every Thursday night," said the man.

"Well, my dear Dragon," said Reynard, "this is a very hard nut to crack. I can't get it into my head how you, who are so big and hearty a beast, could find room to lie under yon stone."

"Can't you," said the Dragon; "well, I lay under the hill-side, and sunned myself, and down came a land-slip, and hurled the stone over me."

"All very likely, I daresay," said Reynard; "but still I can't understand it, and, what's more, I won't believe it till I see it."

So the man said they had better prove it, and the Dragon crawled down into the hole again; but in the twinkling of an eye they whipped out the lever, and down the stone crashed again on the Dragon.

"Lie now there till Doomsday," said the fox. "You would eat the man, would you, who saved your life?"

The Dragon groaned, and moaned, and begged hard to come out; but the two went their way, and left him alone.

The very first Thursday night Reynard came to be lord and master over the hen-roost, and hid himself behind a great pile of wood hard by. When the maid went to feed the fowls, in stole Reynard. She neither saw nor heard anything of him; but her back was scarce turned before he had sucked blood enough for a week, and stuffed himself so that he couldn't stir. So when she came again in the morning, there Reynard lay, and snored, and slept in the morning sun, with all four legs stretched straight; and he was as sleek and round as a German sausage.

Away ran the lassie for the goody, and she came, and all the lassies with her, with sticks and brooms to beat Reynard; and, to tell the truth, they nearly banged the life out of him; but, just as it was almost all over with him, and he thought his last hour was come, he found a hole in the floor, and so he crept out, and limped and hobbled off to the wood.

"Oh, oh," said Reynard; "how true it is. 'Tis the way of the world; and this is how it pays its debts."

LOVE.—Love is the emblem of eternity; it compounds all notion of Time; effaces all memory of a beginning, all fear of an end; we fancy that we have always loved the object of our affection, so difficult is it to imagine how we could have lived without it. The more terrible separation seems, the less probable it becomes; like death, it is the evil we rather name than believe, as if the inevitable were impossible.

Fashionable Follies of Ladies—The Grecian Bend.

A Saratoga correspondent of the N. Y. World has the following:

The difference between a fop and a gentleman in the United States is happily wide enough to render it impossible that any sane person should confound the two. But the difference between a female popinjay and a lady, is here defined by such a curious and vulgar set of peculiarities appertaining to the former person, that I cannot forbear to describe them. In the first place, a toilet is affected, which of itself suffices to turn a woman in full dress into a caricature. The body and waist of a woman in full dress are remarkable only in one respect—the last is exceedingly tight, and the former rather loose at the top and exceedingly low. It is below the waist that what is monstrous in the costume first attracts and then repels the eye of man. A hoop of moderate dimensions, overspread with an under-skirt or two, and a dress of whatever fabric is worn. Underneath the rear of this hoop, just below the waist of the person designated, is bound a coil of wire from two to three inches in diameter, which throws out and elevates the upper portion of the dress behind, and forms the foundation, so to speak, of an exterior protuberance called the panier. The panier is a bustle more or less enormous, upon which, in successive folds or layers gathered up, or confined by a band encircling the dress from the stomach of the wearer around and beneath, an extra skirt, reaching considerably below the hips, hangs, or rather "wobbles" to and fro. The dress has a train from four to six feet in length.

The posture affected in order to set off this attire is called the "Grecian Bend," a contortion of the body which, as it is highly improper in itself, I find it difficult to describe with propriety. High-heeled shoes dispose the wearer to incline forward, and high heeled gaiters are therefore adopted by the "belle of the season." She is thus the more readily enabled to elevate her hips unnaturally behind, enhancing the aspect of the panier, to contract her stomach, and to form an S-like curvature of her upper shape by thrusting out her chest, drawing back her shoulders and bending forward her head. The latter is crowned by a hideous chignon, surpassing, by several inches, the thickness of the shallow pether brain. So bent and deformed, the belle constrains her elbows against her sides; and with horizontal forearms and little gloved hands dangling from limp wrists, tilts painfully along. The profile of such a figure, and its ungraceful gait, are irresistibly suggestive of a lame kangaroo. When it is whirled and tossed about in a dance by one of the fashionable jumping jacks in black broadcloth who are here so numerous, and so much alike that you can hardly tell one from another, the sight—what with the bobbing up and down of the woman's panier and the agile sidelong leaps of the jumping-jacks across the immense trail piled on the floor—is too exasperatingly ridiculous for laughter.

The New York Courier asks practically:

Will some brute be good enough to purchase a pack of Chinese fire-crackers and set them off under the first insane young woman he meets who is trying to deform herself by bending her back like a bow, and bend her up straight again? The bending statue, which enchanted the world, was an expression in eternal marble of all those graceful lines and curves in which the Grecian art, touched to such fine issues beyond all that ever went before or is like to come after it, crystalized its grand conceptions of human loveliness and human grace. But the twist our women give themselves in the vain idea of presenting a "Grecian Bend," reminds one, not of a statue fresh from the hand of Phidias, but a monkey in petticoats hopping along the sidewalk to solicit pennies for his master, the organ-grinder. Grecian Bend! Grecian fiddlesticks! a little American female nature; a straight back and springy step—elastic with youth and careless ease—is worth all the Grecian Bend tomfooleries of female snobbery. Woman, au natuerel—but neither Grecian Bend nor White Fawn—in point of fact is the most pleasing shape she can take for sensible humanity.

The Brave Dog "Bobby."

Some years ago, a ship bound for China had on board, among other passengers, an officer, his wife, their only child, a little boy five years old, and a large Newfoundland dog called "Bobby."

Everybody in the ship liked "Bobby," he was so good-tempered and frolicsome; but the little boy was the dog's constant playmate. He was as fond of Bobby as Bobby was of him. One evening, while they were romping together, the ship gave a roll, and splash went the child into the sea!

The little boy's father, half frantic, leaped with others into a boat, but it was too dark to see far before them. All gave the child up for lost.

At last they heard a noise on the left side of the ship. "Pull on! quick!" cried the father. The boat was turned, the men pulled with great force, and "Bobby," holding up the child with his mouth, was soon alongside. The half drowned boy was recovered; the parents were delighted; and the noble dog was patted and caressed by all.

At the Cape of Good Hope the passengers were to be landed. The officer got into the boat with his wife and child; but he told the sailors to hold the Newfoundland dog tight by the collar till the boat was some distance from the ship. "You will then see," said he, "what a strong swimmer he is." "Bobby" pulled and tugged to get loose, but all in vain; they held him till the boat was near the shore. But no sooner did the officer give the signal than he sprang into the sea.

Suddenly the poor animal set up a shrill howl, and threw himself almost out of the water. At first it was thought he had been seized with cramp, but it was worse than that—a shark was pursuing him! "A shark! a shark!" sounded from the boat to the ship. "Bobby" swam right and left, dived and turned, showed his teeth, and never allowed the shark time to turn on his back, without doing which the monster could not bite him.

The officer in the boat soon saw there was little chance of reaching the spot in time to save the dog. Poor "Bobby swam as fast as he could, and was almost tired out. "Stop rowing" cried the officer to the men, "and turn the boat around." Just at that moment the shark, which had got very close to its expected prey, turned on his back and opened his terrible mouth. "Bobby" was all but gone! His master rose, levelled his gun and fired. In a moment the water was tinged with blood; the shark disappeared.

The men then rowed to the spot where "Bobby" was swimming about. The officer pulled the dog into the boat; the child threw his little arms around him; and the men in the boat, and the sailors in the ship cried out with joy, "hurrah! hurrah: 'Bobby' is safe; the shark is killed! Hurrah."—Early Days.

DECKER & CO.'S
IVORY AGRAFFE BAR
PIANO FORTES!
Warerooms: No. 2 Union Square, corner Fourteenth St. and Fourth avenue,
NEW YORK.

These Instruments are celebrated throughout the country, and are distinguished for
THEIR SINGING QUALITY,
VOLUME and PURITY OF TONE,
SYMPATHETIC, ELASTIC, EVEN TOUCH,
DURABILITY OF CONSTRUCTION,
and BEAUTY OF FINISH.

Decker & Company's Pianos have always received the First Premiums, whenever and wherever they have competed with the most celebrated makers in this country.

OUR IVORY AGRAFFE BAR

Is an invention beautiful in its simplicity and wonderful in its practical effects. It is the most compact Agraffe ever invented, and its influence upon the tone is to render it mellower, rounder, and more clearly brilliant, while it utterly overcomes that sharp, metalic quality which disfigures the instruments of all other makers.

WHY WE EXCEL.

While other Pianos are rarely in tune,

THE DECKER & CO.'S PIANOS invariably retain their Pitch and Tone.

While other Pianos are made of poor or unseasoned materials,

THE DECKER PIANOS combine the Best Materials, Skillful Workmanship, and Scientific Construction.

While other Pianos are deficient in the great requisites of a good touch,

THE DECKER & CO. PIANOS have a flexibility under skillful manipulation, which not only adapts them to the style of every performer, but which causes the player to feel en rapport with the Instrument, and affords his taste and fancy free expression.

IT IS A FACT—That philosophy of construction is not less important than fitness of material.

IT IS A FACT—That various minute, unobserved appliances, adaptations, and improvements have an influence in the tone, durability and manipulative character of a Piano, in no degree inferior to the more ostensible modifications.

IT IS A FACT—Therefore. that science, as well as experience; artistic discrimination, as well as methodic care; capital, as well as conscientiousness, are requisite in the production of a GOOD PIANO-FORTE. In our

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte

is exhibited the result of an uninterrupted, persevering regard for these facts and principles; and purchasers who have so often spoken of the uniformity of excellence in our Instruments will be led to understand how this superiority and uniformity has been attained—a result which is apparent to even ordinary judges, in the volume and richness of tone, the sustained and human character of their singing quality, while connoisseurs and critics fully indorse all that we have adverted to.

The unanimous opinion of the best artists and the most reliable critics is, that

THE DECKER & COMPANY'S

Ivory Agraffe Bar Piano-Forte is the only Square Piano-Forte, which, in Voluminous Sonority, and Positive Solidity of Tone,

Can stand comparison with the

BEST GRAND PIANO-FORTES MADE.

The Stars.

BY GEORGE D. PRENTICE.

Those burning stars! what are they? I have dreamed
That they were blossoms on the tree of life,
Or glory flung back from the outspread wings
Of God's Archangels—or that yon blue skies,
With all their gorgeous blazonry of gems,
Were a bright banner waving o'er the Earth
From the far wall of Heaven!—And I have sat
And drank their gushed glory, till I felt
Their flash electric trembling with the deep
And strong vibration down the living wire
Of chainless passion—and my every pulse
Was beating high, as if a spring were there]
To buoy me up, where I might ever roam
'Mid the unfathomed vastness of the sky,
And dwell with those high stars, and see their light
Poured down upon the blesssd Earth, like dew
From the bright urns of Naiads!

Beautiful stars!
What are ye? There is in my heart of hearts
A fount, that heaves beneath you, like the deep
Beneath the glories of the midnight moon!
And list—your Eden-tones are falling now
Around me like an element—so slow,
So wildly beautiful, I almost deem
That ye are there, the living harp of God,
O'er which the incense winds of Eden stray
And wake such tones of mystic minstrelsy
As well might wander down to this dim world
To fashion dreams of Heaven? Peal on—peal on—
Nature's high anthem!—for my life has caught
A portion of your purity and power,
And seems but as a sweet and glorious tone
Of wild star-music!

Blessed, blessed things?
Ye are in Heaven, and I on Earth. My soul,
Even with a whirlwind's rush, can wander off
To your immortal realms, but it must fall
Like your own ancient Pleiad from its hight,
To dim its new-caught glories in the dust!—
This Earth is very beautiful!—I love
Its wilderness of flowers, its bright clouds,
The majesty of mountains, and the dread
Magnificence of ocean—for they come
Like visions on my heart—but when I look
On your unfading loveliness, I feel
Like a lost infant gazing on its home,
And weep to die, and come where ye repose
Upon yon boundless Heaven, like parted souls
On an eternity of blessedness.

Traditions of the Aborigines.

There is a great conformity in all the mythological traditions of the civilized nations; and even in those of the savage tribes, which appear to be ancient, there are general features of resemblance. Amidst various details, they most usually imply a migration from some other country, contain distinct allusions to a deluge, and attribute the knowledge of such arts as they possess to some fabulous teacher, in remote ages. In relation to the Indian origin, they appear to agree, with a few exceptions, in establishing that the course of population has been from the west to the east, the direction varying in some measure, according to the locality of particular tribes. With the great race called the Algic, or Algonquin-Lenape, there was a tradition of the original appearance or creation of the earth from water, and of a subsequent general inundation. According to Charlevoix, the Iroquois believed in a general deluge, from which no person escaped, after which, to re-people the earth, beasts were changed into men. The Pawnees say that eight men were originally created by the Great Spirit, from whom all mankind were descended; and another tribe, beside a deluge, believed in the existence of an age of fire, which destroyed every human being, except one man and one woman, who were saved in a cavern. In South America, the Remos on the banks of the Ucayali suppose themselves to have been created out of the earth, by a man of miraculous powers. In Brazil, besides the usual belief in a general deluge, there was a tradition that in ancient times, before the age of violence, there were two persons, one of whom was called Zome,—in Paraguay, Payzume. Payzume is represented as an elderly man with a long beard, and who wore white garments. He came from the country of the Guaranies, that is, the east, before the days of their grandfathers, and wherever he sojourned, he taught the natives to clothe themselves, to live in houses, the use of fire, and to cultivate the manioc. Their forefathers, as the fable ran, quarreled with these benefactors and shot their arrows at them; but the arrows turned back, and slew those by whom they had been aimed; and Payzume fled to the north, promising to visit them again, and leaving his miraculous footsteps imprinted upon the shore.

The nations of the Tamanac race say that Amalivaca, the parent of the Tamanacs, arrived in their country in a bark, at the time of the great deluge, which is called the age of water. Amalivaca, sailing in his canoe, made the figures on the painted rocks of Encamarada,—some blocks of granite forming a species of cavern are denominated his house, and a large stone of regular form, his drum or instrument of music. He had a brother, who assisted him in giving the surface of the earth its present form. His daughters were fond of traveling, and he broke their legs to prevent them. After having regulated all things on that side of the great water, he embarked and returned to the other shore. The name of Amalivaca is found spread over a region of more than five thousand square leagues, and he is termed the "Father of Mankind," or our "Great Grandfather," even by the Caribbees, who, however, style him Amalivaca. At this deluge, all the Tamanacs were destroyed, except one man and one woman, who saved themselves on a mountain near the banks of the Asivera, and who, casting behind them, over their heads, the fruits of the Mauritia palm-tree, saw the seeds contained in them produce men and women, who re-peopled the earth. These traditions are current among the Tamanacs, the Maypures of the Great Cataracts, the Indians of the Rio Erevato, and all the tribes of the Upper Orinoco.

In Chile, on a mountain called Theghin, or Theg-thegin (which means, to crackle or sparkle like fire), the aborigines say that their early progenitors escaped from the deluge. There is a word in common use among them, says Molina, meaning "the great ancestor," or "our great ancestor," or "the renowned," which is hardly to be distinguished from Shem; "Febres spells it Them, but, as the th is frequently pronounced, it would sound like Chem."

The Muyscars, the ancient inhabitants of New Grenada, related that in the remotest times they lived like barbarians; when from the plains to the east of the Cordilleras, there came an old man with a long flowing beard, who was known by three appellations, one of which was Bochica. He taught them the arts, the worship of the sun, the cultivation of the earth, and to clothe themselves. His wife Huythaca, who was extremely beautiful, and less benevolent than her husband, swelled the river and caused the valley of Bogota to be inundated. All the natives perished, save a few who were preserved on the mountains. Huythaca was driven by Bochica from the earth, and became the moon; and the old man, after draining the valley, by breaking the rocks which enclosed it, retired to the holy valley of Iraca, where he lived austerely for two thousand years.

In ancient times, says Garcillasso, the whole country (of Peru) was occupied by natives of brutal habits, who went naked, subsisted upon roots and herbs, and lived in caverns. The Sun, perceiving their degraded condition, was touched with compassion, and sent from heaven his two children, Manco Capac and Mama Oello, to instruct them in the arts of humanity and religion, to teach them to cultivate the earth, to build houses, and weave garments.

In another tradition it was said, that after the deluge there came from the lake Titecaca a being or god, whom they called Viracocha, who first went to Tiahuanaco, and thence to Cuzco, where he commenced the work of civilization. The Inca Viracocha, who was named after this deity, in consequence of a dream in which the god appeared to him, described him as having a white shining countenance, a long beard, and flowing garments.

In Mexico, all improvements were ascribed to Quetzalcoatl, a white and bearded man, who, clothed in a black robe, appeared from Panuco, upon the shore of the Gulf of Mexico. He was high-priest and legislator, and instructed the inhabitants of Tula and Cholula, where he was held in extreme veneration. His was the golden age and era of peace; he invented the art of cutting gems, and casting metals, and taught them the ceremonies of their religion and the regulation of the seasons and calendar. The great spirit of Tezcatlipoca offered him a drink which made him immortal, and inspired him with a desire of visiting the distant country, Tiapailan; he then went to the east, and disappeared upon the coast.

In Chiapa, it is said, there was a tradition of one Votan, who was present at the building of the great tower, when mankind received different languages; and who was then commanded to people and make a division of the lands of Anahuac. In one of the Mexican picture writings, there is a delineation of the Mexican Noah or Coxcox, who with his wife was saved in a canoe, and finally, upon the subsidence of the flood, was landed upon a mountain called Colhuacan. Their children were born dumb, and received different languages from a dove upon a lofty tree. The natives of Mechoacan had a tradition, which, if it be correctly reported, accords most singularly with the narrative of the Noachic deluge. They say, that at the time of the great deluge, Tezpi embarked with his wife and children,—taking with them various animals, and several seeds of fruit,—in a calli or house. When the waters began to withdraw, he sent out a bird called aura, which remained feeding upon a carrion. He then sent out other birds that did not return, except the humming-bird, which brought a small branch in its mouth.

Letter from Past Grand Master Buck.

AURORA, ILLS., Dec. 4, 1868.

Dear Harman:

When I last wrote you I was about leaving for Canada, instead of coming to Springfield, to bring home my dear old father-in-law. Well, upon Thanksgiving day he left us for a brighter and better world. I send you to-day the Aurora Beacon, in which a kind friend has made a communication.

Since our acquaintance commenced I have buried a father and mother, two brothers, and now, last of all, a father-in-law, who was a member of my family. These constant calls of my Heavenly Father upon my family circle more and more remind me that soon I shall be called to travel through the Dark Valley. And as all that have gone before me, I trust, have found their way to mansions of bliss, I must be prepared to join them. God has been very merciful to me, and has crowned my earthly efforts with many things more than I deserved, and from this time both me and my household must devote their time to His service. How pleasant the thought that, in the better world we shall join those who have gone before. Knowing your trials personally in these things, how important it is to us that we should so live as to join the loved ones that are gone before us.

Fraternally yours,
IRA A. W. BUCK.

Masonic Record of Western India.

This valuable magazine for October is early at hand. Our agent, Bro. H. H. Avron, has an advertisement, reciting the recommendation of Grand Master Gorin, and besides copying several articles, THE TROWEL is very handsomely recommended as follows:

> AMERICA.—THE MASONIC TROWEL, one of the most popular and ably conducted Masonic journals in America, has established an agency in Bombay, for the sale of that journal, or any other of the numerous published works of Reynolds & Son, Illinois. W. Bro. Avron is the agent, and we can confidently recommend THE TROWEL to our Masonic brethren as a most useful and entertaining periodical. Particulars will be found in an advertisement.

We are very happy to learn that the Record is prospering finely.

MASONIC TROWEL.—Probably the best Masonic paper published is THE TROWEL, edited by Harman G. Reynold, Esq., Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Illinois, Springfield, Ill., at $1.25. It is valuable on account of its reliability and the jealous eye with which it guards the ancient landmarks.—Frontier Democrat.

Doings of the Grand Lodge.

CONTINUED.

At the grand communication in 1867, an appeal was taken to the Grand Lodge from Galesburg Lodge No. 372, upon the following state of facts: Charges were preferred against a brother, and he was tried and found guilty in regular form. Upon the question of expulsion and indefinite suspension, both failed for want of a two-thirds vote, but two-thirds voted to suspend. Upon a vote to fix any definite time, no agreement could be reached by a two-thirds vote. It was then suggested that a majority vote could fix the time, and the time was fixed at one year. From the whole proceeding an appeal was taken. Three opinions were entertained.

1. That all the proceedings were lawful; 2. That it took a two-thirds vote to fix the time, and for want of a two-thirds vote the accused stood suspended until the time was so fixed; 3. That it took a two-thirds vote to fix the time, and for want of that, the accused was not suspended at all.

The second view was ours. The Committee on Grievances sustained the action of the lodge, but the matter was referred to the Committee on Jurisprudence, which, at this session, reported as follows:

> The Committee on Masonic Jurisprudence, to whom was referred so much of the report of the Committee of Appeals and Grievances, made at last grand communication, as relates to the appeal of Bro. ——, and approves the action of Galesburg Lodge No. 372, respectfully report that they have given the subject their consideration, and disagree with the report of said committee in so far as it approves the fixing the time of suspension by a majority vote of the lodge.
> Your committee are of opinion that, under our laws, all suspensions are indefinite unless a certain time be specified for the duration thereof at the time it is ordered; that it is the fixing of the time which takes away the character of indefinite suspension, and changes the nature of the punishment from indefinite to definite—the word nature being used in our law as equivalent to the word amount used in the same paragraph.
> As the words nature and amount are used interchangeably, and as the law provides that all decisions fixing the nature of the punishment shall be by two-thirds majority, we have no doubt that a two-thirds vote is required to fix the punishmet, for how can there be any punishment unless the same be fixed.
> Your committee are therefore of opinion that the action of Galesburg Lodge, in attempting to fix the duration of the suspension of Bro. —— by a majority vote, was wholly inoperative and of no avail to take away the character of indefinite suspension from his punishment, already ordered; but that, in fact, he was in the first place indefinitely suspended, and so continued and must so continue until relieved of such suspension by the regular action of the Lodge, as in other cases of restoration.
> In regard to the resolution recommended by said committee, your committee are of opinion that the same would be, if put in force, an amendment of the by-laws. They further are of opinion, that it would be inexpedient to allow a majority to fix the punishment, but recommend so much of said resolution as prohibits the definite suspension of a member for more than twelve months.
> They therefore offer the following as an amendment of the by-laws:
> Resolved, That hereafter no definite suspension shall be ordered for a longer time than twelve months, and a majority of two-thirds of all votes cast shall be necessary to fix the duration of the suspension.

Which report was adopted by the Grand Lodge.

W. Bro. Hudson, from Committee on Appeals and Grievances, submitted a report, full, complete, and explanatory, which was adopted, item by item, without change; but as it treats of matters personal, the report is omitted.

W. Bro. Lowe, from the Committee on Finance, reported that the Grand Treasurer received from all sources last year $22,873.67; that he paid out $20,806.01, leaving a balance of $2,067.66; that the Grand Secretary had received and accounted for $23,410.27—making, in all, $25,477.93, exclusive of allowances to Grand Master.

None of the amendments to the by-laws were adopted.

The most difficult, and, to some, the most unsatisfactory piece of work, is the report on mileage. This time, with rare exceptions, it was a perfect success, and Bro. Barnard and his co-laborers may congratulate themselves on their success. The entire mileage and per diem amounts to $9,753.50.

The following important resolution, offered by R. W. Bro. Robbins, was adopted:

> Resolved, That no lodge acting under the jurisdiction of this Grand Lodge shall hereafter receive any petition for membership by degrees, unless such petition sets forth that the applicant has or has not ever made application for admission to any other lodge.

The splendid oration delivered by Dr. Bateman, Superintendent of Public Instruction, was ordered to be published with the proceedings.

The location of Gordon Lodge was fixed at Pocahontas, Bond county, and the location of Nunda Lodge at Nunda, McHenry county.

Doings of Grand Chapter.

At the opening of the Grand Chapter, Grand Chaplain Moore offered the following beautiful prayer:

Almighty and Most Merciful Grand High Priest of heaven and earth! Who is there in heaven but Thee; or who upon earth can stand in competition with Thee!

Thy omniscient mind brings all things in review—the past, the present, and the future. Thine omnipotent arm directs the movements of the vast creation, Thine omnipresent eye pervades the secret thoughts of every heart, Thy boundless goodness and beneficence supplies us with every comfort we enjoy, and Thy unspeakable perfections and glory surpass the understanding of the children of men.

O! Thou great and Supreme Architect, in whose presence there is fullness of joy, and at whose right hand there are pleasures forevermore; before whom it is written every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall confess, and before whom we, in the character of Royal Arch Masons, would most reverently bow, at the opening of this Grand Chapter, around our Masonic altar, that we may devoutly return unto Thee the gratitude of our hearts for the preservation of our lives through the year that is past, and heartily invoke Thy blessing upon this, our present coming together. May each of us be endowed with a competency of divine wisdom, to prepare us for the business pertaining to this, our grand annual communication. Bless, oh! bless our Most Excellent Grand High Priest, together with his counselors and advisers. Bless every officer and member of this Grand Chapter, and may Thy blessings rest upon our institution wherever its members may be convened in Thy name; and may each of us receive from Thy hands a fresh supply of grace to go forward in the discharge of our Masonic duties, relieving the distressed, and administering to the wants of the widow and orphan.

And now, Most Holy Father, hear us while we all unite in praying as Thou has taught us, saying, "Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name; Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive our debts as we forgive our debtors, and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory forever, Amen.

To Examine Visitors.—M. E. Comp. Hiram W. Hubbard (93), Comps. Paul B. Ring (96), Sylvester Stevens (68).

On Addresses of Grand and Deputy Grand High Priests.—Comps. W. B. Powell (60), W. A. Levanway (56), Geo. E. Lounsbury (74).

Ninety-four chapters were represented, five Past Grand High Priests, one Past Deputy Grand High Priest, one Past Grand King, and one hundred and three representatives, were in attendance.

The Committee on Work presented the following report, which was adopted:

The committee appointed at the last grand convocation to determine upon the work of this Grand Chapter and prepare a manual of constitutions, laws, forms, and ceremonies, beg leave to report:

That the committee met in Springfield, in January, every member being present, together with the Grand High priest. This session lasted over a week, when the committee adjourned, to meet in Chicago, in February. This second session was begun Monday morning, and continued without intermission until the Saturday following.

The committee have had presented for consideration almost every system of work practiced in this State, and the work of several other jurisdictions, the merits of which were severally discussed, and candidly considered.

The result of the labor of the committee has been arrived at through much labor, and with patience and an earnest desire to report a system of work which would meet the wishes of this Grand Chapter, and which would stand the test now and for all time.

The committee are now prepared to submit the work as the result of their labors.

Comp. McMurtry presented the report on grievances. Relating to personal matters, it is omitted.

Comp. Patch, from the Committee on Chapters U. D., submitted a very carefully prepared and critical report.

Want of care in making returns, defects in by-laws, disorder, irregularities in work, violation of Grand Chapter by-laws and resolutions, shortness in dues, incompleteness in making returns, were the objections, either in the returns or the work they present.

The returns and work of De Witt, Wiley M. Egan, Home, Mackey, and Elliott were declared perfect and complete in every respect.

The committee recommend charters to be granted as follows:

Pana, 115, at Pana.
Staunton, 116, at Staunton, Macoupin county.
Palatine, 117, at Palatine, Cook county.
Milton, 118, at Milton, Pike county.
De Witt, 119, at Petersburg, Menard county.
Elliott, 120, at Litchfield, Montgomery county.
Mt. Pulaski, 121, at Mt. Pulaski, Logan county.
Odin, 122, at Odin.
Chillicothe, 123, at Chillicothe, Peoria county.
Sangamon, 124, at Dawson.
Kansas, 125, at Kansas, Edgar county.
W. M. Egan, 126, at Chicago.
Home, 127, at Chicago.
Sullivan, 128, at Sullivan.
Nathan Whitney, 129, at Franklin Grove, Lee county.
Mackey, 130, at El Paso.
Payson, 131, at Payson, Adams county.
Girard, 132, at Girard.
Wyoming, 133, at Wyoming, Stark county.
La Harpe, 134, at La Harpe, Hancock county.

The matter of Mt. Pulaski Chapter was referred to the Grand High Priest, with power to act. It is alleged that the recommendation in this case should have come from Goodbrake Chapter, instead of Macon.

The name "Home" was changed to "Chicago."

The dispensation of the chapter at Perry was continued.

STATISTICS, U. D.—$561 dues, $110 charter fees paid; 436 members; 23 Mark Masters; 19 Past Masters; 12 M. E. Masters; 426 Royal Arch Masons; total, 426. 7 rejections; marked, 231; passed, 205; received and acknowledged, 200; exalted, 197; total degrees conferred, 835.

Comp. Holland, from Committee on Chartered Chapters, submitted a complete report. Three returns were sent back for completion. Two chapters violated sections 17 and 77, Grand Chapter by-laws. Nos. 9, 20, 62 are not returned. The tables show 42 Mark Masters, 54 Past Masters, 16 M. E. Masters, 66 non-affiliated, 488 non-resident, and 4,840 resident Royal Arch Masons, being in the whole, 5,506. 107 were rejected, 861 marked, 834 passed, 826 received and acknowledged, and 1,040 exalted, making a sum total of 3,561 degrees conferred. There were 60 deaths, 232 demissions, 10 expulsions, 39 suspensions, making the loss 354. Net gain, 756. The dues foot up $5,153.50.

The two reports show $5,713.50 dues, 5,864 members, 4,396 degrees conferred, and a net gain of 953.

The Committee on Grand Lodge Hall had leave to report at next grand convocation.

Comp. Powell submitted the following report upon the address of the Grand High Priest, which was adopted:

The committee to whom was referred the address of the M. E. Grand High Priest, have considered the same most carefully, and find from the facts there presented evidences of prosperity, unity, and brotherly love among the Royal Craft.

The committee congratulate the Grand Chapter on the continued growth of our Royal Temple, and the zeal manifested by its builders and master workmen, and respectfully ask you to consider and consent to the following opinions and recommendations:

That the portion of the address which relates to Chapters U. D. be referred to the appropriate committee.

That Tyrian Chapter No. 61 be restored to membership.

That in dealing with the difficulty which existed in Cairo Chapter No. 71, the M. E. Grand High Priest acted right.

The subject of intemperance, to which the M. E. Grand High Priest has called your attention, is one of vital importance to the well being of our Royal Craft, and demands your candid consideration and most decided action. Intemperance unmans the Craftsman, so that the working tools, however perfect they may be in themselves, are powerless for good in his hands; nay, more—by his unholy use of them many pieces of work are rendered fit only to be cast among the rubbish. The companion vice, profanity, is a habit that the true Mason must declare a crime, not to be practiced by him who would strictly obey the moral law. By the practice of these vices, Masons are led to violate the spirit of their obligations. They too frequently derogate from the name of a brother. They indulge, too often, in those practices in the lodge-room by which the ceremonies of the Order, solemn and impressive, when conducted as they should be, are made the occasion only for amusement. That the work so begun be continued, and that we do not render ourselves and our too frequently displayed symbols odious, the committee respectfully offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That each subordinate Chapter, within the jurisdiction of this Grand Chapter, shall purge itself of intemperance and profanity, and that it be the duty of this Grand Chapter to arrest the charter of any Chapter failing to comply with this resolution.

As the work presented by the Committe On Work has already been received and adopted, we recommend that the committee receive the cordial thanks of this Grand Chapter, and that as a testimonial of the labor performed, each member of said committee be presented with a Past Grand High Priest's jewel, and the Grand High Priest is hereby instructed to procure the same, and draw an order on the Treasurer for the amount.

We also recommend the adoption of the following:

Resolved, That this Grand Royal Arch Chapter so interprets section 7 of article 3, of the Constitution, as to make it obligatory upon Chapters to give notice of rejections, expulsions, and suspensions, in like manner and to the same extent as is now done by the lodges.

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to draft laws for the government of Chapters in trials, to be presented at the next grand convocation, and until such laws shall have been presented and acted upon, the subordinate Chapters are hereby instructed to be governed by the laws prescribed by the Grand Lodge.

Resolved, That candidates for promotion be required to pass a thorough examination on the preceding degree, in open Chapter, before being advanced.

Resolved, That we heartily thank our worthy companion, G. W. Lininger, for his official labors and efforts as M. E. Grand High Priest during the year past.

On motion of Comp. Fisher, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That every petitioner for the chapter degrees be hereafter required to state in his petition whether or not he has ever before petitioned for the Chapter degrees within this jurisdiction, and if so, to what chapter, and the result of the same; and in case such petition had been rejected, he shall not be received unless recommended by a unanimous vote of the Chapter rejecting him.

Resolution of thanks to the retiring Grand High Priest was heartily and unanimously adopted, and the Grand High Priest elect was instructed to procure M. E. Comp. Lininger a Past Grand High Priest's jewel.

Section 5, article 3, of the constitution, was amended by striking out "twenty" and inserting "thirty," so that the fees for the chapter degrees cannot be less than thirty dollars.

Clinton, Iowa.

In 1856, a traveler by steamboat might have seen, at one point on the shore of Clinton county, a single farm house and a single field of corn. That beautiful landscape—all but the small field and small house—was a three mile view dressed in nature's own adornments. In the foreground, at a little distance from the shore, stood two rough posts, ten feet apart, and ten feet high, upon which was nailed a board subscribed with the word "Clinton."

It is remembered that it reminded one stranger who saw it that the name was a good omen, for Clinton was the name, not only of an honored Mason, but associated with it is also the fact that to Dewitt Clinton, of New York, and to the Erie Canal, of which he was the projector, is the West indebted for the first element of its really progressive settlements, its profitable agriculture, and its immense commerce. The West has nearly ceased to need that canal, though it made New York the empire, and Ohio the third State in the Union, and without it there would have been no great West to-day.

That Clinton sign-board pointed nowhere, but merely designated the site of a proposed city, which was commenced in that year. Twelve years have elapsed, and the place of the corn-field is occupied by solid blocks of brick buildings; a railroad bridge has for five years spanned the father of waters, for the passage of four daily trains of cars, which now pass a thousand miles further west, and beyond the Rocky Mountains, on their way to the Pacific coast, the limit of the American West. The local labor of the railroad at Clinton now employs four hundred men, and one of the extensive lumber manufactories has work for two hundred and fifty men, and 11,000,000 feet more lumber was sold at Clinton, in 1867, than any other city in Iowa.

Such facts are among the data for thinking men to use in estimating the growth of the young cities of Iowa, its prospects as the future central State, and the consequent exalted position of Iowa Masonry. At the present ratio of progress of our whole country for ten years past, Iowa, at the close of the present century, only thirty-two years hence, instead of 1,000,000, now, will have a population of 3,000,000, and the number of Masons, in that time, will increase to 50,000 or 75,000. Clinton may then have 20,000 to 50,000 inhabitants, instead of less than 10,000. It is one of the youngest of the very rapidly growing Iowa cities. Its people are progressive, as were its early Masons in 1846, when they adopted the western spirit and named their proposed lodge the Western Star.—Evergreen.

Labor and Refreshment.

Our brethren of the last century, with a view to the more complete accommodation of the members, had their lodges furnished with a long table extending from east to west down the center of the room; and in cases where the lodge was numerous, two, flanked by benches with backs—leaving a commodious passage at each end for uses which every brother is acquainted with; and in the latter case, the Senior Warden occupied the northwest, and the Junior Warden the southwest end. On these tables were disposed a pair of 18-inch globes; the perfect ashlar suspended from a Lewis, and affixed to a winch; and sometimes an air pump, an armillary sphere, and a small philosophical apparatus, as well as the usual ornaments, furniture, and jewels. The effect was imposing; and I think we have gained nothing by its sacrifice. I confess I prefer this disposition of a lodge for many reasons. It prevents that indiscriminate arrangement of the members which occasionally creates much confusion, by placing the brethren more completely under the Master's eye, and consequently under his command; for in the present arrangement of the lodge-room, opportunities are offered for private conventions and conversations, which are the bane of societies constituted on the plan of Masonry, and a violation of the ancient charges of the Order, which positively forbid them "to hold private committees or separate conversation, without leave from the Master; not to talk of anything impertinently or unseemly, nor interrupt the Master or Wardens, or any brother speaking to the Master." Such conduct is sure to prove an obstacle to the good government of the lodge, on which the stability and success of the Institution in a great measure depend.—Oliver.

General Joseph Warren.

This distinguished patriot and able supporter of the freedom of America, was born in Roxbury, Mass., A. D. 1740; graduated at Harvard College in 1759; studied medicine, and soon became qualified to practice with eminent success. His fine address and sound education gained him the esteem and regard of the polite and learned; while his frank, open disposition, and obliging attention to all with whom he came in contact, caused him to be greatly respected and beloved, especially by those who moved in the humble walks of life.

He early espoused the cause of his country, and resisted boldly and fearlessly the oppressions of the British Parliament. His maxim was, that every kind of taxation was complete tyranny on the part of England. He watched over the interests of his country with zeal and faithfulness, and his vigilance increased as danger approached. From the year 1768 he was the leading member of a secret society in Boston, which had great influence on the political affairs of the country. In this assembly the plans of defense were matured. With all his boldness, decision, and zeal, he was wise and circumspect. He was twice chosen public orator of the town of Boston, on the anniversary of the massacre of the 5th of March, 1770; and his orations exhibit the spirit and energy of a great and daring mind. It was he who, on the evening pending the battle of Lexington, obtained information of the intended expedition against Concord, and sent an express to Hancock and Adams, who were at Lexington, to warn them of their danger. He was very active next day, the ever-memorable 19th of April. It is said in General Heath's memoirs, that a ball took off part of his earlock.

After the departure of Hancock to the General Congress, General Warren was chosen president of the Provincial Congress in his place. Four days previous to the battle of Bunker Hill he received his commission of Major General of the army of the United Colonies. He did not command the American forces on the ever-memorable 17th of June, 1775, but went on the field of battle as a volunteer, that, by his presence, he might encourage the men within the lines. Just as the retreat commenced he was struck by a musket ball in the head, and died in the trenches.

This distinguished member of the Order received the honors of Royal Arch Masonry in St. Andrew's Chapter on the 14th of May, 1770, and was, no doubt, admitted to membership soon after; for his name appears upon the records as being present at several subsequent meetings. Comp. Warren was appointed Grand Master of Masons in Boston, and within one hundred miles of the same, by virtue of a commission from the Right Honorable and Most Worshipful George, Earl of Dalhousie, Grand Master of Masons in Scotland, in December, 1769; and in 1773 he received a commission from the Right Honorable and Most Worshipful Patrick, Earl of Dumphries, Grand Master of Masons in Scotland, under date of March 3, 1772, appointing him Grand Master of Masons for the "Continent of America." He held this office, and discharged its duties in a manner honorable to himself and to the satisfaction and lasting benefit of the Fraternity, to the day of his untimely death. His signature, affixed to several charters now in existence, is regarded as a sacred relic.

During the short period that our distinguished brother was at the head of the Fraternity in America, notwithstanding the disturbed and unsettled state of the country, Masonry flourished, and the lodges increased in number and respectability; his death, therefore, was a severe loss to the Institution. Difficulties soon after arose respecting the extent of the powers of the Grand Lodge—of its capacity to perform its usual functions—and confusion and disorder followed. The meetings of the Fraternity were suspended during the occupation of Boston by the British troops.

M. W. Bro. Warren was thirty-five years of age at the time of his decease. A monument was erected to his memory, on the spot where he fell, by King Solomon's Lodge, of Charlestown, bearing the following inscription, viz.:

"Erected A. D. 1794, by King Solomon's Lodge of Freemasons, constituted at Charlestown, 1783,
IN MEMORY OF MAJOR GENERAL WARREN,
AND HIS ASSOCIATES,
Who were slain on this memorable spot,
June 17, 1775.
None but they who set a just value upon the blessings of Liberty are worthy to enjoy her.
In vain we toiled, in vain we fought; we bled in vain, if you, our offspring, want valor to repel the assaults of her invaders.
Charlestown settled, 1628; burnt, 1775; rebuilt, 1776.
The enclosed land was given by Hon. James Russell."

Israel Putnam.

The commencement of our difficulties with the mother country found Putnam a quiet farmer, and well advanced in life; but he threw himself into the controversy with all the boldness and energy of his younger years. He declared for his country without hesitation, and declared the stamp act an unmitigated tyranny. He was one of a committee appointed to confer with the Governor on the subject, who inquired of the committee what he should do if the stamped paper were sent to him. "Lock it up," said Putnam, "and give us the key; we will take care of it." "But suppose I should refuse you admission?" queried the Governor. "In five minutes your house will be leveled with the dust," said the stern old warrior, and "His Excellency" was satisfied.

Being familiar with the British officers, he held conversation with them relative to the impending troubles. One of them inquired of Putnam if he did not think five thousand British soldiers could march the whole length of the continent. "Yes," Putnam promptly replied, "If they behaved properly, and paid for what they took, but if they attempted it in a hostile manner, the American women would knock them on the head with their ladles."

Such was Putnam; a compound of blunt honesty, unswerving patriotism, and a bravery that no danger could appall. He was a "rough ashlar," but sound, and his soldierly qualities, tried on many a battle-field, gave him unbounded influence in the community, which he wielded in supporting resistance to British aggression, at whatever cost and hazard.

FAITH comes by hearing, hope by experience. Faith comes by hearing the word of God, hope by the credit that faith has given to it. Faith believes the truth of the word, hope waits for the fulfilling of it. Faith lays hold of that end of the promise that is next to us, to-wit, as it is in the Bible; hope lays hold of that end of the promise that is fastened to the mercy seat—for the promise is like a mighty cable that is fastened by one end to a ship, and by the other to the anchor. The soul is the ship where faith is, and to which the hither end of this cable is fastened; but hope is the anchor that is at the other end of this cable, and "which entereth into that within the veil."

Abraham Jonas.

On the 6th of April, 1840, James Adams, of Springfield Lodge, at Springfield, H. Rogers and Harrison Dills, of Bodley Lodge, at Quincy, W. D. McCann, of Columbus Lodge, at Columbus, J. T. Jones, proxy of Equality Lodge, at Equality, Gallatin county, D. Rockwell, proxy of Far West Lodge, at Galena, and Wm. B. Warren and Alex. Dunlap, of Harmony Lodge, at Jacksonville, met at Jacksonville and organized the Grand Lodge of Illinois, and elected Abraham Jonas, Past Grand Master of Kentucky, their first Grand Master. As he was not present, it must be regarded as a great compliment to his Masonic acquirements and zeal, to his high standing, integrity, and reputation. His associate officers were Breth. James Adams, Deputy Grand Master; W. S. Vance, Senior Grand Warden; H. Rogers, Junior Grand Warden; Alex. Dunlap, Grand Treasurer; and Wm. B. Warren, Grand Secretary. Of the delegates present at said meeting, Breth. Dunlap, Warren, and Dills have since been elected Grand Masters, and Breth. Adams, Rockwell, and Dunlap have departed this life.—Trowel, April, 1862.

Of Lodges.

A lodge is a place where Masons assemble and work; hence that assembly, or duly organized society of Masons, is called a lodge; and every Brother ought to belong to one, and be subject to its by-laws, and general regulations. It is either particular or general, and will be best understood by attending it, and by the regulations of the General or Grand Lodge hereunto annexed. In ancient times, no Master or Fellow could be absent from it, especially when warned to appear at it, without incurring a severe censure, until it appeared to the Master and Wardens that pure necessity hindered him.

The persons admitted members of a lodge, must be good and true men—free born, and of mature and discreet age. No bond-men, no women, no immoral or scandalous men, but of good report.—Old Charges.

AT the commnnication of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, in 1835, "Bro. Past Grand Master Jonas presented the petition of a number of brethren, praying for a dispensation to hold a lodge at Quincy, Illinois," which was referred to a standing committee, who, upon due consideration, reported a resolution recommending that the same be granted to Daniel Harrison, Daniel Whipple, and Henry King, to be known and designated by the name of Quincy Lodge U. D.; upon the reading of which I moved to amend by striking out the name "Quincy," and inserting the following words:

"Bodley, in remembrance of our deceased Grand Master, Thomas Bodley," which was unanimously adopted.

A few words now upon the deceased, and my knowledge of him:

At the foundation of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, in 1800, Thomas Bodley was a Past Master, and represented one of the lodges at its foundation, and was elected its first Grand Secretary, which office he held for several years, after which he was occasionally in the Grand Lodge up to the year 1816, and in that year was elected Senior Grand Warden, in 1817 Deputy Grand Master, and Grand Master in 1818. He continued a regular member of Lexington Lodge No. 1, from its first foundation by the Grand Lodge of Virginia, until his death.—P. Swigert, in Trowel, Jan., 1864.

The True Place of Woman.

In the worthy efforts to open the treasures of Masonic relief or counsel to the fairer sex, in which many of our brightest Masons are concerned, the following sentiments may be used to good effect:

Woman is created to be "the companion of man;" how often has she been made his slave, the instrument of his passions, the plaything of his idle hours. This everywhere among the savage tribes has been the case, and even among nations which were civilized, if pagan, woman had rarely assigned to her proper place. This was but another phase of that ferocity that has cursed the earth by its cruelties in war—the stronger trampling on the weak. But there was this mighty difference, that whereas a feeble tribe might by conquest be made harmless, the influence of the woman could not be destroyed. There belongs to her in each several relations as sister, wife, mother, a vast social power for good or evil, of which she can not be deprived. If crushed, down-trodden, and despised by an unchristian civilization, woman, alas! had her too ample revenge in the baneful influence which, from man's fault and her own sad misfortune, went forth from her as by a law of retribution to revenge her on tyrants. Her womanly nature, which would have shed its sweet and softening influence on society, could not be dried up, but did, without her meaning it, give forth the soured and bitter influences which oppression, to its own just punishment, wrung out from her. Never, therefore, could there be a true civilization where woman was not assigned her proper place. But where this justice is done her, what a rich reward she bestows on man! It is her's, then, to humanize him by the gentle charities; to engraft with her delicate female touch the softer graces upon the undergrowth of his nature; to distil around the deep roots of his being a secret, subtle balm of all the purest passions which, when she is aroused into their strength, she then softens without enervating them. It is woman's mission, in the quiet privacies of home, to feed the center founts of society with those humanizing influences which distil as naturally from her as its balm from the tree, or their odor from the flowers. But why crush the extended branch, or why tread down tho exhaling flower? The more tenderly they are nurtured, the richer the balm—the more fragrant the aroma they will yield.

And so woman, if herself the nursling of tenderness, will more tenderly minister. Now, in the Scripture, woman has assigned to her proper place, the amenities of her sex are vindicated, her mission is defined, her ministrations are allowed and acknowledged, she is placed at man's side, his companion, his friend, his equal, and help-meet for him. Weaker in physical frame, she is admonished to cling to him for support; of intellectual energies less vigorous than his, she is taught to make him her counsellor. But superior to him in the finer and purely delicate sentiments of their common nature, he must seek toward her, unless he would become stern in his strength, and in his virile hardihood degenerate into harshness.

We know nothing finer in the whole range of literature than are some of the exhibitions of female character which are to be met with in the Scripture histories. A loving wife and a devoted mother, she is seen shedding her hallowed loveliness around the household.

The sires and sons of Israel, so noble patriots, heroes of dauntless bravery, men of action and mettle in Israels best days, went forth from homes where woman's work was known and her power admitted. It was she as wife or mother who made those sires and sons of Israel the men they proved to be. But not only in the privacy of home is the Hebrew woman to be seen; she could step forth without forgetting her womanly modesty, in these stirring times equal to deeds of valor, that the veterans of the nation might envy. She, too, was poetess, priestess, prophetess; but nobler still, she was ennobled as the mother of the Saviour.

Harriet Hosmer.

A correspondent of the Chicagoan writes from Rome:

Miss Hosmer's studio is the pretttiest in Rome. The little entrance court, with its beautiful flowers and singing canaries, is a delightful change from the hot, dusty streets. When we went in it was her reception day, and she was showing to some strangers the fountain in the centre of the first room. Below, in the basin, three charming little fellows are bestriding dolphins, lying on the broad leaves of aquatic plants. They are fascinated by the music, and one has his dimpled hand at his ear, listening intently, when the water spouts from the shells above. Miss Hosmer has a peculiar mode of tinting the marble. I think she must have caught the better part of Gibson's idea, for she does not give it a flesh color, but a bright creamy tint, which adds greatly to the expression of the statue, and seems like the true color of old marble. She spoke of this, and said, pointing to the fountain, "all these babes have got to be washed before they go away." Miss Hosmer has a very vivacious manner, a little abrupt and very decided, and when she speaks, in clear, ringing tones, in moments when you or she have just said something that pleases her, her expression and manner are exceedingly charming, and her laugh, which came often while we were there, is one of the most musical I have heard. She wore a little velvet cap, which reminded me of Raphael's.

In the same room with the fountain is a fine copy of her "Puck." She has a mate for him in her later "Will-o'-the-Wisp," or at least a comrade, but the latter is not quite so bewitching. But the glory of her room is a head of "Medusa." I have always thought that to fulfill the true idea of the old myth, "Medusa" should be wonderfully beautiful, but I never saw one so before. This is the head of a lovely girl, her rich hair kept back by a fillet from the noble forehead, seems at first to recede in waves; when you see that these waves terminate in serpents, it strikes you with no feeling of repulsion. The face, whose eyes look upward, is full of glorious sadness, to which the serpents add an idea of mystery and gloom, which makes the beauty more fascinating and thrilling; and the folded wings which come down over the hair on each side of the face, give an air of majesty to the head which enhances the effect. It was hard for me to look away from the statue; if long gazing would have turned one to stone, the old tradition would have been fulfilled. In the neighboring room was a full length, and several busts, of the stately "Zenobia," whom you doubtless saw in Chicago a few years ago.

Bro. Glaisher on Meteors.

Bro. Glaisher, F. R. S. A., recently delivered at the Exhibition Hall, Falmouth, a most interesting lecture on "Meteors," to a large and attentive audience, Mr. J. St. Aubyn, M. P., occupying the chair.

Bro. Glaisher prefaced his lecture by observing that, although this was his first visit to that institution, he could not say that he felt himself as a stranger amongst them, because for many years he had looked at this institution with the greatest respect, and he knew it was favorably known in the scientific world. And when they considered that Davies, Gilbert, and Sir Charles Lemon were parents of this institution, and when at the present time it included his friends Robert Hunt and Robert Were Fox, it was impossible that they should not look with respect to an institution of this kind. And there was yet one other name—a name of well-known fame, a name of which they, as residents of Cornwall, should be proud, as he had added greatly to astronomical knowledge, and ffxed the exact position of Neptune before any other eye had seen it—he referred to his friend, Professor Adams, who was still applying himself to the solution of problems as difficult as the mind of man could be directed to, and he shonld have to refer to the Professor as being engaged as helping them out of the difficulties of the subject of his lecture. It was a pleasure to him to hear the president that day make some reference to his wish that the society should be a county society. It ought to be a county society, and the county might well be proud of it. They had sown the seeds for good, but societies of this kind did not always reap the fruit, but certain it was that it was this society that had produced several clever men who had left them to work elsewhere, and generally by the awards they had given that day they had encouraged native talent and industry. After paying a high tribute to the earnestness and ability of the judges, Bro. Glaisher proceeded with his lecture, pointing out that meteors, or falling or shooting stars, had attracted the greatest attention of all ages, and in all countries, and had created a great deal of curiosity as to their origin and intrinsic value. Until nearly the close of the last century there had been no recorded remarkable shower of meteors, but on the 12th of November, 1799, Humboldt and Bonphland, at Cumana, in South America, witnessed a very remarkable display of meteors. Humboldt thus spoke of it:—"From half after two in the morning the most luminous meteors were seen towards the east. Thousands of falling stars succeeded each other during four hours." Humboldt believed this to be a local phenomena, but the publication of this report brought others, which showed that it was not local; that it was seen at the equator, 700 miles below Cumana, and in Greenland and Labrador. It was also observed in England, but it was evident that more shooting stars were seen in America than in Europe. Humboldt added to this description that he was told that a similar phenomena preceded the great earthquake of 1766, but no suspicion of periodicity of the meteors. Until the 13th of November, 1832, no other star shower was observed, and on that day observers were taken with as much suprise as was Humboldt in 1799. Full records of it were collected. In some places the meteors were so many that it was impossible to count them; in others they were compared to a rain of fire. The shower was less remarkable than that of 1799, and it was most confined to Europe. The fact of its occurring on the 13th of November, whilst that seen by Humboldt occurred on the 12th, indicated for the first time the probable periodicity of the phenomenon, and anxiously was the 13th of November in the following year looked for. On the 13th of November a very remarkable shower fell, extending from Cuba to Greenland, and from W. long. 61 degs. to W. long. 36 degs. In America it lasted for five hours. The number of meteors seen in seven hours was estimated at 200,000. It was certain that from 10,000 to 30,000 were seen in a single hour, and sometimes as many as 1,000 in a minute. The display surpassed in brilliancy any ever since observed. After, there was no doubt of the periodical character of the showers, and this was the first grand step in the knowledge of meteoric astronomy. One great difficulty existed in the display of 1799 occurring on the 12th of November, and that of 1832 and 1833 on the 13th. It appeared that in America it was observed that the meteor tracks in 1833 took their direction from a point which retained its place unchanged among the stars during the continuance of the shower. This fact was the second great step. Attention was then called to the fact that between 1766, 1799, and 1833, there was a lapse of 33 years between grand displays of meteors. Research among ancient records of the mentions of the November meteors was made, and evidence was produced from the Chinese, Arabic, etc., dating back from the year 902 down to 1698, showing that there was a lapse of 33 and a quarter years between each display, the phenomena on each occasion causing much dismay in different parts. In 902 the display occurred on the 13th October, and each successive display was a day or two later. From this almost unbroken chain of evidence the periodical character of the November meteors was establshed, and its astronomical character indicated. They also knew that the display occurred two years in succession, each time 24 hours later. The procession of the equinox would account for one half of the day, and Professor Adams set himself to discover whether the amount of disturbance which the planets would ever exercise in reflecting the orbit of the meteors would account for the other half. He found that during a period of 33¼ years the longitude of the node is increased 20 deg. by the action of Jupiter, and nearly 7 deg. or 8 deg. by the action of other planets, so that the entire calculated increase of the node in 33¼ is about 28 deg., or about half a day's journey, and this remarkable accordance between the results of theory and observation leaves no doubt as to the correctness of the period being 33¼ years nearly. The result of Prof. Adams' investigation is probably one of the most important contributions to Physical Astronomy made in the year 1867. The stability of meteoric showers being thus established led to the inquiry whether the isolated meteors seen almost nightly all over the globe were in any way similarly connected with radiant points or fixed periods. The result showed that there were a series of undoubted radiant points. Thus meteor showers were undoubtedly much more numerous and definite than could possibly have been imagined a few years since, and as a rule the showers are very regularly recurrent every year. The well-known shower in November, however, is only recurrent in its magnificence every 33 years. After referring to the showers of 1866 and 1867, attention was directed to another fact connected with these meteor showers which had come upon them as unexpectedly as the wonderful appearance in the sky in 1833 struck the beholders. It had been discovered that the comets No. 2 of 1862, and No. 1 of 1866, were nothing but large meteors, and connected with large showers that then fell. This evident connection of the meteors with comets was a discovery of the most momentous kind, and might lead to other acquisitions of knowledge. They were now beginning to learn that comets and meteors were intimately connected, the former being only an assemblage of the latter. Bro. Glaisher finished his lecture by referring to the unexpected great knowledge they had acquired on the subject during the past few years.

Mr. St. Aubyn, M. P., moved a vote of thanks, in eulogistic terms, to the lecturer, and humorously remarked that Bro. Glaisher had not told them all about meteors, for he (the chairman) should like to know what they were made of, where they came from, where they go to, and for what design they were sent. Still he was glad Bro. Glaisher had not told them all, for this would give them a claim on him another year to come and finish the subject.

Bro. Glaisher, in acknowledging the compliment, hoped that persons in the neighborhood of Falmouth would make observations on the subject so as to lead to increased knowledge.—F. M. Magazine, London.

Thrilling Adventure.

"Father will have done the great chimney to-night, won't he, mother?" said little Tommy Howard, as he stood waiting for his father's breakfast, which he carried to him at his work every morning.

"He said that he hoped all the scaffolding would be down to-night," answered the mother, "and that'll be a fine sight; for I never like the ending of those great chimneys, it is so risky for father to be last up."

"Oh! then, but I'll go and see him, and help 'em to give a shout before he comes down," said Tom.

"And then," continued the mother, "if all goes on all right, we are to have a frolic to-morrow, and go into the country, and take our dinner, and spend all the day long in the woods."

"Hurrah!" cried Tom, as he ran off to his father's place of work, with a can of milk in one hand and some bread in the other. His mother stood at the door, watching him as he went merrily whistling down the street, and she thought of the dear father he was going to, and the dangerous work he was engaged in; and then her heart sought its sure refuge, and she prayed to God to protect and bless her treasures.

Tom with a light heart pursued his way to his father, and leaving him his breakfast, went to his own work, which was at some distance. In the evening, on his way home, he went around to see how his father was getting along.

James Howard, the father, and a number of other workmen, had been building one of those lofty chimneys which, in our manufacturing towns, almost supply the place of our architectural beauty. The chimney was of the highest and most tapering that had ever been erected, and as Tom shaded his eyes from the slanting rays of the setting sun, and looked up in search of his father, his heart sank within him at the appalling sight. The scaffold was almost down—the men were removing the beams and poles. Tom's father stood alone at the top.

He then looked around to see that everything was right, the men below answering him with a loud, loud cheer, little Tom shouting as long as any of them. As their voices died away, however, they heard a different sound, a cry of horror and alarm from above. The men looked around, and coiled upon the ground lay the rope, which, before the scaffolding was removed, should have been fastened to the chimney for Tom's father to come down by. The scaffold had been removed without remembering to take the rope up. There was a dead silence. They all knew it was impossible to throw the rope up high enough to reach the top of the chimney, or even if possible, it would hardly be safe. They stood in silent dismay, unable to give any help or think of any means of safety.

And Tom's father! He walked round and round the little circle, the dizzy height seeming more and more fearful, and the solid earth farther and farther from him. In the sudden panic, he lost his presence of mind—his senses failed him. He shut his eyes! he felt as if the next moment he must be dashed to pieces on the ground below. The day passed as industriously as usual with Tom's mother at home. She was always busily employed for her husband or children in some way, and to-day she had been harder at work than usual, getting ready for the holiday to-morrow. She had just finished her arrangements, and her thoughts were silently thanking God for the happy home and all those blessings, when Tom ran in.

His face was white as ashes, and he could hardly get the words out.

"Mother! mother! he can not get down."

"Who, lad—thy father?" she asked.

"They have forgotten to leave him the rope," answered Tom, still scarcely able to speak.

The mother started up horror-struck, and stood for a moment as if paralyzed, then pressing her hands over her face, as if to shut out the terrible picture, and breathing a prayer to God for help, rushed out of the house.

When she reached the place where her husband was at work, a crowd gathered round the foot of the chimney, and stood quite helpless, gazing up, with their faces full of sorrow.

"He says he'll throw himself down."

"Thee munna do that, lad," cried the wife, with a clear, hopeful voice; "thee munna do that—wait a bit. Take off thee stocking, lad, and unravel it, and let down the thread with a bit of mortar. Dost thou hear me, Jem?"

The man made a sign of assent—for it seemed as if he could not speak—and taking off his stocking, unraveled the worsted yarn row after row. The people stood around in breathless silence and suspense, wondering what Tom's mother could be thinking of, and why she sent Tom in such haste for the carpenter's ball of twine.

"Let down one end of the thread with a bit of stone, and keep fast hold of the other," cried she to her husband. The little thread came waving down the tall chimney, blown hither and thither by the wind, but it reached the outstretched hands that were awaiting it. Tom held the ball of twine, while his mother tied one end of it to the thread.

"Now pull it slowly," cried she to her husband, and she gradually unwound the string until it reached her husband. "Now hold the string fast and pull," cried she, and the string grew heavy and hard to pull, for Tom and his mother had fastened a thick rope to it. They watched it gradually and slowly uncoiling from the ground, and the string was drawn higher.

There was one coil left—it had reached the top. "Thank God!" exclaimed the wife. She hid her face in her hands in silent prayer, and tremblingly rejoiced. The iron to which it was to be fastened was there all right—but would her husband be able to make use of it? Would not the terror of the past have so unnerved him as to prevent him from taking the necessary measure for safety? She did not know the magical influence her few words had exercised over him. She did not know the strength that the sound of her voice, so calm and steadfast, had filled him—as if the little thread had carried him the hope of life once more, had conveyed to him some portion of that faith in God, which nothing ever destroyed or shook in her pure heart. She did not know that, as she waited there, the words came over him; "Why art thou cast down, O, my soul, why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God." She lifted her heart to God for hope and strength, but could do nothing more for her husband, and her heart turned to God and rested upon him as on a rock.

There was a great shout.

"He's safe, mother, he's safe!" cried Tom.

"Thou hast saved my life, my Mary," said the husband, folding her in his arms. "But what ails you? thou seemest more sorry than glad about it." But Mary could not speak, and if the strong arm of her husband had not held her up she would have fallen to the ground—the sudden joy after such fear, had overcome her.

"Tom, let thy mother lean on thy shoulder," said his father, "and we will take her home." And in their happy home they poured forth thanks to God for his great goodness, and their happy life together felt dearer and holier for the peril it had been in, and in the nearness of the danger that had brought them unto God. And the holiday next day—was it not indeed a thanksgiving day?

The New York Swindles.

THE TICKET TRICK.

A very common mode of operation is for a fictitious firm to inclose a lithographed note to some one, whose name they have previously obtained, stating that he has drawn a prize valued at $200; that the rules of the company require payment of five or ten per cent. upon all prizes drawn; that therefore on receipt of five or ten dollars the prize, usually a gold watch, will be sent by express. The person into whose hands the note falls knows he has never bought a ticket, but presumes he has been mistaken for somebody else. His covetousness is appealed to. He is tempted into dishonesty. He becomes a party to the fraud; incloses the sum demanded, and, of course, that is the end of the matter. He is naturally ashamed to confess his weakness, and the swindlers in turn profit by his cupidity.

THE CURRENCY FRAUD.

Still another trick is to send a circular to one of the greenhorns in the country, inclosing a ten-cent note postal currency (genuine), informing him if he wants one hundred of them for a dollar, he can get them by inclosing the amount. The packets are from $10 to $100. The swindler says the currency will do for betting or making a show, but does not mention anything about passing them as counterfeit money. Greenhorn sees the postal currency looks well, and after investigation learns that it is good. He immediately jumps at the idea of getting $10 for $1, and writes with inclosure. It is needless to say he never receives an answer to his letter, and does not deserve to.

GREENBACKS GRATIS.

Drawings for money are advertised, prizes, five, ten, fifty, and one thousand dollars. A confidential circular is sent, and the recipient is told that if he will aid the managers in making their lottery known that he shall have a prize of $100. Numerous tickets and circulars are forwarded for his distribution. Whether he does anything with them or not he pretends to, and writes the firm to that effect.

The swindlers return answer that they have set aside $100 for his services; inquire if he will have the money remitted by a draft or in treasury notes; and add incidently that five per cent., according to the inflexible rule of the firm, is always charged for such advances. The unsophisticated fellow sends five dollars, and loses it instead of getting ninety-five dollars for nothing, as he fondly imagined.

SPURIOUS LOTTERIES.

These scoundrels have still another device. They send a packet of tickets for a lottery to anybody whose name they have procured, requesting that he will return the money for them by mail. Of course no man is foolish enough to do that. The tickets are returned, left in the postoffice, or destroyed with some indignation.

In two or three weeks another circular is mailed, to the effect that no doubt the person addressed had remitted the money, but that owing to postal detention or failure, it had not been received. The lottery dealers inform him one of the tickets has drawn a prize, and that it will be forwarded as soon as the percentage, five per cent., is sent to the address. The prize named is generally $100 or $200. Verdant hastens to mail five or ten dollars, and the firm is silent forever after as the grave.

Honor to Whom Honor is Due.

The Grand Lodge of Illinois, at its recent annual communication, gave "honor to whom honor was due," in the election of their long-tried, true, and trusty Grand Secretary, Bro. Harman G. Reynolds, by elevating him to the highest post of honor in their gift; the announcement of which first appeared in these columns. While we wish from the bottom of our hearts that in the new and more exalted position to which our friend and M. W. brother has been elevated he will earn additional laurels, we sincerely hope, in his editorial capacity, he will for the future do as his Grand Lodge has done, give "honor to whom honor is due." What we mean, is this: In THE TROWEL of October 15th, but undoubtedly published subsequent to that date, we find several articles published as editorials for which credit should have been given. Amongst them we find one copied verbatim from the Keystone of October 17th, under the heading "Ancient Scottish Rite," and which appears in italics, and all, as we wrote it. The proof that such is the case, is that two typographical errors are retained, viz.: the name of E. H. Shaw, of California, appearing as T. H. Shaw, and that of that prince of good fellows, Dr. Vincent L. Hurlbut, of Illinois, as V. L. Hurlburt. Credit is also withheld from the "Landmarks," fifteen in number, extracted from Simons' "Masonic Jurisprudence," but which appear as original.

Dear Bro. Reynolds, please give "honor to whom honor is due." It has been, and ever will be, our practice to do so to other parties, yourself included.—The Keystone, Phila.

THE EFFECT.—"The sound of your hammer," says Franklin, "at five in the morning, or at night, heard by a creditor, makes him easy six months longer; but if he sees you at a biliard-table, or hears your voice in a tavern, when you should be at your work, he will send for his money the next day."

EXTRACT

From an Oration Delivered by Hon. Geo. H. Halliday, P. M. Mt. Nebo Lodge No. 76, Carlinville, June 23d, 1866.

Even if Masonry is a modern institution, it might still be worthy the respect and patronage of men. But, although we regard the antiquity of its origin one of the feeblest claims to the admiration of the world, we are not disposed to abandon even this to the sneers of our adversaries. There have been times in the life of every well informed Mason when he looked with suspicious eye upon pretensions to an origin even as remote as the building of King Solomon's temple. But the industrious inquirer, as he prosecutes his researches, is astonished at the blaze of light with which Masonic customs illumine the darkest periods of history, and the gathering evidences of its universality and remote origin. There are certain great facts that stare us in the face, that can be explained on no other hypothesis. The learned Warburton has demonstrated that societies have existed in all ancient nations teaching the same ideas, conducted on the same principles, with substancially the same ceremonies as the Masons. The ancient Phœnicians were guardians of the science of Europe from the flood to the establishment of governments in Greece, and as operative and speculative Masons constructed all the principal temples of antiquity, including that of King Solomon at Jerusalem. They traced their skill beyond the flood, through a secret order, back to Seth, the son of Adam, who according to Josephus, before the flood erected two pillars to perpetuate the knowledge of the discoveries which had been made in the heavens and the earth. These pillars were adopted as the emblems of the Craft, and were placed by them at the entrance of their public works. In the temple at Jerusalem we find them placed at the entrance in the porch, and the description shows that they were placed there as symbols merely, as they were not appropriated to any particular use. These pillars are always found at the entrance of Masonic lodges, and can be explained upon no other consistent theory than that they have been preserved as significant emblems from the remotest antiquity, and handed down in an unbroken line from the oldest builders and architects in the world. Betham has demonstrated that the ancient Phœnician language is almost indentical with the Irish, and has shown by arguments convincing to the Craft, that Freemasonry was introduced by them among that people. The ancient Druids, in their teachings, institutions, and customs were almost identical with the Masons of the present time, and used the lamb skin apron precisely as we do. This day we celebrate, as can be demonstrated, has been regarded and celebrated as anniversary of a secret order identical in character with the Masons of to-day, not only as far back as history throws any light upon the customs of mankind, but even as far as tradition reaches. Men who confess their ignorance of the facts of history are excusable in supposing that Masonry is a modern institution, but when the self-constituted teachers of men attempt to brand us as of modern origin, the plea of ignorance of these facts is more disgraceful than a confession of intention to defame us.

The statement that Masonry sets up their system of ceremonies in antagonism to Christianity is still more astonishing and inexcusable when it emanates from a convocation of ministers of that religion, because it must be supposed that they know something on that subject if they know anything at all. Upon this point, then, we should examine our ground carefully, for if the charge is sustained, it is sufficient to condemn us in the eyes of all well disposed men—but we are satisfied there is no point were our Order is so impregnable as this.

If one were to inquire where the tenets of the Christian faith are to be found, we suppose the Old and New Testaments, as we have them, would be pointed out as their only depository. And what do they teach? They do not teach the science of the Divinity, or gratify the curiosity of man by plausible theories of any description. They open by declaring that the heavens and the earth, and the whole material universe, were in the beginning created by God himself, for the purpose of preventing our placing faith in false gods or demons as our creators. They narrate the early history of our race, in clear and concise language, to dissipate the fables that, in the uneducated mind, would be readily credited in connection with the growth of the human family. They explain the relations of God to man, and show that he exercises a superintending providence over all his creatures. They delineate the obligations of the divine law, and rehearse the history of the race to prove that an obedience to that law invariably leads to happiness, while its violation is inevitably attended with disasterous consequences. They teach that in consequence of a willful violation of that law, sin found an entrance into the moral creation, and moral and spiritual death by sin. They teach the manner in which the consequences of transgression may be averted, and how man may regain the image of his Creator. They teach the final triumph of virtue, purity, and faith, and point out a happy immortality beyond the grave. They deal with subjects beyond the comprehension of the unaided reason of man. To claim that they are conversant mainly with subjects that lie open to the perception of our natural powers, is to derogate from the dignity of the Godhead, and fritter away his character to a level with benighted human nature. The relation between man and man is only treated incidentally because man has in his own breast a compass to guide him in all his intercourse with his fellows. It is no new idea in theology, and one sustained by the strongest evidences, that the volume of inspiration was never designed to teach a system of morals. That its inferences in this direction are strictly in accordance with the deductions of the highest reason in man, is no more than should be expected when we consider that the Giver of our reason and the Author of inspiration are the same. But if we were to select a single particular wherein the Bible differs from all systems of religion of human origin, it would be the fact that the Bible is conversant with subjects beyond the reach of intellect, and other systems relate more nearly to human duties. The writings of Confucius, the Institutes of Menu, the Dialogues of Cicero, and even the Koran of Mohummed, all make greater pretensions as treatises on moral duties than the Bible, and, after years of study, we have not been able to find a single merely moral precept that is not found elsewhere. On the presumption, then, that it was intended merely to teach morality, it would be comparatively useless, and we may safely say it would never have been written.

On the other hand, Masonry has for its object the determination of the relations between man and man, and has eliminated the purest system of morals. It is true that it presupposes the existence of a God and a moral government of the universe, and no one can be admitted to a participation in our assemblies who denies these essential truths. But in this respect it only conforms to the common sense and accumulated experience of mankind. The civil courts unhesitatingly exclude the evidence of witnesses who reject these truths; because if there is no Creator and Governor of the world, there can be no moral obligation, and consequently an oath has no binding character. For a similar reason, Masonry presupposes the existence of these great truths, and makes them the starting point of all its injunctions. The man who rejects them casts himself upon the broad ocean of life without rudder, or compass, or chart—with nothing but his appetites to lead him or his wild, unbridled passions to control him. He can have no idea of duties to his fellow-men, nor conceptions of the binding nature of moral obligations, and is utterly unworthy of our fellowship. Farther than the acknowledgement of these truths, Masonry does not interfere with religious dogmas. They are beyond the circle of its operations, and are utterly ignored. The Jew, the Christian, the Rationalist, the Mahommedan, can all meet in our lodges on a footing of equality. There is in the breast of every man a secret sanctuary, where he treasures up his hopes, his fears, his aspirations, his resolves, his religious faith, that Masonry never invades. The noblest and purest of human institutions, it never lays its unconsecrated hand upon the ark of God. Its principles in this respect are published from the housetop, and are found in every Masonic publication. There is therefore no apology for an ignorance of its position in reference to religion. And no matter what his relation to the church may be, the man who conceives that it is set up in opposition to the Christian religion, himself denies the divine origin of the book of inspiration, and gives a fatal stab to religion with a hand worse than that of an atheist.

An equally unfounded statement is the one that declares that Masonry is incompatible with the constitution of our land and republican institutions, is calculated to encourage combinations to resist law and the observance of order, and corrupts the minds of citizens, discouraging them from the prosecutions of the duties they owe a common country. How men can stand up in the face of day, in this nineteenth century, and with unblushing front proclaim such silly sentiments, is past our comprehension. It would be incredible were they not imprudent enough to publish them to the world. Can such men teach patriots like Washington and Warren and Green and Clinton and Jefferson and Madison and Franklin and Jackson, their duties relating to patriotism and citizenship? Is it necessary to dig from the graves the honored ashes of the purest and noblest men, who staked their all upon their country's independence and welfare, and pollute them with the filthy venom of bigoted slanderers to make an assault upon an institution revered and cherished by each of these heroes? If these were bad citizens, enemies to justice, opposed to republican principles, rather let every American citizen follow them in their downward course than the enemies of Masonry in their distorted ideas of morality and duty! If Masonry makes such citizens let it forever flourish, and let its foes be brought to everlasting confusion!

But, if Masonry were a mere sham—a specious form—a shadow without substance; were there no other, or higher attainments than the mere externals—the naked ceremonies—the semblance of virtue and the badge of innocence to conceal the blackest crimes—the empty names of moral principles basely prostituted and stripped of their appropriate meanings, the institution would merit nothing but disgrace and meet with little else than sovereign contempt. The sober and discreet part of the community who might become members, indignantly frowning on such base duplicity, long before this would have stripped off the mark, and exposed the monster naked to the world. Regardless of the frowns or the flatteries of their fellows, they would have triumphed in the extinction of the Order. There has been no age of human depravity, or country so far sunk in the depths of moral pollution, but has been honored with Masonic members, who, dreading nothing but the disapproval of their own consciences and the displeasure of heaven, would have trampled in the dust the very constitution of a corrupt and wicked association. Such attempts are, however, nameless in the records of time. And such never will be made, until the laws of nature shall be reversed, until light becomes darkness, virtue, morality, and religion the blackest of crimes. No individual, however corrupt of heart, or abandoned in principle, however reckless of present conduct or future consequences, could for once concentrate the whole vileness of his nature into a single point sufficiently damning and desperate to revile the true principles of speculative Freemasonry. An admiring world has often witnessed this cautious reserve with astonishment, and as often been inclined to ascribe it to some mysterious controlling influence of the powers of darkness. There is nothing, however, but some lingering sense of the great intrinsic excellences attached to this institution, that can at all times restrain slanderous expressions in disgraced and apostacised members. The very name of Masonry itself forces on the mind some faint, though perhaps unwilling remembrances of truths, which, for the moment command the approbation of the heart, and draw the tribute of praise even from polluted lips.

But if Masonry is indeed so dangerous a foe to society, where are the evidences? Can a single charge of this nature be substantiated? And is it not astonishing that men of reputed intelligence who cannot bring and maintain one single charge of this character, either of a public or private nature, should still harbor unfounded suspicions? Has not the experience of, say two hundred years, been sufficient to test our principles? Faithful records have certainly been preserved for that period. Is the testimony of thousands of individual members, persons of religion, probity, and truth—to be credited? Can no confidence be reposed in those of our friends with whom we are on terms of the closest intimacy? Has not the Order been patronized by Kings, Princes, and Presidents, as well as by men in every station of civil authority? Would such men take to their bosoms and cherish and recommend what was aiming to dethrone, or in any way subvert their governments, or distract the peace of society? The thing is incredible in its nature, and carries a plain contradiction in its terms.

We have only to turn to the pages of history and read the relations of Masonry to civil government in their practical developmeht. If, as an Order, it has ever departed from the path of rectitude, we ask, when? If it has ever been an enemy to social or political order, we wish to see the nation pointed out it has attempted to revolutionize. If it has ever been the insidious foe to religion or the church, tell us what temples it has made desolate. Such are not its designs, and no man of sense believes that they are. Its agencies are not to be sought for in those convulsions which agitate nations, or schisms which distract ecclesiastical councils. They are such as in all respects accord with the line of duty, and are to be sought in the hearts of individuals, and in the abodes of human suffering, lighted up by unostentatious visits of mercy. The world can never know how often the outpourings, not simply of common charity, but fraternal sympathy have caused the orphan to smile, and the heart of the widow to rejoice.

The Elections in Lodges.

Many of the elections will be held before this article reaches our readers; we intended to prepare a careful and thoroughly digested statement of our views, but the following article by Past Grand Master Holmes, of New York, meets so many points, that we give it in lieu of our leading editorial in this number:

THE CHOICE OF OFFICERS.

The time is approaching when the lodges will be called upon, under the laws of this State, to elect officers for the coming Masonic year. This duty is second to none, in the gravity of its importance, that falls to the lot of floor members to perform, and they should approach it with a sincere desire to do aright and perform it without favor, except that favor which is engendered by merit, fitness, and the evidence of a zealous desire to do right, on the part of those who may be candidates for stations and places in the lodge. We specifically make a distinction between stations and places, for the reason that the difference between the two is often lost sight of in many of our lodges, and because of the greater importance that attaches to the filling of the former, over the filling of the latter. The officers who have stations in a lodge are the Master, Senior Warden, and Junior Warden, and all of the rest have places. A lodge may succeed, be prosperous and well governed, if the stations are well and worthily filled, although the places may not be so; but if we take the converse of this, and let the stations be occupied by unworthy and incompetent brethren, and the places be never so well filled, no lodge can go on in usefulness, and inasmuch as their exists no point nor place where a lodge may remain stationary, it follows that it must retrograde under a lax or inefficient government. It is in the election of officers that the floor members of a lodge wield the power that makes it strong and efficient for good, or weakens it and causes it to lapse into uselessness. The opportunity to perform this occurs but once in each year, and when once the ballots have been cast, the results declared, and the officers elected have been installed, it is too late to look back and repent over a badly performed duty; for during the succeeding year, that which has been done can not be undone, and the lodge may be left to misrule, or to ignorance of Masonic law and usage, or to what may be an intelligent and yet an overbearing and an unduly autocratic government.

A little reflection, coupled with the knowledge which every attentive Mason of only a few years' experience, even, must have gained, shows plainly the great delicacy of the duty of electing the governing powers of a lodge, and admonishes all to carefully weigh the merits and measure the fitness of those who may be put, or put themselves, forward as candidates for the honors and responsibilities which are inseparable from the stations referred.

While we speak thus plainly as to the three principal officers of a lodge, we must not, in any manner, be understood as underrating the importance of having the subordinate positions filled with ability, and their duties administered with intelligence and zeal.

There are several things that should be looked upon with suspicion, and they frequently occur previously to, and on, election nights. If a Master has been petulant, overbearing in his conduct, arbitrary in his rulings, and self-opinionated during ten months of the year, and during the remaining two is facile, courteous, polite, and guarded in all that he does, tenderly taking care that he hurts the feelings of none, more especially of those to whom he has been particularly offensive, under the protection that his power throws around him; and he should be a candidate for re-election, you have a right to suspect his motives, and you may attribute his change of conduct to a sudden conversion, like that of Saul, or you may think that he desires to be again elected. You know your man, and you can judge for yourself.

If you find that the Wardens aspire to the Mastership, or to be re-elected, and that during a large part of the year they have been remiss in attendance, or have evaded the performance of their proper share of duty, and during the latter part of the year, and as the time of election approached, a sudden change has come over their conduct, and a new-born zeal apparently awakened, you may safely indulge a suspicion that there is a little leaven of ambition at the bottom of this change.

If candidates for office should come to you, and solicit your support, descant upon their own merits, and speak contemptuously of the claims or ability to work of others whom they may deem to be rivals, thus violating the good old rule that "the office should seek the man, and not the man the office," you have a perfect right to look upon them with suspicion, and even go so far as to doubt that they possess the commendable quality of modesty to the degree usual among men generally, to say nothing of Masons.

If you are asked to go into an electioneering compact of any kind by the supporters of different candidates, who may offer to vote for some brother whom you may desire to see elected, on condition that you will support some candidate of their nomination, you may justly suspect that the advancement of an individual has a more prominent place in their desires than the good of Masonry generally, or of your particular lodge, and, thinking thus, you should take heed, and govern yourself accordingly. Never, under any circumstances, be prevailed upon to vote for any candidate for mere expediency's sake, or for any one whom you may deem unfitted to hold the office for which he has been nominated either by himself or others. A self-nomination is always open to suspicion.

If you are a constant attendant at your lodge, and on election night see large numbers of brethren in attendance, whom you have not seen there during the whole of the previous year, and some, perhaps, whom you have never before heard of, you may well suspect that there has been some outside electioneering influences set in motion, and that they have been brought there for a purpose, and when that purpose has been, or has been sought to be, accomplished, you may well suppose that they will not be seen within the lodge for the next year to come, or probably within rifle-shot of it.

While you should rebuke the grave error of electioneering in others, and refuse to listen to their overtures, you should be very careful not to fall into the commission of the same sin yourself. We must not be understood as desiring in any way to prevent the honest investigation and discussion of the merits of a candidate for Masonic office, for it is a duty to so weigh and discuss them that you may understandingly direct your suffrage; but neither bargaining for votes, nor trading off of candidates, nor soliciting suffrages for those who lack the proper qualifications, can be called an investigation or a discussion. As Hamlet says, "I pray to avoid" them "altogether."

Zeal, integrity, and knowledge are the basis of the claims to office in a Masonic lodge, and the possession of them will so clearly assert itself, that no advocate can be needed to blazon them forth, or make of them a chaplet to place on even worthy brows.

You may, too, indulge in a very strong suspicion that something may be crooked, somewhere, if you see evenly cut ballots brought, in convenient bundles, into the lodge-room on election night, and especially if you find that the names upon them are all in the same handwriting. Such a thing, at least, should lead to the belief that the movement, like some of the nobility during the French revolution, should be "suspected of being suspicious."

Aside from the mere duties to be performed in a Masonic lodge by the Master and Wardens, and as to which they should be entirely familiar, it must be remembered that they, more especially in this city and in the vicinity, are the representatives of the subordinate lodges in the Grand Lodge, and questions may there arise which may require something more than the mere giving of a negative or affirmative vote. Each lodge should have the laudable ambition to be well and efficiently represented in that body; for oftentimes questions on appeal, or which may come before the Committee on Jurisprudence, or that on Grievances, may directly and greatly affect the standing, usefulness, and even the existence of a lodge. It is then that knowledge and brains are required, not only before committees, but in debate, when thousands of eyes are upon the debater. He should be able to truly represent his lodge, to uphold its action if it has been right, or palliate or excuse it if it has unwittingly fallen into error. A brother possessed of knowledge and zeal is always useful to the great body of Masonry in the Grand Lodge; while one without these qualities makes about as efficient a representative as would the figure-head of Bro. Kane's exploring ship—now on exhibition at Kane Lodge room—made of wood, its nose broken, and as much in the similitude of the femine gender as log can be carved.

Seek to fill the offices of the lodge, more especially the principal ones, with the best men in it, and if all should be doubtful, seek the best of the doubtful ones, and hope that they may become better. If all are good, seek the best, and give them your suffrages and support, to the ends that your lodge may be governed justly and equitably, its usefulness and adhesiveness increased, that it may be represented with ability, and that no blush of shame be called to your cheek during the time you are at labor under the eyes and criticisms of visiting brethren. Strive to so officer your lodge that the most intellectual brother in it will take pride in its proceedings, deem it a pleasure to attend its communications, and not think the time thrown away that may be given to its labors.

"Use careful watch, choose trusty sentinels."

Non-Affiliated Masons.

There are several reasons for non-membership in lodges:

First.—In case of demission and removal from the jurisdiction of one lodge into that of another. And this admits of several sub-divisions. The brother who is earnest, and with whom Masonry, like his religion, is a sentient reality, applies for membership without delay, and is seldom refused. Those who do apply and are rejected, are in a state of involuntary non-affiliation, and are not in fault. Others, again, living far from a lodge, fancy that they are excusable on account of the inconvenience. In most cases this is wrong, for it is the duty of every Freemason to belong to a lodge. In general, such brethren are usually ready to join in forming a new lodge, when a sufficient number can be found to unite for such a purpose. Some of our oldest, and some of our newest lodges have been so formed. But there is still another class, who, from penuriousness, indifference, or laziness, lay their demits aside, and carefully refrain from taking any part in Masonic matters, unless there is a feast or a parade.

Second.—Where a lodge ceases to exist, from any cause.

Third.—Where expelled or suspended Masons are restored to the rights and benefits of Masonry, but not to membership.

Fourth.—Where demits are granted to enable the brothers to live in comfort in their churches or families. Such members should no longer be recognized as Freemasons.

Fifth.—Where demits are granted without any reason except a desire to withdraw.

Several sub-divisions come in here also. One brother is disappointed at the result of an election; another is grieved, and sometimes justly, because his candidate is rejected, and for the malicious, unthoughtful, or mistaken acts of one brother, he is ready to grieve and forsake the rest of his brethren.

Another is angry at being called on to pay his dues, and with a full pocket and an empty heart, he desires to be relieved.

Another fancies that he should be petted and caressed, which ends usually in disgust, and he must go out.

Another is of opinion that a few earnest, faithful brethren, who have made themselves familiar with the work, ritual, usages, and amenities of Masonry, and are useful and honored in the lodge, have too much influence, and that he can not live comfortably with them. His manifest indolence and unskillfulness, in contact with their hard-acquired skill and talent, are to him a perpetual reproach.

And so on, in divers cases, demits are sought for, and as lodges are often incensed towards brethren, or have little respect for them, some excuse is invented to let them demit. The whole class of demits granted under this No. Fifth, are unlawful and impolitic. A non-affiliated Mason in such circumstances becomes, perhaps unconsciously to himself, but almost inevitably, an enemy to the lodge. It was an improper feeling that prompted him to apply for a demit, and he carries with him a continual consciousness of discontent, and he sows its seeds wherever he can. He has far more power outside of the lodge to work mischief than he possibly could have in it, for there he would be subject to control and government; and in cases of this class, nine out of ten soon regret the step they have taken, but a false pride, to give it no worse name, or a fear of rejection, prevents them from endeavoring to retrace their steps. Such men never confess their wrong. They are right; all who disagree with them are wrong.

A few words in application. Demits may lawfully be granted where a brother changes his jurisdiction, wishes to assist in the formation of a new lodge, or where his membership interferes with the peace of mind in his family or church, and rarely in any other case. Every candidate when he signs a petition solemnly promises, if admitted, to conform to all the established usages and customs of Freemasonry. One of the imperative requirements is to be a member of a lodge, and a lodge is a party to the violation of that preliminary pledge when it permits a member to withdraw for an unlawful reason.

Every reasonable inducement should be held to respectable non-affiliates to become members of a lodge, and we hope next October to report that ten thousand worthy brethren have united with the lodges, for there are full that number now "out in the cold." Brethren, gather them in.

WE have received from the brethren at Elgin by Bro. F. H. Moseley, a beautiful card, containing an invitation to be present at the dedication of their new hall.

Grand Chapter Iowa.

In our last we gave thanks to R. W. Bro. Parvin for copies of Transactions of the Grand Chapter of Iowa; we started out to do that thing to our E. Comp. W. B. Langridge, Grand Secretary, but a second look at the pile revealed only the old fashioned "tracks" of Prof Parvin. Somebody had to be thanked, and decently, too. So we poured the oil on Theodore's head, feeling certain that if it did not belong to him, that he was of "too generous a nature" to sit silently under the infliction. It is as we surmised. We have heard from him. Comp. Langridge is the man, and we do tender him our thanks for his kind remembrance, not only of the Grand Chapter of Illinois, but of our humble self and of our paper; and in this respect, we take no ordinary pleasure in saying that no grand bodies, of the age of the Grand Lodge and Grand Chapter of Iowa, have exhibited such praiseworthy enterprise in placing their proceedings in the archives of like grand bodies in a permanent form. Now, Bro. Parvin, if we had not thanked thee, this article would never have been written.

Thomas L. Knap.

We saw brother Knap a few weeks ago, looking well, and he informed us that he was employed on the Erie R. R. He will long be remembered in this city as the energetic and able Superintendent of the Great Western Railway, until it was incorporated into the giant Toledo, Wabash & Western, and from that time he acted as Superintendent of the Western Division, until a few months since. Several valuable accommodations have been obtained through him, which could be obtained from no one else. Shortly after we saw him, we were astounded with the news by telegraph that he was dead. His remains were brought to this city and buried at Oak Ridge. Bro. Knap was a member of Springfield Lodge and Chapter, and the son-in-law of Hon. Geo. L. Huntington, late Mayor of this city, and was otherwise respectably connected.

New Berlin Lodge No. 82, at New Berlin, Chenango county, N. Y., of which our dear brother was formerly Master, passed several resolutions in honor of his memory, but our space does not admit their publication.

Our Next Volume.

Our agents will please bear in mind that all their new subscribers—and all who have stopped and commence again are counted new—will get the November and December numbers as long as the surplus printed lasts, free. We had six hundred surplus in November, and will probably have that amount for this month.

We urgently request them to forward their lists this month, for there will be no surplus next month, as it is our intention to "cut our coat according to our cloth," and we shall print just that number of papers that we have subscribers on our list. Please let us hear early, and oblige us very much.

Dining Car.

If one wishes to realize the very embodiment of comfort, ease, and even luxury in traveling, let him visit the magnificent dining cars on the Chicago, Alton & St. Louis Railway. Stewed oysters, nice hot coffee, choice ham, tender beef steak, good vegetables, and surroundings, with no rush, no hurry, but "just as you like it," and all the while flying over a smooth road, over plain, through cuts, amid the forest, in a town, or along a stream. All the same; eat your fill; no clamor at stations; but moving as quietly and cosily as at your own fireside. What a change even in railroad traveling. The highways are being "made smooth."

The Rolling Stone Series,

Consisting of Frank the Young Naturalist, Frank in the Woods, Frank on the Prairie, Frank on a Gunboat, Frank before Vicksburg, and Frank on the Lower Mississippi, is a series of charming books for boys, just issued in boxes for Christmas and New Year's presents. Harry Castlemon, author of the Gunboat series, is the author of these handsome and entertaining books, and no other recommendation is needed. They are published by those enterprising book publishers, R. W. Carroll & Co., 117 West Fourth street, Cincinnati, Ohio, at $1.50 per volume, or $7.50 for the whole in a neat box, and are sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of the price.

Advance Payments.

We are now going on the strictly advance system. The subscriptions of a majority of our subscribers expire in this month. We aim to print but a very few copies over and above what are actually paid for. We therefore urge, fraternally, upon our patrons, to renew their subscriptions with our agents, whose names appear in the supplement accompanying the paper, or else send us the money direct by mail. Money comes as safely now in the ordinary way as by registered letter. The best way, however, is to pay to the agents.

M. W. Bro. Bromwell.

Our M. W. brother has recently delivered a series of lectures before the Craft at Charleston, on the mysteries, work, and symbolism of our Institution, which our correspondent says that, "for a thorough knowledge of the subject, eloquent delivery, and exposition of the most sublime truths taught by Masonry, all unite to declare that they have never beheld it excelled, if equaled, and for three hours in two nights he held his hearers in perfect suspense."

We have long admired the wonderful aptitude of Bro. Bromwell's mind to grasp and eliminate Masonic subjects. As a finished Masonic orator, he is regarded as having no superior.

Crystal Wedding.

Our R. W. Deputy Grand Master, DeWitt C. Cregier, of Chicago, has politely sent us his card of invitation to his Crystal Wedding. It is the most beautiful specimen of engraving, combined with materials of gold and isinglass, that we ever saw. The material is as clear as any glass ever made. The column is surmounted with the letter C, and following down in order are the letters R Y S T A L, situated upon the word WEDDING as a base. Interspersed over the card is the following:

1853. 1868.
Fifteenth Anniversary.
Mr. and Mrs. D. C. Cregier's compliments.
For Tuesday evening, Dec. 15.
121 Pearson street.

Let it be a brilliant affair. And the compliments of THE TROWEL and all its attaches to the bride and bridegroom, with the hope that we may all live to see their Diamond Wedding!!

Tidings.

Items.

Mackey Chapter No. 130 was constituted, at El Paso, by M. E. Comp. B. R. Baughm, P. H. P. of Bloomington Chapter No. 26, on the 30th of October. Comp. James Thompson was installed H. P.; O. P. A. Myers, K.; J. H. Moore, S.; Wm. Tompkins, Treas.; P. H. Tompkins, Sec.; J. D. Park, C. H.; C. Weinland, C. S.; G. L. Gibson, R. A. C.; L. M. Peck, G. M. 3d V.; H. C. Philips, G. M. 2d V.; Jacob Fix, G. M. 1st V.; J. H. Bennett, Tyler.

Another of our boys, J. A. Cooper, Esq., a member of Greenville Lodge No. 245, in Bond county, is elected Circuit Clerk, by 580 majority.

Streator Lodge No. 607.—This is the youngest lodge in La Salle county. The dispensation was granted April 24, and its work was so far approved that a charter was granted, and on the 4th of November it was constituted by Dr. Abel Bradley, W. M. of Ancona Lodge No. 552, as our deputy. Streator is a thriving village south of the Illinois River, surrounded by an industrious rural population, and this bids fair to be one of the strong lodges in the State. After the lodge was constituted, the Masons, with their wives, families, and friends, sat down to an oyster supper at the Streator Hotel, and had a right royal time. The lodge-room and its adjoining apartments are nicely fixed up, and our Streator brethren are at home, in a "live lodge."

R. W. Bro. Benjamin Beecher has been deposed from the office of Grand Treasurer of the Grand Lodge of Connecticut, for improper conduct in relation to the funds of said Grand Lodge.

Hebron Lodge No. 604, at Hebron, McHenry county, was constituted November 4, by R. W. Bro. A. Ransom, W. M. Richmond Lodge No. 143.

Since the close of the late civil war, Missouri is said to have gained 350,000 in population.

Pera Lodge No. 574, at Pera, Champaign county, was constituted October 28, by R. W. Bro. Wilson Hoag, W. M. of Paxton Lodge No. 416.

Gen. John M. Palmer, Governor elect, is a member of Mt. Nebo Lodge No. 76, Burke Chapter No. 53, and the Baptist church, at Carlinville.

Watson Lodge No. 602 was constituted October 10, by W. Bro. W. R. Hubbard, W. M. of Kinmundy Lodge No. 398. Watson is in Effingham county.

Shirley Lodge No. 582, at Shirley, McLean county, was constituted by Hon. John M. Stillwell, October 30.

Commission issued to A. Ransom, as Grand Lecturer, November 12.

Fisher Lodge No. 585, at Buckhart, Christian county, was constituted October 25, by W. Bro. J. W. Davidson, P. M. of Illiopolis Lodge No. 521.

Chicago gave the highest vote of any city in the Union at the late election, excepting only New York and Philadelphia.

Wapella Lodge No. 606, at Wapella, De Witt county, was constituted October 21, by W. Bro. A. H. C. Barber, W. M. of De Witt Lodge No. 84.

M. W. Bro. J. R. Gorin is the first Past Grand Master who has been honored with the position of Grand Commander of Templars.

Princeton Lodge No. 587, at Princeton, Bureau county, was constituted October 15, by W. Bro. Geo Crossley, P. M. of Bureau Lodge No. 112. Geo. O. Ide, W. M.; B. B. Foster, S. W.; C. J. Peckham, J. W.

Centralia gave 814 votes at the late election, and the county of Marion, in which it is situated, gave 4,376 votes.

The county of Woodford gave 2,116 votes, and several towns gave votes as follows: El Paso, 519; Olio, 491; Palestine, 413; Minonk, 401; Metamora, 374.

W. Bro. Wm. G. Billings, W. M. of Chemung Lodge No. 258, constituted Capron Lodge No. 575, at Capron, Boone county. John H. Robbins, W. M. This is the second lodge now at work in Boone.

Laclede Lodge No. 601 was constituted by W. Bro. I. H. Elkin, P. M., November 4. This lodge is on the Central, in Fayette county.

Tazewell Lodge No. 586, at Delevan, Tazewell county, was constituted by R. W. Bro. John Bennett, D. D. G. Master, November 9. This is the second lodge at Delevan, and the youngest in the county.

O'Fallon Lodge No. 576 was constituted Nov. 6, by R. W. De Witt C. Jones, P. M. Marion Lodge No. 130.

John M. Ragan appointed Grand Lecturer Nov. 18, at Benton, Franklin county.

The entire vote given for President in Illinois is 449,436; three counties gave over 10,000 votes each: Cook, 46,631; La Salle, 11,670; Adams, 10,250. The two next highest are McLean, 9,753; Sangamon, 9,284. Peoria and St. Clair are the only other counties which exceeded 8,000 votes. The vote in 1866 was 350,203.

Fowler Lodge No. 599, at Fowler, Adams county, was constituted Oct. 28, by R. W. Bro. Joseph Robbins, M. D., Grand Orator.

Elbridge Lodge No. 579 was constituted Oct. 10, at Elbridge, Edgar county, by R. W. D. G. Burr, Inspector of the Work. Bro. Burr says the lodge will be an honor to the Craft. There are seven lodges in Edgar county.

Cerro Gordo Lodge No. 600, at Cerro Gordo, Piatt county, was constituted by W. Bro. Geo. W. Bright, Master of Macon Lodge No. 8. C. J. Pitkin, W. M.; W. L. Reed, S. W.; Eli Drew, J. W.; Jacob Drum, Treas.; J. A. Barnes, Secretary; John Cross, S. D.; B. Mallemee, J. D.; John Young, Tyler.

KENTUCKY.—Grand Lodge.—Grand Communication held Oct. 19, at Louisville. Twelve Past Grand Masters, twenty-seven Past Masters, and three hundred and seventy-two representatives, were present. Elisha S. Fitch was re-elected Grand Master, A. G. Hodges, Grand Treasurer, and John M. S. McCorkle, Grand Secretary. The November Freemason contains a full list of officers, members, and representatives, with proceedings up to a certain point, to be continued, but fails to give a full list of officers elect in any of the bodies.

Grand Secretary McCorkle, of Louisville, Ky., has become one of the proprietors of the National Hotel, in that city. Bro. Hodges gives him a good name as a business man, husband, father, friend, brother. Such a man can "keep a hotel."

La Harpe is in the northeast corner of Fulton county, on the railroad from Peoria, via Canton and Bushnell, to the Mississippi River.

Thanks to Bro. H. H. Avron, Bombay, India, for the Bombay Gazette of Oct. 3. This large ournal is now in the 20th year of its publication.

We acknowledge the receipt of invitation to ourself and ladies to attend the first annual hop of Garden City Lodge No. 141, at Crosby's Music Hall, Friday evening, Dec. 18. G. W. Barnard, W. M., W. Peters, J. Butler, G. R. McClellan, H. Starring, Committee of Arrangements.

Highland Lodge No. 583, at Highland, Madison county, was constituted by R. W. Samuel V. Crossman, of Alton, Nov. 19. The services of Bro. Crossman are highly commended by the lodge.

Lafayette Chapter, Washington, D. C., had a banquet Nov. 23, in which the several chapters in the city, with the grand officers, participated. Noble D. Larner, Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge, is the High Priest, and made a capital speech. We hope that Potomac Chapter will soon join them; it is not well to nurse old sorrows. We are again surprised in finding our old friend French has only slipped from the Grand Mastership, that he might revel again as Grand High Priest. He is determined to be ahead of us.

Sangamon Chapter No. 126, at Dawson, Sangamon county, was constituted by M. E. Comp. O. H. Miner, Nov. 24, and the officers installed. Dec. 1st the regular election was held, and John C. Simon Wiggin Robinson.

GRAND ORIENT, BOSTON, Oct. 30, 1868.

The M. P. Sovereign Grand Commander, to all Freemasons of the A. A. Scottish Rite in the Northern Jurisdiction of the United States. Sorrow! Sorrow! Sorrow!

BRETHREN: The Angel of Death has again smitten us. Our Venerable and Illustrious Brother, Simon Wiggin Robinson, 33°, Past Sovereign Grand Commander and Active Member of our Supreme Council, departed this life on the sixteenth instant, at the ripe age of seventy-six years.

As a man he was universally beloved and respected: while, as a Mason, he faithfully served his brethren, and received their confidence, esteem, and the highest honors in their gift, having been in the York Rite Grand Master of Masons in Massachusetts; Grand High Priest of the Royal Arch Chapter of the same State, and Grand Master of the Grand Encampment of Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

He has gone down cloudless in the west, full of years and of honors.

In token of our respect for his memory, and sorrow for his loss, let the altars and working tools of the bodies in this jurisdiction be draped with the violet badge of mourning for the space of sixty days, and these letters be entered of record.

Given at the Grand Orient the day and year aforesaid.

Expelled.

HALL OF BLISSFIELD LODGE No. 114, A., F. & A. M.,
BLISSFIELD, MICH, Nov. 23d, 1868.

Bro. Reynolds:

DEAR SIR—Mr. H. G. WELLMAN, formerly a member of this lodge, was expelled from all the rights and benefits of Masonry on the 26th of last month, for the following reasons, viz:

He contracted all the debts he could with brother Masons and profanes, and agreed to pay at various times, but after having obtained as much credit as possible, he left, with his family and an accomplice by the name of James Tallmadge, for parts unknown, thereby defrauding many of their just dues.

Charges were preferred against him for unmasonic conduct, and he was expelled as above.

I was directed to have this case published in some Masonic journal, that the fraternity might look out for a "wolf in sheep's clothing."

Indiana.

DEAR EDITOR—I wish just to say we closed yesterday, the 22d of October, 1868, the most harmonious session of the Grand Chapter and Council at Fort Wayne that we have ever had. Nearly all the subordinate chapters were represented. To our praise, may it be said, we had no case of grievance to adjust. Our subordinate chapters are mostly working well, and doing a great deal of work; yet they are guarding well the entrance. We granted charters to some eight new chapters. In fine, we may say that capitular Masonry is in a very flourishing condition in Indiana.

The companions at Fort Wayne acquitted themselves nobly in their attentions to the Grand Council and Grand Chapter. They seemed to vie with each other as to who could excel in their personal efforts to make the members of the grand bodies in session and the visiting companions feel at home during their stay.

They gave the Grand Chapter and visiting companions one of the finest banquets we have ever had the pleasure of attending, and after having partaken of the good things prepared to bountifully for the outer man, and enjoyed a season of social re-union together, we all retired, feeling it had been good for us to be there. They have in Fort Wayne one of the finest halls in the State. It is tastefully arranged and ornamented, the ceiling representing the starry-decked heavens.

P. G. H. P. Sol Baylis, who resides at Fort Wayne, was not able to be with us at all, in consequence of illness, which we all regretted very much indeed, for he has been with us so long in annual communications, that he has become one of the fixtures for labors in the grand bodies. Few men, if any, have done more for Masonry in Indiana than has companion Baylis. No man is more devoted to all the interests of Masonry than he is. A worthy companion in distress never goes away from him unprovided, for his hand is always open for the relief of the widows and orphans of a deceased Mason. He has, perhaps, given as much, if not more, to distressed Masons, their widows and orphans, to the poor generally, to the cause of education and religion, than any one man in the State, according to his ability; as a consequence, he has drawn around him a host of friends where he lives.

At the earnest request of Comp. Baylis, the Grand Chapter visited him at his residence in a body, on Thursday, at noon, and entered the companion's parlor and rooms adjoining, where we witnessed one of the most affecting scenes it has ever been our lot to witness. After the companions had nearly all taken the sick companion by the hand, our M. E. G. H. P., H. G. Hazelrigg addressed him on behalf of the companions present, in a few of the most appropriate and well-timed remarks it has ever been our good fortune to listen to, reviewing their long acquaintance, and alluding in a very touching manner to his devotion to the Order. His remarks to our beloved companion were delivered with such emotion as almost to forbid utterance. At the close of the remarks, at the request of companion Baylis, we offered up our devotions to Deity, the Grand Chaplain leading, in which our sick companion joined very heartily. All hearts swelled with melancholy pleasure, and many eyes wept profusely. We all left feeling it had been good for us to be present.

The officers of the Grand Chapter for the ensuing year are:

M. E. Comp. H. G. Hazelrigg, G. H. P.
M. E. Comp. R. J. Chesnutevoos, D. G. H. P.
M. E. Comp. Hugh Hannah, G. K.

Guard the Door.

The Masonic Order was never more prosperous, and I may add, never more popular, than at the present time, and hence it is more necessary for us, while we endeavor to unite with us as many good men as possible, to exercise the utmost caution that we do not open our doors indiscriminately to all who may knock for admission; for the popularity of Masonry serves as an inducement for bad, designing men to seek admission.

Let us remember that at the present time our every word and act are closely scrutinized by most active, vigilant, and most earnest enemies of Masonry, anxious for even a straw on which to base their wicked, slanderous persecutions. Our best defense and protection against their attacks is to purify our Order by purging our lodges of the unworthy, and carefully guarding the outer door, so that none but those whose daily lives are a guarantee of honor and uprightness can gain admission. The motives of each applicant should be closely scrutinized, and his character and standing closely investigated. It is not enough that no one knows any evil of him. He should possess positive and affirmative qualities of goodness and influence, such as tend to raise him in the scale of life.

The external qualifications of "worldly wealth and honor" should never be considered for a moment, when the internal qualifications of mind and heart, of truth, honesty, and uprightness before God and man, are wanting. The destiny of our Institution rests entirely in the hands of the Fraternity itself, and we have more to fear from our own errors within than from the attacks without. Let us, then, awake to a zealous spirit of watchfulness, of union, and of harmony among ourselves, and more earnestly exemplify the beautiful tenets of our profession, by practicing out of the lodge those lessons of virtue and morality taught within it.—Reuben Michel, G. M. of Iowa.

New York Mutual Protection Life Assurance Society.

We have been tendered and have accepted the general agency of the above named society. Andrew W. Morgan, Treasurer of the New York Chamber of Life Assurance, is President; F. A. Freeman, long connected with the Globe, is Secretary; Pliny Freeman, of the Globe Life Insurance Company, Union Adams, President 8th National Bank, Hon. Demas Barnes, Brooklyn, and James M. Austin, M. D., Grand Secretary of New York, are among the directors. Probably no Life Assurance Society ever formed embraced a greater amount of character, wealth, general intelligence, and absolute experience in Life Assurance, than the managing board of this company. It has been at work a trifle over four months, and has already issued five hundred policies, and have insured to the amount of nearly a million and a half of dollars. We are assured that this is unprecedented in the history of any other company. All its policies are non-forfeiting; it places no limit to travel; declares annual dividends; charges no policy fee; pays its policies at death in full; it is a cash company, and policy-holders are members. Its systems are—non-forfeiture life policy; ten year non-forfeiture life policy; non-forfeiture endowment policy; youth's endowment policy, to be paid at a specified age, or at death; youth's non-forfeiture endowment, payable at a certain age, or at decease; and an income producing policy. We have the general agency for all of Illinois, except Cook county, have several agents, and are ready to receive applications for agencies or policies.

Carlinville.

We were at Carlinville a few days ago, and met Col. Phillips, Master, Comp. Dugger, H. P., and Bro. Holliday, formerly Master, with several other brethren. Through the hospitality of Bro. Holliday, we made the acquaintance of his accomplished lady and interesting family—had a sight of his rare collection of books, pictures, and old manuscripts, and of his elegant mansion and grounds. Few men are like Bro. Holliday. Such a collection of books we never saw, and so large are his accumulations, that he is about to add a third story to his dwelling, for library purposes alone. An extract from one of his addresses, which we innocently purloined, appears in this number, and reveals the fact that Carlinville has a modest Mason not inferior to any in Illinois.

Apples and Potatoes.

All the way from the prettiest nook in Illinois, situate on the line of Richland and Edwards, came a barrel of large rich apples and a barrel of luscious potatoes, all in prime condition, as a present from our long-tried friend and a sterling Mason, R. W. Bro. George Mason, Master of Parkersburg Lodge No. 511. Will, genius, industry, and Spartan integrity, have made him rich and honored, and no sorrow thrives around him which his hand can alleviate.

The Keystone

For November 28, comes to us with a very handsome notice of Past Grand Master Ira A. W. Buck, of Aurora. The paper is one of the handsomest that comes to us, is unexceptionable and valuable in matter, and the only weekly Masonic paper now published. We think that within a few weeks we recognize the pen of a master hand, transferred from another city to Philadelphia. In this connection, we make the amende honorable to our cotemporary in a matter mentioned a few weeks since, in that we copied a well written article from the Keystone in regard to the meetings at St. Louis, without giving the proper credit—a thing we never intended to do, but in our haste the omission escaped our attention.

Bro. John C. Baker.

This zealous Mason has lately had a severe case in his lodge, which was amicably settled by his patience and forecast. With his professional family he starts, December 15, on another of his annual musical pilgrimages. He will be at Kankakee Dec. 16; Paxton, Dec. 23; Urbana, Dec. 26; Danville, Dec. 30; Tuscola, Jan. 4; Mattoon, Jan. 6; Shelbyville, Jan. 7; Paris, Jan. 11; Charleston, Jan. 14; Odin, Jan. 20; Lawrenceville, Jan. 25; Olney, Jan. 27; Cairo, Feb. 4; Carbondale, Feb. 9; Centralia, Feb. 12; Vandalia, Feb. 13; Pana, Feb. 17; Decatur, Feb. 22; Clinton, Feb. 24; Chenoa, March 1; Wilmington, March 4; and Joliet, March 5; and at intervening stations on intervening days. Success attend them.

A LADY in one of the papers relates a sweet little instance of a child's delicate thoughtfulness. She says: I asked a liitle boy last evening, "Have you called your grandmamma to tea?" "Yes," he replied, "when I went to call her she was asleep, and I didn't know how to wake her. I didn't want to holloa at grandma, nor to shake her, so I kissed her cheek, and that woke her very softly. Then I ran into the hall and said pretty loud, 'Grandma, tea is ready,' and she never knew what woke her."

DECISIONS BY THE GRAND MASTER.

No. 18.—Persons under suspension by lodges now extinct or dormant, can be restored only by the Grand Lodge, upon petition and payment of all arrearages to the Grand Secretary.

No. 19.—No brother can be lawfully elected and installed Master who has not served by election or installation as Master or Warden, except by dispensation.

No. 20.—An objection made to the advancement of a candidate in open lodge, or to the W. M. in or out of the lodge, is good until the objection is removed or waived. A reason given to the W. M. is a sacred secret, and whether sound or frivolous, does not invalidate or weaken the objection. If the reason for the objection be given without solicitation to the lodge, it then becomes the property of the lodge, and the lodge may decide upon its propriety and validity. It is unmasonic to solicit such reasons, or to endeavor in any manner, either directly or indirectly, to obtain them, and when so obtained are not to be considered.

No. 21.—A summons must be known to have been served or received before it can be called "due summons."

Miscellaneous Reading.

The Months.

Our arbitrary division of the year into twelve months, has manifestly taken its origin in the natural division determined by the moon's revolutions.

The month of nature, or lunar revolution, is strictly 29 days, 12 hours, 44 minutes, 3 seconds; and there are, of course, twelve such periods, and rather less than 11 days over, in a year. From an early period, there were efforts among some of the civilized nations to arrange the year in a division accordant with the revolutions of the moon; but they were all strangely irregular till Julius Cæsar reformed the Calendar, by establishing the system of three years of 365 followed by one (bissextile) of 366 days, and decreed that the latter should be divided as follows:

Januarius	31	days.
Februarius	30	"
Martius	31	"
Aprilis	30	"
Maius	31	"
Junius	30	"
Quintilis (altered to Julius)	31	"
Sextilis	30	"
September	31	"
October	30	"
November	31	"
December	30	"
	365	"

The general idea of Cæsar was, that the months should consist of 31 and 30 days alternately; and this was effected in the bissextile or leap-year, consisting, as it did, of twelve times thirty with six over. In ordinary years, consisting of one day less, his arrangement gave one day less to February. Afterwards, his successor Augustus had the eighth of the series called after himself, and from vanity broke up the regularity of Cæsar's arrangement by taking another day from February to add to his own month, that it might not be shorter than July: a change which led to a shift of October and December for September and November as months of 31 days. In this arrangement, the year has since stood in all Christian countries.

The Roman names of the months, as settled by Augustus, have also been used in all Christian countries, excepting Holland, where the following set of names prevails:

January	Lauwmaand	Chilly month.
February	Spokelmaand	Vegetation month.
March	Lentmaand	Spring month.
April	Grasmaand	Grass month.

May	Blowmaand	Flower month.
June	Zomermaand	Summer month.
July	Hooymaand	Hay month.
August	Oostmaand	Harvest month.
September	Herstmaand	Autumn month.
October	Wynmaand	Wine month.
November	Slagtmaand	Slaughter month.
December	Wintermaand	Winter month.

"These characteristic names of the months are the remains of the ancient Gaulish titles, which were also used by our Anglo-Saxon ancestors."—Brady.

Amidst the heats of the Revolution, the French Convention, in October, 1793, adopted a set of names for the months, somewhat like that kept up in Holland, their year standing thus:

	French Months.	Signification.	Eng. Mos.
Autumn.	1. Vindemaire.	Vintage	Sept. 22.
	2. Brumaire.	Foggy	Oct. 22.
	3. Frimaire.	Frosty or Sleety	Nov. 21.
Winter.	4. Nivose.	Snowy	Dec. 21.
	5. Pluviose.	Rainy	Jan. 20.
	6. Ventose.	Windy	Feb. 19.
Spring.	7. Germinal	Sp'ging or Bud'ng.	Mar. 21.
	8. Floreal.	Flowery	Apr. 20.
	9. Prairial.	Hay Harvest	May 20.
Summer	10. Messidor	Corn Harvest	June 19.
	11. Thermidor.	Hot	July 19.
	12. Fructidor.	Fruit	Aug. 18.

Five days at the end, corresponding to our 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, and 21st of September, were supplementary, and named sans-culottides, in honor of the half-naked populace who took so prominent a part in the affairs of the Revolution. At the same time, to extinguish all traces of religion in the calendar, each month was divided into three decades, or periods of ten days, whereof the last was to be a holiday, the names of the days being merely expressive of numbers—Primidi, Duodi, Tredi, etc. And this arrangement was actually maintained for several years, with only this peculiarity, that many of the people preferred holding the Christian Sunday as a weekly holiday. The plan was ridiculed by an English wit in the following professed translation of the new French Calendar:

"Autumn—wheezy, sneezy, freezy,
Winter—slippy, drippy, nippy,
Spring—showery, flowery, bowery,
Summer—hoppy, croppy, poppy."

"Thirty days hath September,
April, June, and November;
All the rest have thirty-one,
But February twenty-eight alone,
Except in leap-year, once in four,
When February has one day more."

Sir Walter Scott, in conversation with a friend, adverted jocularly to "that ancient and respectable, but unknown poet, who had given us the invaluable formula, Thirty days hath September, etc. It is truly a composition of considerable age, for it appears in a play entitled The Return from Parnassus, published in 1606, as well as in Winter's Cambridge Almanac for 1635.

Ringing out the Old Year.

The close of the year brings along with it a mingled feeling of gladness and melancholy—of gladness in the anticipation of brighter days to come with the advent of the New Year, and of melancholy in reflections on the fleeting nature of time, and the gradual approach to the inevitable goal in the race of life. That so interesting an occasion should be distinguished by some observance or ceremony appears but natural, and we accordingly find various customs prevail, some sportive, others serious, and others in which both the mirthful and pensive moods are intermingled.

One of the best known and most general of these customs is that of sitting up till twelve o'clock on the night of the 31st December, and then, when the eventful hour has struck, proceeding to the house-door, and unbarring it with great formality to "Let out the Old, and let in the New Year." The evening in question is a favorite occasion for social gatherings in Scotland and the north of England, the assembled friends thus welcoming together the birth of another of Father Time's ever-increasing, though short-lived progeny. In Philadelphia, in North America, we are informed that the Old Year is there 'fired out,' and the New Year 'fired in,' by a discharge of every description of firearms—musket, fowling-piece, and pistol. In the island of Guernsey, it used to be the practice of children to dress up a figure in the shape of a man, and after parading it through the parish, to bury it on the sea-shore, or in some retired spot. This ceremony was styled "enterrer le vieux bout de l'an."

A custom prevails, more especially among English dissenters, of having a midnight service in the various places of worship on the last night of the year, the occasion being deemed peculiarly adapted both for pious meditations and thankfulness, and also for the reception and retention of religious impressions. And to the community at large, the passing away of the old year and the arrival of his successor is heralded by the peals of bells, which, after twelve o'clock has struck, burst forth from every steeple, warning us that another year has commenced. At such a moment, painful reflections will obtrude themselves, of time mis-spent and opportunities neglected, of the fleeting nature of human existence and enjoyment, and that ere many more years have elapsed, our joys and sorrows, our hopes and our forebodings, will all, along with ourselves, have become things of the past. Such is the dark side of the question; but it also has its sunny side and its silver lining:

"For hope shall brighten days to come
And memory gild the past."

And on such an occasion as we are contemplating, it is both more noble and more profitable to take a cheerful and re-assuring view of our condition, and that of humanity in general—laying aside futile reflections on past imprudence and mismanagement, and resolving for the future to do our utmost in fulfilling our duty to God and our fellow-men.

In reference to the aspirations just alluded to, which every generous mind must feel, we take leave of our readers, in the subjoined utterance of our greatest living poet:

"Ring out wild bells to the wild sky,
The flying cloud, the frosty light:
The year is dying in the night;
Ring out, wild bells, and let him die.

Ring out the old, ring in the new,
Ring, happy bells, across the snow:
The year is going, let him go;
Ring out the false, ring in the true.

Ring out the grief that saps the mind,
For those that here we see no more;
Ring out the feud of rich and poor,
Ring in redress to all mankind.

Ring out a slowly-dying cause,
And ancient forms of party strife,
Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.

Ring out the want, the care, the sin,
The faithless coldness of the times;
Ring out, ring out my mournful rhymes,
But ring the fuller minstrel in.

Ring out false pride in place and blood,
The civic slander and the spite;
Ring in the love of truth and right,
Ring in the common love of good.

Ring out old shapes of foul disease;
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold;
Ring out the thousand wars of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace.

Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land,
Ring in the Christ that is to be.'

Visit to an African King.

To-day the king sent his pages to announce his intention of holding a levee in my honor. I prepared for my first presentation at court, attired in my best, though in it I cut a poor figure in comparison with the display of the dressy Waganda. They wore neat bark cloaks resembling the best yellow corduroy cloth, crimp and well set, as if stiffened with starch, and over that, as upper cloaks, a patchwork of small antelope skins, which I observed were sewn together as well as any English glovers could have pieced them; while their head-dresses, generally, were abrus turbans, set off with highly-polished boar-tusks, stick-charms, seeds, beads, or shells; and on their necks, arms, and ankles they wore other charms of wood, or small horns stuffed with magic powder, and fastened on by strings generally covered with snakeskin. N'yamgundu and Maula demanded, as their official privilege, a first peep; and this being refused, they tried to persuade me that the articles comprising the present required to be covered with chintz, for it was considered indecorous to offer anything to his majesty in a naked state. This little interruption over, the articles were conveyed to the palace in solemn procession thus: With N'yamgundu, Maula, the pages, and myself on the flanks, the Union Jack, carried by the kirangozi guide, led the way, followed by twelve men as a guard of honor, dressed in red flannel cloaks, and carrying their arms sloped, with fixed bayonets; while in their rear were the rest of my men, each carrying some article as a present.

On the march toward the palace, the admiring courtiers, wonder-struck at such an unusual display, exclaimed, in raptures of astonishment, some with both hands at their mouths, and others clasping their heads with their hands, "Irungi! irungi!" which may be translated "Beautiful! beautiful!" I thought myself every thing was going on as well as could be wished; but, before entering the royal inclosures, I found, to my disagreeable surprise, that the men with the Suwarora's hongo or offering, which consisted of more than a hundred coils of wire, were ordered to lead the procession, and take precedence of me. There was something specially aggravating in this precedence; for it will be remembered that these very brass wires which they saw I had myself intended for Mtesa; that they were taken from me by Suwarora as far back as Usui; and it would never do, without remonstrance, to have them boastfully paraded before my eyes in this fashon. My protests, however, had no effect upon the escorting wakungu. Resolving to make them catch it, I walked along as if ruminating in anger up the broad high road into a cleared square, which divides Mtesa's domain on the south from his kamraviona's, or commander-in-chief, on the north, and then turned into the court. The palace or entrance quite surprised me by its extraordinary dimensions, and the neatness with which it was kept. The whole brow and sides of the hill on which we stood were covered with gigantic grass huts, thatched as neatly as so many heads dressed by a London barber, and fenced all round with the tall yellow reeds of the common Uganda tiger-grass; while within the inclosure the lines of huts were joined together, or partitioned off into courts, with walls of the same grass.

Twenty-one Years.

The Annapolis (Md.) Examiner, announcing the return of Mr. Gilbert Murdock, of that city, after an absence of twenty-one years, tells the story of his adventures:

In 1846 he left Annapolis, under Major Emory, United States army, to assist in establishing the United States boundary line between California and Mexico. Soon after their arrival, the appropriation became exhausted, and Mr. Murdock received an appointment in the custom-house at Monterey. Retiring from this position after a year's service, he spent one year as Mayor of the city, and four years as public auctioneer. Marrying a Miss Flegg, he shipped as a passenger to the Sandwich Islands, and soon after spent five years in auctioneering in Melbourne, Australia, as a member of the firm of McPherson & Co. Purchasing the brig Marion Helen, he started, in company with his wife and child, on a trading voyage, but was wrecked on a reef not laid down on the charts of navigation. His wife and child were drowned before his eyes on this reef, coasting one of the Java Islands. He was taken prisoner by the savages, but after eight weeks, in company with another prisoner, escaped, put to sea in a canoe, was picked up by a friendly vessel and taken to Australia. Impoverished by misfortune, he undertook the labors of a miner. After spending considerable time in this dangerous and undesirable avocation, he rejoiced in receiving from the American Consul letters forwarded to him by Secretary Seward, from his mother and surviving friends in this city, inclosing drafts to enable him to return. He immediately shipped via Callao, Panama, and Aspinwall for New York, and after a voyage of eighty-five days was welcomed by his friends in this city on the evening of the 14th ult. Mr. Murdock confesses that home is the best place he has seen.

Literary.

Literary Notices.

The Children's Hour.—We have received the December number, and a spicy, splendid one it is. The dogs of St. Bernard are out in a new dress, and the picture in the article "Christmas is Coming," is worth a dollar. And then, just think of the sleigh-riding, the fish stories, the bird songs, and the child wonders. It is a good thing for little folks—and big folks, too. Published by T. S. Arthur & Son, 809 and 811 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, at $1.25 a year, in advance.

Home Circle and Temperance Oracle.—Under the sanction of many of the leading temperance men of the West, the Chicago Home Circle, now entering its eighth volume, espouses the cause of temperance with an ability peculiarly its own. A lofty temperance paper has long been needed in the west, and this is the right one in the right place. Being long established as a literary journal, the temperance people will hail it with delight. The December number comes out with the new head, so that lodges and individuals may send in their lists before New Year. An excellent temperance poem, entitled "The Drunkard's Wife," an essay to the Good Templars, and an editorial entitled "The Bane of Society," are of much value. A prize of $25.00 for the highest list of 50 or over, and a second prize of $10.00 for a list of 25, or good pay for good labor to any lodge or individual. Here is a chance for a New Year's bonnet. Subscription, $1 a year. November and December numbers free to those who remit at once. Sample copy with terms, 10 cents. Address S. M. Kennedy, Editor, 194 Clark street, Chicago.

The Little Corporal comes to us now in magazine form. On the left hand upper corner is the national flag, surmounted by an eagle, while in the center is grandpa, papa, mamma, big and little girls and boys, including the little corporal in his Zouave dress, with Bose and Tabby, and any quantity of playthings. The whole frontispiece is a thing of beauty. The picture of the giraffe, and the ludicrous disgust of the ass, is a thing to laugh at, while the story of poor little Squirrel-Furs, telling how hungry she was, and poor and cold, and what a chance she had to take just one little piece, and didn't, would stir older hearts than children's. One dollar a year. Published by Alfred L. Sewell, 6 Postoffice Place, Chicago, Ill.

The Riverside Magazine for Young People, for December, is a rarity. The work is just what its name indicates, and is put up after the style of the publisher's issues, on first-class paper, and in the best style of the printer's and engraver's art. Its picture of Mr. Duck, the quack-doctor, among the fowls, is inimitable, and would make even a solemn quack laugh. "How a Mouse kept Christmas," is a nice thing for little girls; "My Debut as a Sportsman," will set the boys to laughing. The story about the dog Fax will interest any one, while "The Little Brown Seed," a fairy story, will set all the younglings into ecstacy. The Riverside is no pretentious, threadbare respectability, but fit for every class and condition, and, to our notion, is, of all others, the most meritorious and unexceptionable of the many young people's magazines, for all sizes and ages of reading children and youth—and, for that matter, old folks, too. Published monthly by Hurd & Houghton, 459 Broome street, New York, at $2.50 per annum.

The Sunday School Teacher is a monthly 32-page pamphlet, in magazine form, and has a lesson for each Sunday in each month, embracing a short and clear exposition of the history, geography, biography, doctrine, and direct application of each lesson, with a separate arrangement for infant classes, together with a Sunday-School summary, notices, lectures, advice, &c., arranged by an able committee representing the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, and Congregational denominations. It is intended for the use of the officers and teachers, Bible-classes, and advanced scholars. It is an able periodical, published by Adams, Blackmer & Lyon, 155 Randolph street, Chicago, at $1.50 per annum. Address publishers for further particulars.

The Sunday School Scholar is a journal which supplies a want long felt. For years we have been disgusted with the inanity and good-little-boyism of our chief Sunday-School papers. They have been gotten up for five year olds, and are poor at that. The Scholar "talks in meeting," goes fishing and hunting with the boys, boating with the girls, and is up to all that interests the big folks in miniature. The articles in the number before us were written by Grace Greenwood, Sarah E. Shaw, Emily H. Miller, Mary Lowe, Mary B. Sleight, Evan E. Edwards, Edward Eggleston, Prof. Hewett, etc.,—names that are a guaranty of life, sense, goodness, and progress, and that no silliness, vapidness, or toadyism will be found in the columns of the Scholar. Published monthly, in eight pages (size of Trowel pages), by Adams, Blackmer & Lyon, 155 Randolph street, Chicago, Edward Eggleston, editor, at 50 cents per year. Send to publishers for club rates.

Merry's Museum for December is on our table. It is nice. "Tessa's Surprises," a Christmas story, is a gem, and the whole is good. It is published in magazine form, monthly, by H. B. Fuller, 14 Bromfield street, Boston, at $1.50 per annum.

The Sorosis, a paper precisely the size of The Trowel, devoted to the interests of women. The number dated Nov. 28 has been carefully perused. It is an earnest, dignified, and plain spoken publication. "Woman in Law" is a fair statement of woman's legal rights and disabilities, while "Marian Weymouth's two Thanksgivings" is a story replete with the effects of fashionable selfishness and womanly heroism in the same person in different circumstances. The leading editorial lacks finish and continuity, while the next article, headed "Education," is full of plain truth stated in admirable terms and elegant language. None of the articles are failures, while in most there is piquancy, wit, spice, and a woman's delicate tact and handling. Housekeeping, fashions, items, notes, and correspondence are well distributed, while editorial notices and advertisements help to make it pay. More terseness, directness, and continuity is necessary. Let the food be good, wholesome, and thoroughly cooked. Without indorsing or disapproving the intention of this journal, every woman will be benefited by it, and no man should be afraid of it. Let it circulate. Published weekly and edited by Mrs. M. L. Walker & Co., at 104 Randolph street, Chicago, at $3 per annum.

The American Entomologist.—This journal is invaluable to every fruit-raiser, and all interested in horticulture, and, for that matter, agriculture also. We have received the November number, which contains information not to be had in any other intelligent form save at great expense. The immense insect world is scientifically and practically treated, by B. D. Walsh, of Rock Island, Entomologist for Illinois, and by Charles V. Riley, 2,130 Clark avenue, St. Louis. The work is published in a neat form, with valuable insect engravings, by R. P. Studley & Co., 104 Olive street, St. Louis, at one dollar per annum, in advance.

The Mother's Journal is a forty-two page magazine, handsomely printed on good paper, and a handsome cover. Its articles are such as might be expected from the culture, talent, and literary experience of Mrs. Mary G. Clarke, combined with fine practical sense, high-toned piety, and a complete knowledge of house-wife and motherly duties.

The December number treats of maternity, disease, and household duties, interspersed throughout with stories, poetry, anecdotes, and news. The Thanksgiving at Grandpa's is rich. There is no maudlin or silliness, but all is sensible and in good womanly humor. Published by Clarke & Co., 8 Custom-house place, Chicago, at $2.00 per annum, in advance.

The School Master deals with school matters, is a nice paper, and worthy of patronage. Just such a paper is a necessity in order to be thoroughly posted in educational matters. The one before us fills the bill. It is published by John Hull, at Normal, McLean county, monthly, at one dollar per annum.

Dr. Thornton's Case.

"It is so strange that you did not marry, Paul!" said Harry Needham to his friend, Dr. Thornton, when the tea things had been carried out, and they sat pleasantly talking by the bright fire of a Pennsylvania anthracite that lit up the cosy back parlor of his pleasant New York home.

The remark was a most natural one, since the cosy back parlor was so suggestive of all sweet home comforts. There were marks of somebody's tasteful fingers everywhere, and Harry's eyes dwelt lovingly on the closed door whence his household fairy had disappeared with the year old baby asleep in her arms.

Dr. Thornton looked around with a slow, sweeping glance, which took in all the graceful appointments of the room, from the pretty Fayal workstand, whose tremulous shadow quaintly interlaced the fire light cast upon the floor, to the looping of the snowy curtains, and the training of the parlor ivy on the wall. He had the face and manner of a master; and looking at him, you would not wonder that, although young, he held already an assured position among men of his profession who could count twice his years of practice.

"It is strange, Harry; I wish I could."

"Why not?" asked Needham in surprise at his friend's earnest tone.

There was no answer for a moment. Thornton bent forward and looked musingly into the coals.

"The witchery of the fire light must be on me to-night," he said at last, with a smile. "It is not often that I am in a mood for confidences. Why not, did you say? Because I believe I am hopelessly in love—with a memory. You would scarcely suspect me of such romantic impressibility that the face of a girl whom I only saw once, and that years ago, should have power to come between me and every other woman whom I might have loved; yet, looking back to-night, I know it is true. Having once seen my ideal, I cannot be content with less.

"It was my first year at the German University. I had been miserably ill, and my physician positively insisted upon outdoor air and active exercise. So I set out, although I could ill afford either time or money, in company with two or three others, with a staff and wallet, to visit on foot various places of interest.

"We stopped for a week in Dresden. One day—how well I remember it!—I had been strolling along the Elbe, through the public gardens, watching the groups of quaintly-dressed people sipping their coffeee in the shade, and chatting gaily to each other. My walk ended, as usual, in the Art Gallery, for pictures were my enthusiasm then as now. Going into the hall where hung the Sistine Madonna, I saw a party of tourists standing before the painting. My first glance assured me that they were Americans, and this of itself would have attracted me—a home face is so dear in a strange land—had not the central figure of the group riveted my gaze in a moment. The others were engaged in conversation, pointing out the various features of the picture, and indulging in the various rhapsodies; but this girl, a slender creature of not more than fifteen, stood motionless and silent, her lips parted, a faint flush on her cheek, and the whiteness of her finger tips showing the pressure of her clasped hands together. You want me to tell you of her face; but it is useless to try. I cannot describe it. It was very beautiful; but no mere beauty could have held me with undiminished charm at this distance of place and time. Her expression indicated not so much simple admiration of the picture as a complete merging of her own personality into the sublime emotions which the theme inspired. The wonderful mingling of tender adoration with dimly foreshadowed suffering in the face of the Madonna seemed to have reproduced itself in her own, until the canvass might have been a mirror, where the image of the dark-eyed, oval-faced girl who stood there was portrayed.

"'We must be going,' said a lady whom I judged to be her mother; 'the train leaves at six, you know, and there is the packing to be finished. Come, Annie! Why, the child would stay here a whole day!'—touching the girl's arm, who had not moved. She started, looked about her with a deep breath, and, still without speaking, turned to follow the company from the room. As she passed me at the door, a knot of leaves disengaged itself from the brooch at her throat and fell to the floor; I stooped quickly and returned it to her, and to this day I cannot breathe the spicy fragrance of geranium without feeling again the thrill with which her smile repaid me."

Dr. Thornton might have said more, but little Mrs. Needham came in at that moment.

"What! the gas not lighted yet?" she said, in surprise. "You gentlemen must have been asleep, or telling secrets. Shall I break the spell?"

"I wish it were always as pleasantly broken, Mrs. Needham—cannot we have a game? Harry shall have two balls, and you and I will play against him." Then in an aside: "It is but fair, Harry; I have played my game of life alone so long."

Later, when the strife had been triumphantly concluded by Mrs. Needham, who compassed two arches and the stake at her final stroke, and they were quietly seated again, Needham said:

"You will hardly thank me, Paul, for sending you another case when you are overcrowded already. Our house has just lost the services of a young lady, one of the very best designers we have ever employed. You have seen our last edition of the 'Christmas Hymns?' The illuminations are mostly hers—some splendid work there, which you know how to appreciate. Our last order had been filled, so I looked up her address, and called to-day. I found her sitting with bandaged eyes in a darkened room, and suffering great pain. Knowing that you made diseases of the eye a specialty, I recommended her to you. I had still another reason for doing so, which I will explain. She lives alone with her widowed mother, who has been an invalid for years, and they are poor. I suspected as much before, but now I am sure of it. Their room was small, and scarcely comfortable, but several articles of furniture indicated former luxuries. A piano stood in one corner, and I learned incidentally that she had given music lessons in addition to her other work. I doubt if they have any resources but her hands, which must now be idle. Both mother and daughter are refined and sensitive; and, although I felt great sympathy, I could think of no way of making an offer of substantial assistance. But I thought I would ask you, in case of her application to you, to make the terms for the treatment of her eyes as nearly nominal as possible, without offending her sense of propriety."

"I should do so most gladly; what is the lady's name?"

"Miss Brayton—Annie Brayton," answered Needham; "here is her last work, a part of the unfinished order of which I spoke." He rose and took three or four sketches from a portfolio, marginal designs for a book of poems. "See here!" he said, holding one of them in the light, "did you ever see anything drawn with greater spirit than that cliff, with its bold lines and apparently inaccessible approach, yet the bit of irregular wall at the summit shows human presence and effort, and so appeals to the sympathy of the race. One who could sketch that must know what it is to be at home among the mountains."

"I like this one particularly," said Thornton, after a pause, "although it is the simplest of all—this tuft of moss shot through by a spray of scarlet partridge-berries; I like it because of the marvelous faithfulness with which it is finished, the evidence of a touch so tender and delicate as to be almost a caress. I am anxious to see my patient."

"Perhaps there is a charm about the name she bears," said Needham, playfully, while Dr. Thornton drew out his watch and rose to take his leave.

Among the visitors in the ante-room, when the physician's office door was thrown open next day, sat a young lady dressed in deep black. She awaited patiently her turn for examination, then rose and went into the inner apartment.

"Dr. Thornton, I believe?" she said in a voice singularly clear and musical. "I am Miss Brayton; will you please look at my eyes?"

As she spoke she threw back the heavy veil, whose double folds had protected her from the light, and lifted toward him—the face of the Dresden Gallery! The same, yet not the same! By the influence of years of trial, patient endurance, and earnest, hopeful effort, the ungrouped capabilities of the girl had been crystalized into a many-sided character. She stood before him the perfection of his dream, his own out of all the world, he thought—yet he must school himself to the utterance of professional commonplaces, while not the tremor of a nerve should betray his long constancy.

"It is only a temporal difficulty, Dr. Thornton?" she said, with trembling eagerness.

"That depends upon the care you shall take of yourself," he answered, gravely; "as yet there is no organic disease. You must have strained your whole nervous system by some kind of overwork. Only rest and careful obedience to prescribed treatment can give you back your eyes."

"For how long?"

"I cannot tell; six months at least."

The poor girl uttered an involuntary exclamation of dismay, and her lip quivered for a moment, but she controlled herself by a strong effort.

"I ought to be thankful for the hope of being well at all," she said wearily; "but it seems very long to wait."

The autumn and winter wore away. Miss Brayton's eyes improved but slowly. It was true that she needed utter rest in body and mind; the former she took of necessity, but the latter was beyond her power. To find her way through the glare of the street was a task so trying, that Dr. Thornton forbade it, visiting her at her home inslead.

Her heart sank at the thought of the long bill of charges to come in by and by, even while she could not repress a thrill of pleasure at the sound of his familiar step. There was the piano as the last resort, she thought; her treasured jewels, her father's gift, had been sold already to meet the emergencies of the present.

Mrs. Brayton's watchful and tender eyes could not fail to detect the brightness which Dr. Thornton's lingering calls brought into her daughter's face, and a secret trouble grew at her heart which she would not for the world have put into spoken words. Must a greater grief still be in store for the young heart that had labored so patiently and suffered so nobly.

One day the Doctor brought a basket of rare fruit; again it was a bunch of hot house flowers, fragrant with geranium and heliotrope; or a magazine, with passages marked for Mrs. Brayton to read aloud. Indeed, he so succeeded in interweaving himself with all her pleasures that it was no wonder if poor Annie said a dozen times a day, "How kind of him, mamma!" with her pale cheek in a glow.

The time came at last when the bright sunshine might find its way unchecked through the windows. Annie's eyes were not yet strong enough for her painting, but the days of idle darkness were past, and she could at least look forward to the speedy resumption of her music lessons.

"You will not need me much longer, Miss Annie," said Dr. Thornton, finding her alone one day; "shall you be glad?"

She did not reply, but he went on as if he had not noticed her silence, unrolling an engraving.

"You have the original, Miss Annie."

"Yes, how did you know?"

"The poor student who picked up your boquet in the Dresden Gallery has remembered you too well to be mistaken."

A sudden illumination broke over her face.

"Can it be possible?" she cried. "Now I understand the strange consciousness I have have often had of having seen you somewhere long ago! Here is the lost thread that has eluded me so long!"

"Annie," said Dr. Thornton, softly, "since then your face has been with me always. It has helped me to subject the baseness of my nature and lift me toward all things noble and true. When I saw it again in my room that day, I dared to hope that God had given you to me. These few months of your darkness seem to have concentrated all the light of my life. Annie, have I presumed too much?"

Dr. Thornton's house is rich in painting and statuary. Connoisseurs go there to study and admire.

"Mrs. Thornton," said Harry Needham, as he went from wall to wall the other day, "your husband has mistaken his vocation—with his taste he should have been a great artist."

"No, Annie, tell him no!" said Thornton, coming to his wife's side and drawing her within the shelter of his arm; "no immortality on canvass or in marble could have made up to me for the loss of the case which I have so often blessed him for sending me, by merit of my plain profession!"—Taken from the Keystone.

The White Ant.

This destructive insect forms one of the greatest nuisances in India, and the mode and manner of carrying on its operations are as provident as they are pernicious. These insects abound throughout the southern provinces of Hindoostan, and the turiform hills which they have raised, may be observed spreading ten thousand folds, both far and wide, over every barren heath. From these mounds taper up so many conical minarets, some of them reaching as much as seven feet in height. These fabrics are composed of a hard crust of earth, equal in durability, while kept dry, to the strongest cement. The whole of these conical chimneys are subdivided into so many different and distinct galleries, the areas of which are the size of a goose-quill, and the same lead to one common terminus, which is the magazine or general store-room, and which is sunk from two to three feet below the foundation of the hillock. When the white ant commences its depredations upon a building it may be easily detected, although not suspected by a person unaccustomed to its habits. The writer was the occupant of a Bungalow, on the Coromandel coast, which had not long been erected, when the ant invaded the dwelling. There was among other furniture a picture in a frame, suspended from a nail driven into one of the stucco walls of the dining room. Two columnar pillars of dry red sand were to be observed raised along the wall, from the ground, communicating with the frame in question. The writer, instigated by curiosity, passed one of his fingers across one of these areanceous branches, when he discovered that he had ruptured a well conducted tunnel, and confounded a regiment of sappers and miners, several of which seized the offensive member with their horny forceps, and persevered in their hold until crushed. In less than half an hour, the breach was repaired and tunnel completed. A week had not elapsed when a native servant, while in the act of removing the picture with a view to dust it, caused it to fall, when it broke into a dozen or more pieces. There never has been discovered any remedy against the innovations of these insects, which will bring a house about a person's ears in a few months after it has been built, every beam in the building. During the rains, when the ant hillocks become softened by excessive and continued wet, pea-fowl, partridges, and a variety of birds, commit sad havoc among the termites, while lizards and small snakes devour them wholesale. Indeed, were it not for such enemies as these, the white ant would become intolerable.

Many persons have often wondered what are the signification and origin of the corpulent little image so common on all Chinese porcelain. A former emperor, during the early days of porcelain, commanded that some china of a peculiar pattern should be made for him. Though every effort was made, the execution of this order seemed to be impossible; and the mandarin who had charge of affairs reported the failure to his serene majesty. The command was repeated, and the argument of the bastinado was applied; but with no happy result. The furnaces still failed to do their part. At last, one of the workmen—a poor little wretch named Pousa—despairing of success, and seeing before him a future whose principal feature was a daily bastinadoing, in a moment of unbearable misery, jumped into a glowing furnace, and was instantly consumed. But he disappeared from mortal eye, only to rise a brilliant star among the gods; for when the burning was over, the porcelain was found perfect and beautiful, and the insignificant martyr received divine honors, and has since been the deity of all good porcelain makers, and his image is religiously stamped upon the choicest work of the empire.

Poetry.

The Creation of Man.

As the Supreme Original is infinite, the earth and all the planets are a very small part of His works. Who can tell how far the rays of light extended through the boundless immensity of space, when God said, "Let there be light; and there was light.?" —Gen. i., 10.

Thou First of beings, infinite Supreme,
Who spoke the word, and worlds from nothing came!
Light, light, and love, all holy thee I hail!
To praise thy name a seraph's tongue would fail!
Man is not the only being left to praise
Thy sacred name, and the glad anthem raise;
Millions of angels praise thee as their God,
And thrones and powers obey thy sovereign nod,
Proclaim thee First, I AM, Eternal King,
And of thy light, thy love, and goodness sing.
Thus I have sung how light at first did rise,
And shining stars adorn'd the azure skies;
How worlds and suns were in their centers laid.
Almighty Fiat all from nothing made.
The first great cause and source of vital breath;
Whose hand sustains all life on earth beneath.
Within the seas he form'd the pond'rous whale;
The daring lion, and the crocodile;
Each living thing He gave its proper form,
From th' elephant down to the crawling worm.
All kinds of creatures, every fowl that flies,
Live by His power, and at His pleasure dies.
Great are the works of the First Cause divine,
In harmony all beautiful they shine.
But here I sing, more wonderful than all,
Of creatures form'd upon this earthly ball;
The Sacred Three, when this great work began,
A council held, and said, Let us make man.
Adam was form'd of pure refined clay;
And God in him His image did display.
A shining light the sun did first appear;
The second light in Adam's soul was clear;
Nor mid-day sun one-half so clear did shine
As Adam's soul, all holy, pure, divine.
The soul of man, a spark of heavenly fire,
The breath of God, which never will expire,
A clear bright lamp, to let him see the way,
Through gloomy darkness not to go astray.
Clear shining light, from darkness dark as night,
God was and is the fountain of all light.
The Scriptures next to tread the path that's right.
In splendor bright the sun at first began,
And reason shines within the soul of man.

Adam was created lord of the creation, and the noble leading faculty of his soul was understanding. This jewel alone adorns the rational creature man. Behold with admiration and surprise the faculties of his soul! He can convey his mind through the whole creation, and view the several creatures on earth: consider the fabric, the use, and beauty of animals; discern the signature of plants; and penetrating thereby into their nature and virtues, he is enabled to extract from them a healing balm for the human body. His mind also views the vast ocean, and soars in a moment from earth to heaven; it describes the motion of the sun in the ecliptic; calculates tables for the motion of the planets; and foretells, at a great distance, the dismal eclipses of the sun and moon to the very digit; and also to the portentious conjunctions of the planets to the very minute of their ingress. These are some of the grand employments of the understanding. But the soul is also capable of exercising itself on a much nobler theme. It can contemplate the glorious mysteries of redemption, and trace redeeming love through all the astonishing methods and manifold discoveries of it in the sacred Scriptures.—Magazine and Mirror (London).

Pride.

BY JOHN G. SAXE.

'Tis a curious fact as ever was known—
But often in human nature shown,
Alike in castle and cottage—
That pride, like pigs of a certain brood,
Will manage to live and thrive on food
As poor as a pauper's pottage!

Of all the notable things of earth,
The querest thing is the pride of birth
Among our "fierce democracy!"
A bridge across a hundred years,
Without a prop to save it from sneers—
Not even a couple of rotten peers—
A thing of laughter, flings and jeers—
Is American aristocracy!

Depend upon it, my snobbish friend,
Your family thread you can't ascend
Without good reason to apprehend
You may find it waxed at the other end
By some plebeian vocation;
Or, worse than that, your boasted line
May end in a loop of stronger twine,
That plagued some worthy relation.

Because you flourish in worldly affairs,
Don't be haughty and put on airs,
With insolent pride of station.
Don't be proud and stick up your nose
At poorer people in plainer clothes;
But learn, for the sake of your mind's repose,
That all proud flesh—wherever it goes—
Is subject to irritation.

ANCIENT AND MODERN RITES

Worked Under the General Denomination of Freemasonry.

BY TYRIAN.

NO. IV.

AMERICAN RITE.

What I have denominated the American Rite is commonly called the York Rite, the several component parts of which were enumerated in my last.

The reason that I would assign for denominating it the American Rite, is that I purpose to show that all its parts, after that of Master Mason, are American degrees, worked in the United States only, save two exceptions.

The York Rite, properly speaking, is composed of the three degrees of Masonry, and no more; and, startling as it may seem to my companions in Chapter and Council, I am prepared to enunciate and defend the opinion that true, genuine Masonry does not exist outside the three degrees of a Master's lodge. All else is of modern manufacture, and is such as has been legalized by common consent of all parties concerned.

Before the schism which occurred in England, nothing whatever was known, or at least recognized, as Freemasonry, but the degrees of E. A., F. C., and M. M. In order to conciliate the opposing faction, and for the sake of peace and harmony, principle was sacrificed by the true Grand Lodge of England, and recognition extended to the degree of Royal Arch. That degree was originally a component part of the Master's degree, and was stolen, amplified, and created into a new degree, wherewith to "head off" the legitimate Grand Lodge.

Accordingly, to the statement in my last, that the legitimate degrees of Masonry are those of Entered Apprentice, Fellow Craft, and Master Mason, and none other, I am prepared to stand, and to defend the same.

Freemasonry ceased to be a purely operative society at the assembling of the convention at York, whence the rite takes its name. At that time, the degree of Entered Apprentice was all that the lodges conferred, the other two being conferred by the Grand Lodge. The lodges were afterwards allowed to confer the degree of Fellow Craft, and finally the Grand Lodge surrendered to the lodges the care of all three degrees. Business of all kinds, except conferring degrees, was transacted in lodges of Entered Apprentices, as it continued to be as late (in this State) as 1809.

Our various Masonic authors and writers disagree as to what the York Rite really is; as, for instance:

> The York Rite is the basis of all rites that claim a Masonic character. At first there were but three degrees; but as at present practiced, there are but seven: 1, Apprentice; 2, Fellow Craft; 3, Master; 4, Mark Master; 5, Past Master; 6, Most Excellent Master; 7, Holy Royal Arch. There are three other degrees—appendages to this rite—viz: the order of High Priesthood—an honorary degree conferred on the first officer of a chapter—and the degrees of Royal and Select Master.—Macoy.

Upon most of Bro. Macoy's points I agree, and agree with him when he states that the York Rite was at first composed of but three degrees; but I go further, and say that there are still but three.

As to the appendages, the honorary degree of High Priesthood is appropriately named, and so was the degree of Past Master, until Webb and his confreres manufactured the chapter degrees.

The degrees of R. and S. Master are just as much an appendage as the degrees of Mark and Most Excellent Master.

Mackey agrees substantially with Macoy, but acknowledges that the York Rite has somewhat deviated from its purity—the most lamentable instance of which is the engrafting of numerous illegitimate degrees on the parent stock.

Another author, just returned from a tour of exploration in Palestine, thus speaks of the chapter degrees as practiced in the American system:

> "In other countries, the degree of Royal Arch is communicated without the intermediate degrees of Mark Master and Most Excellent Master. All the degrees of the chapter here named are intensely Americanized."

And "all the degrees of the chapter here mentioned" include all of them.

> York Rite.—This rite practices the following degrees: 1, Apprentice; 2, Fellow Craft; 3, Master Mason; 4, Mark Master; 5, Past Master; 6, Most Excellent Master; 7, Holy Royal Arch; 8, Royal Master; 9, Super Excellent Master; 10, Select Master.—Aug. Row, K. T.

Here the degrees of R. and S. M. are recognized, not as appendages, but as a component part of the York Rite, and another degree added.

We make our present article short, from want of time, and propose in our next to take up the American Rite proper in its first addition, viz: Mark Master.

Sir J. H. Miles presented a good report on correspondence.

The Grand Recorder's schedule shows 1,677 members; increase, 329. Created, 349; admitted, 16; previously admitted, 46; demitted, 59; suspended, 6; expelled, 3; died, 14; receipts, $2,297.00.

Sir O. H. Miner, from Committee on Doings of Grand Officers, submitted a report, from which we take the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the appointment of Sir Knight Alfred Creigh as Representative of this Grand Commandery near the E. of the Right Eminent Grand Commandery of Pennsylvania; Sir Knight William Sewall Gardner, near the E. of the Grand Commandery of Massachusetts and Rhode Island; Sir Knight Josiah H. Drummond, near the E. of the Grand Commandery of Maine; Sir Knight George Frank Gouley, near the E. of the Grand Commandery of Missouri; Sir Knight Heman Ely, near the E. of the Grand Commandery of Ohio; and Sir Knight William Barrett, near the E. of the Grand Commandery of New Hampshire, be confirmed, and the patents issued to each of said Representatives approved.

2. Resolved, That the Eminent Grand Commander elect appoint four skillful Sir Knights, who with himself shall be appointed a Committee on Work, whose duty it shall be to determine the work and ritual within the jurisdiction of this Grand Commandery, and make report or exemplification thereof at the next annual conclave.

3. Resolved, That the Grand Commander be authorized to appoint some skillful Sir Knight annually as Inspector General; who shall be authorized to instruct commanderies and Sir Knights in the tactics and drill, ritual and work of the orders, at the expense of those by whom he may be employed.

4. Resolved, That each commandery in this grand jurisdiction be furnished with three copies of the tactics and drill adopted by this Grand Commandery, and that they be required to conform thereto.

5. Resolved, That the sum of four hundred dollars be appropriated to Sir Knight Charles H. Brower, for his services in preparing the tactics and drill adopted by this Grand Commandery.

6. Resolved, That the sum of fifty dollars be appropriated to each of the Representatives of this Grand Commandery in attendance on the Triennial Conclave of the Grand Encampment in St. Louis in September last, for expenses incurred by them, and one hundred dollars in addition to the Rt. Eminent Grand Commander, for increased expenses devolving on him on account of his station.

Resolved, That the thanks of this Grand Commandery are hereby tendered to the Grand Commandery of Missouri and the commanderies of St. Louis, for their Knightly courtesy to and magnificent entertainment of members of this Grand Commandery and the Sir Knights of Illinois in attendance at the Grand Encampment of the United States at its late triennial conclave.

Sir H. G. Reynolds presented the report on mileage and per diem, making a total of 5,043 miles, $491.50 mileage, $76 per diem; total, $567.50.

J. R. Gorin, of Decatur, was elected Grand Commander; Chas. E. Munger, Joliet, Deputy; Andrew J. Dunning, Springfield, Grand Generalissimo; John M. Pearson, Godfrey, Grand Capt. Gen.; Rev. C. A. Gilbert, Joliet, Grand Prelate; Daniel Dustin, Sycamore, S. G. Warden; James A. Hawley, Dixon, J. G. Warden; R. H. Foss, Chicago, Grand Treasurer; James H. Miles, Chicago, Grand Recorder; Hiram W. Hubbard, Centralia, G. St. Bearer; A. S. Converse, Galesburg, G. Sw. Bearer; L. H. Jorgensen, Cairo, Grand Warder; L. K. Osborn, Chicago, G. C. G.

Sir George Gardner, from the Committee on Templar Jurisprudence, submitted the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That every petition for a dispensation for a subordinate commandery shall state, in addition to the matters heretofore usually set forth, that some one of the petitioners, who shall be named, is competent to discharge the duties of Eminent Commander in conducting the ordinary business of a commandery, and is also sufficiently skilled in the work and ritual of the Order to be able to open and close a commandery in due form, and to confer the Orders of Knighthood in a proper manner; and the recommendation required from the nearest commandery shall affirm that the facts stated in the petition are true, and the commandery so recommending shall be held responsible to the Grand Commandery for the truth of such affirmation.

Sir Wiley M. Egan, from the Committee on Charters and Dispensations, recommended that charters be granted to Bethany Commandery No. 28, Mendota; Hugh De Payens Commandery No. 29, Carrollton; and to St. Omer Commandery No. 30, at Litchfield, and they were granted.

The following resolution was adopted with a will:

Resolved, That the signal ability displayed by the Right Eminent Grand Commander, Vincent L. Hurlbut, in the administration of Templar affairs in this State; the character which he has given to the Chivalric Orders at home and abroad, and the good temper and impartiality of his acts, entitle him to the warmest gratitude of this Right Eminent Grand Commandery.

After the installation, R. E. Grand Commander Gorin appointed the following standing committees:

On Foreign Correspondence.—Sirs James H. Miles, A. W. Blakesley, O. H. Miner.
On Jurisprudence.—Sirs Vincent L. Hurlbut, H. G. Reynolds, N. F. Prentice.

Sir Charles H. Brower was appointed Inspector General.

Apollo Commandery has 290 members; Elwood, 102; Chicago, 112.

The appendix contains by-laws for new commanderies, and several valuable forms.

Address of Grand Commander: R. E. Jerome R. Gorin, Decatur.

Address of Grand Recorder: E. James H. Miles, drawer 5,862, Chicago.

Balloting Again and Re-investigation.

We thought that the leading features which govern the admission of candidates and advancement of brethren into and in lodges of this State, had been so discussed and acted upon in Grand Lodge, so fully reported in its transactions, and given to the Craft so generally through Masonic papers, that but little was left to be inquired about. We have recently, however, received several communications on the subject, and among the rest the following:

MASONIC EDITOR OF THE N. Y. DISPATCH—Dear Sir: Please answer the following question, which has been the source of controversy with many Masons in the Fourth Masonic District: A candidate is proposed, a committee appointed, a favorable report made, committee discharged, a ballot had, and candidate elected. Immediately after the ballot is declared by the W. M., a member of the lodge, who voted favorably, addresses the W. M., and states, since the vote was taken he has come in possession of information which leads him to believe the candidate has been guilty of a very heinous offense, the nature of which he states to the lodge, and desires that a new committee be appointed to re-investigate the case. Question—Would it be in the province of the lodge, through its Master, to appoint such committee?

Yours, truly, CENTRAL.

The others which we have received are somewhat similar in their general purport, and we now propose to answer them together. We should have done this in our last issue, but lack of space prevented.

A candidate, as we have frequently declared, does not acquire any right whatever by being accepted, as such, by a lodge. The act of acceptance is simply a declaration that he is deemed to be of good moral character, and possesses the necessary physical qualifications. It is equivalent, too, to saying that those who voted for his admission knew of no reason why he should not be made a Mason at the time when they voted on his petition. Starting with this proposition, the justice of the whole of our Grand Lodge legislation becomes at once clear. The question quoted above we answered affirmatively, but without giving any reasons, in our last issue. The brother referred to, who asked for the appointment of a new committee, needed not to have prefaced the request by any declaration whatever. It was equally his duty and his right to ask for the appointment of a committee, and it was the duty of the Master to appoint it, and this, too, without having recourse to the lodge. The power of the Master in all such cases should be promptly exercised. Otherwise, the very aim of the brother, that of keeping an unworthy man out of the Fraternity, might be defeated; for if the lodge should decide by a majority vote not to appoint a new committee, and the Master refused to appoint one, the moving brother would be without a remedy, unless he called for a new balloting on the spot, which we will presently refer to. The course of moving for a new committee was a conservative one. While the mover did not see fit to act definitely against the candidate on the information received, he still evinced a desire to have such an investigation as would show that his information was either true or false. He then should have objected to the progress of the candidate until the report of the new committee should be made; for by so doing no harm could be done either to the lodge or to the candidate—to the lodge by the initiation of the candidate prematurely, or to the candidate by estopping his progress for six months. Wherever there is a doubt as to the fitness of a candidate, that doubt should be against the candidate and in favor of the lodge, and until it is removed the progress of the former should be stayed.

Another question asked was virtually this: All of the preliminary steps have been taken by the lodge; a committee of investigation has reported favorably; the report has been received, and the lodge has balloted upon the candidate, who has been declared elected. Can a brother of the lodge then demand a new ballot? He can, in our judgment, beyond all question, and it would be the duty of the Master to order the ballot to be spread without delay. The candidate has gained no right, and the only right that exists is that which is reserved to every member of the lodge to choose with whom he will associate. This right is not foreclosed by any ballot, but it exists up to the latest moment, when it can be effectually interposed. A mere objection to a candidate has the same effect. The Grand Lodge decided in 1864 (see pp. 28, 185, of transactions of that year,) "That any member of the lodge has a right to object to the initiation or advancement of a candidate at any time, and that such objection shall be a bar to the further progress of the candidate until withdrawn."

That a candidate has no rights at all as against the lodge, is shown by a decision made in 1861, in which it is declared that "The Master of a lodge has an undoubted right to refuse to initiate a candidate, notwithstanding his acceptance by the lodge, if in his judgment such initiation would be improper." The Master, in this respect, possesses no more power than any other member of the lodge in good standing. All are equally bound by duty to keep out every candidate whose "initiation would be improper."

When a mere objection has such force, how much more forcible, it may be asked, is the ballot spread a second time, and found to be unfavorable? We can only answer that the objection acts as a temporary or indefinite stay of the candidate, while an unfavorable ballot absolutely stays his progress in the particular lodge, and, without its consent, for all time in any other lodge. A disinclination to the initiation of a candidate may therefore be made manifest in two forms after he has been balloted for favorably by the lodge. The first by objection, and the second by an unfavorable ballot.

The rule of this jurisdiction, that a ballot may at any time be called for, is a healthful one in all of its aspects. A member of a lodge may find that a person whose character he knows to be bad, and with whom he could not sit in his lodge, has been proposed and accepted in his lodge. He has the power to shut the candidate out by the exercise of the ballot, instantly and effectually. The power, or more properly duty, he can not exercise by proxy, for the grand lodge decided, in 1858, that "a brother is not required to black ball a candidate against whom he has and knows no objection, at the hail of another brother." It makes no difference where the ballot may be demanded, for it can be done at a special communication or at a regular one, the only difference being that it must be had at a regular one. If called for at a regular communication (no matter though it be at the same one at which the candidate was elected) it should be had on the spot; for the brother making the demand may be so situated as to be unable to attend at a subsequent communication, or his business may call him away from his residence, and inasmuch as he can not ballot by proxy, the candidate may be received in his absence, and against his wish.

The most recent decision on this subject by our Grand Lodge, was made in 1866 (see Transactions), when it was declared "That when a second ballot, after a first favorable one, is demanded on a candidate, the lodge can not lay the balloting over, but must proceed forthwith to ballot, if the demand be made at a regular communication. If the demand be made at a special communication, the candidate becomes immediately stopped, and the ballot must be taken at the next regular communication." In 1862, the Grand Lodge decided that "A ballot, on the application of a candidate for the degrees, can not be indefinitely postponed, but must be acted on by the lodge." In 1863, the following decision was made: "A Master has no right to order a ballot on a candidate to lie over to a subsequent communication after the candidate has once been balloted for." This decision was no doubt made in view of an unfavorable ballot having been cast. The rule, however, works both ways. It was intended to keep a bad man out, and it applies with equal force to both phases.—Dispatch—P. G. M. Holmes.
